return to Delphos of a long time, if I did not very much think that I was absolved averted from Telesile; Therefore I did v-zard my affection, and began to make frequent visits, (for we were in a great and populous Town,) and I fixed upon one above the rest who was indifferently fair: but yet I entertained not one thought of her which did lessen my love of Telesile: This Lady was of a most sweet, but melancholy composition, and by consequence could better think upon Telesile when I was with her, then if she had been sprightly, and airy. These visits produced those effects in the mind of my father, which I expected; for now he thought I had quite forgotten Telesile, since I was in love with Pheretime, for so was her name. But since he did not approve of this second choice, no better then of the first because though Pheretime was of a noble family, yet not so illustrious as he expected, therefore he resolved to return unto Delphos: But although this harm[less] dissimulation wrought good effects upon my father, yet they produced bad ones upon Tellesile, who, as I came afterwards to know, was informed by the means of Androclides, she not knowing it came from him, that I was deeply engaged with Pheretime: so that when I returned unto Delphos, I found an alteration in her mind; and I understood by Melesander, that for this fifteen dayes she could not endure to hear him talk of me as she was accustomed: Diophantes also seemed to be changed as well as she; for knowing that my father was averse to any alliance with him, his mind was much angered, so that for some certain dayes, I was as miserable as any lover could be in the presence of the party loved: but at the last finding an handsome opportunity to speak unto her; What have I done Madam, (said I unto her) has absence removed me out of your heart? are you culpable of the weakness which I have heard you condemn? Thimocrates, said she unto me, charge not me with your own crimes, be contented that Telesile does not complain of you, not but that she hath sufficient cause for it, but she will not because she is generous: Therefore, (said she with a forced sigh) fear not, that my upbraidings of you shall molest that delight which you take in thinking upon Pheretime. Pheretime? (said I in much amazement, and understanding then the cause of her alteration,) Ah Madam, you do not know me, you do not know her, nor do you know your self, if you can believe that I can think upon her when I see you: I ever thought upon you Madam, when I saw Pheretime, nor did I ever think upon her since I came to Delphos: Oh Heavens, and most unjust Lady, said I unto her, If he has wronged me, who must I require satisfaction from? for I never saw Pheretime, but only to that end I might the sooner return unto Delphos, and see Telesile: Then did I most sincerely relate all the passage unto her; afterwards I beseeched her to tell me who was her informer of this false news: And after much praying pressing, conjuring, and importuning Telesile, she named the person who informed her, and is appeared to be an especial friend unto Androclides. In the mean time, as my heart was innocent and faithful, and all my speeches unto her most true, I made my peace with Telesile, inasmuch as she did not at all suspect my constancy: but yet she was very angry with her self for seeming so jealous of me, which was the reason that I did not find her soul so free and quiet as it was wont to be; however I thought my self extremely happy, and I told Diophantes that I did not deserve to be punished for that obstacle which my father did intend unto my designe. Now was there nothing which vexed me, but that against my heart I must not visit Telesile so often, lest my father should again send me away, as formerly he did; but although I did not go any more unto her house, yet I did meet her in other places, and saw her almost every day; I did several times move her unto marriage without the consent of my father; but she was so noble and discreet, that she would not permit it, and told that DiophantesPage 33 her father would be against it as well as she, therefore she thought it the best course to wait patiently and quietly until the heart of my father altered: but I enjoyed not this calm very long, for by some fantastical humour of Fate or other, we were almost continually separated: one while a friend of mine had a quarrel; and I in point of honour must be his second, which caused me to flee from Delphos: another while Diophantes was sick in the Countrey, and Tellesile was with him: sometimes absences did arise without any reason or ground in the world, as if Fortune had no other designe but to persecute some long absences, some short ones, some premeditated, some upon a sudden: I no sooner came unto Delphos, but went out of it; and she no sooner returned but I went out: And it may be truly said, that I never parted from her, but some misfortune or other fell out: There was continually some little quarrel or other between us, which absence was the cause of: and I remember one day, I was so fantastical as to complain that I found her always too fair at my returns: for said I unto her, my adored Telesile, if my absence should trouble you, as yours does me, I should find the freshness of your fair complexion look more pale upon it, and should see some signes of melancholy in your sprightly eyes, which would make me extremely glad; whereas on the contrary I see a joy which disquiets me, fearing that my return is not the only cause of it. In a word, I had as much trial of absence in all its kinds, as ever man had, and suffered as deeply as any Lover could do. But whether I was absent out of any advantageous reason, or by reason of any angry accident, my soul was never sensible either of joy or sorrow, which those several causes might have moved: nor did I apprehend any other motions in my soul then such as love only was cause of: After then a months absence, and a hundred thousand sorrows, I returned to Delphos, where I understood that Atalia the Sister of Androclides, and wife of Crantor, was dead, in child-bed of a Son, and that the Son also died a few dayes after the mother: so that Telesile was in greater hopes then ever, to be the richest fortune in all Greece: for it seems that Crantor repented of his marriage, and was not at all pleased with Atalia: so that now my father could not upbraid me with the small portion of Telesile any longer, but thought me most happy in my choice: For my part I could never suspect that she would suffer the change of her fortune to change her mind, but I feared that Diophantes would to my prejudice take exceptions against my father; so that to make the more haste, I went with post-speed unto a house which my father had, about two dayes journey from Delphos, where then I was, with intentions to acquaint him with my affection unto Tellesile, but as ill luck was, I could not find him there, but must wait eight dayes before his return: for the men he left at home, knew only when he would return, but not whither he was gone: At his return, I did acquaint him with my business, and received an answer according unto my hopes, so that I returned unto Delphos the most satisfied man in the world. I understood also when I came there, that Crantor was suddenly dead; so that after I had first been at mine own lodging, to put my self in a condition first to appear before Telesile, I went unto her, but I was infinitely amazed to find almost all the Town there, and most especially all my old Rivals, in the first rank of whom was Androclides: yet notwithstanding since the condition of Diophantes deserved so much civility, upon such an occasion of mourning, I perswaded my self that it was the business unto him, and not to her, who I thought they durst never be so impudent as to speak unto after so much business, but I was much deceived in my conjectures, for as soon as the first dayes of ceremonious mourning were past; Telesile was importuned by all those who had before unworthily rejected her, and by some also who never thought upon her before.

Then did I engage Melesander to speak unto Diophantes, and tell him that he might very well make a difference, between me and the rest of Telesiles pretenders: but whether because now the choice being in him, he would not be too hasty, or because he intended a revenge upon my Father, he returned him a very cold answer, and would not give any consent, but rather put into dispaire: yet had I so much consolation as to find no alteration at all in Tellesile, but saw her scorn all those whom her Fortunes rather then her beauty, had invited thither: Yet, as if Fortune would have it, there came at that time to Delphes a man of great quality, called Menecrates, who had been long in Travel, and at his returne fell in love with Telesile, who having share in the crimes of the rest, troubled me very much: for he was handsome; of an illustrious Family, and his fortunes very Noble: yet notwithstanding, Telesile did behave her self so wisely, that the very sight of her did dissipate all my fears, and gave me so much freedom of spirit, as to laugh at the dissembled actions of all these unworthy lovers, Page 34 who were so much ashamed, and whose spirits were so dejected, that they durst hardly speak: but yet they waited upon her, and visited her whether she would or no: as for Androclides, he went more prudently to work, for he laboured more to gain Diophantes the Father, then to appease the displeasure of the daughter. I know not what means he used, but I was told that he had so insinuated himself into the favour of the Father, that there was great likely-hoods he should shortly be the husband of the daughter. I went immediately unto her, in hopes to qualifie my fears, and to receive some fresh testimony of affection from her which might confirm me: but I found Androclides there, who being more confident by reason of his hopes in Diophantes, did speak unto her concerning his passion more openly then he did before the death of Crantor. When I understood below, that he was alone with her, I went up in all haste, and as soon as I came unto the Chamber door, stayed there, not well knowing whether I should enter, or harken; but the door being open, and the hangings hiding me, I stayed to hear their discourse, and heard Telesile say in a sharp tone: No Androclides, deceive not your self, It is not I who ought to recompence you for all your cares and services: for it is not Telesile whom you loved, nor who loves you, and therefore she is not at all obliged unto you. When I heard this well-pleasing discourse, I confess I resolved not to enter so soon; and indeed I could never prefer any thing, above the sight of her I loved before this time. Then I heard Androclides tell her, that he valued not the Treasures of Crantor, but only for the love of her: Rather say for the love of your self, replied Telesile, and know, that though you should employ all your life in perswading me, that you love me, I should not believe it: No, no, Androclides, I value not my self so low, as to accept of half a heart; a heart which has doted upon that which is unworthy to be put in the balance with Telesile, and is the object only of base souls: Indeed I should sooner pardon one that is unconstant, who should reject me for one that is fairer then my self, then I would a covetous wretch, who rejects me, because I am not rich enough for his pallat: for confess the truth (said she unto him,) if I should be so foolish as to marry you, and should afterwards by any cross accidents lose all those things which are the basis of your affection; that I should have neither any Lands, nor Jewels, nor any houses or household-stuff, but that Telesile should be without any of these charms which you value most; confess the truth, I say Androclides, would you love her still? Doubtless I should, answered he in much amazement: I cannot believe it, (answered she) but Androclides, I will let you see that I am not guilty of that crime with which you tax me, and that it is not the present condition of my Fortune, which moves me to speak so violently, know therefore—

When Telesile said so, I confess my heart began to beat, and I made such a noise behind the hangings, as I might well have been heard, if Telesile had not been in passionate choller, and Androclides amazed. But after I was quietly settled I heard her pursue her discourse; Know therefore (said she) that it is not the alteration in my fortunes which moves me to treat you as I doe; and though I were in the same condition I was within this Month, yet should I not pardon you for what you have done, for truly I can never marry any man but such an one as I esteem, and I cannot esteem that man, wheloves me only for what I have, and for such things as are below my self. Telesile had no sooner said this, but I fearing lest Androclides should by his submissions mollifie her, did hastily enter into her chamber; and so amazed my Rival, that he could not handsomely recollect himself: Since what I had heard did fill my heart with joy, my company, if I dare say it, was more pleasant unto her, then Androclides, for since he never loved her, but for ends; his resentments of her scorn, was more gross, and his sorrows more apparent: his base behaviour before, also struck him dumb, and did captivate his spirits: for my part, I did imagin that I lead him all that day in Triumph: presently after, there came in many Ladies, and in the general discourse, I spoke many stinging words concerning Androclides, and he answered me in such a language, in which he designed the like unto me, but knew not how, for he could not upbraid me with any thing, although I rubbed up a hundred several truths which were very unpleasant unto him. Telesile took great delight to see me quip him in that manner; yet as she was very prudent, so she did divers times divert the discourse, fearing it might come to a sharper business: Not that she thought I would be so uncivil as to quarrel with Androclides in that place; but because she imagined he would be easily nettled, since he was so culpable, and that the wittiest and sinest kind of Raillery, would incense him to become furious: and truly it was a difficult matter for me, in spite of all generosity, not to insult upon any unfortunate Rival that day. In going from Telesile, he went to Diophantes, who was walking towards the Castalian Fountain: so that when I returned home, I understood by Melesander, that my Rival was with the Father of my Mistris, and Page 35 I understood the next morning, that Diophantes, more valuing the great estate of Androclides, then his rejecting of Telesile, and perhaps excusing his inclination by his own, did absolutely command his daughter to look better upon Androclides; for indeed he was fully resolved, she should either marry him or Menecrates, I came to know thus much by one of her women, which Melesander helped me unto, who heard all the discourse between Diophantes, and Telesile: So that all the hopes and consolation which I had was only in Telesile, who I knew very well did scorn Androclides, and did not love Menecrates, nor did she hate me: All I feared was her great virtue, which perchance would not contradict the commands of her Father: for that woman which told me what Diophantes had said unto his daughter, did not tell me what answer Telesile returned, saying that they spoke so low, she could not understand it: I being then in this condition went one evening unto Melesander to consult with him, what was the best remedy against such a disaster: his servants told me that he was gone out to walk in a great Meadow behind the Temple of the Muses, there I went also, but in sieu of finding my friend. I found Androclides walking all alone: The servants of Melesander told me so confidently that their Master would be there, and it being something dark, I also being prejudicated, mistook him, and thought him to be Melesander, so that coming close to him, Must Telesile, said I unto him, be continually troubled with the covetous Androclides? Androclides (answered he, and knowing me by my voyce) will continually persecute Telesile, though it were to no other end but to persecute Thimocrates; and Thimocrates (answered I, being extreemly surprized at my mistake) will quickly rid her both of her persecutors and mine, when I shall please; In saying so, I layd my hand upon my sword: and Androclides without loss of time, drawing his, and I mine after him, he fell feircely upon me, pronouncing some words undistinctly which I could not understand: I shall not stand to particularize a Combate which was without witnesses, but leave you to judg by the event, at what I did: Androclides, was doubtless both gallant and well skilled, so that if I had not been more fortunate then he, at this bout doubtless I had been vanquished: yet the fight was not long, for being run through the body he fell, reeling as far as a little gate of the Temple, which was never used, but upon certain days of Sacrifice: I went unto him, thinking he was only wounded, and moving him to acknowledg the advantage, I found he was without more motion, or any appearance of life: yet in point of generosity I would try whether there was any way of help unto him, whilst Menecrates passed by, being waited upon by some servants, and since the Moon shined very clear, he perceived the glittering of my Sword at the gate of the Temple; and knowing it was no place for any such business, he came straight unto me, but when I perceived several men, I retired in all hast, not being known by them, though Menecrates caused some of his servants to follow me: but he remained with Androclides, whom he knew, and though he was his Rival, yet took care of him. Some sacrificers hearing a noyse ran thither, and were much amazed at the prophanation, for the place where we fought was sacred ground, and the gate of the Temple was all blood. They carried this Corps unto the next house, where he shewed some signs of life, in so much as by virtue of some spirits, he recovered speech, and told all the truth unto Menecrates, and so by consequence my act was made known unto all my Rivals by two malevolent witnesses. Androclides knowing that now Thimocrates had spoiled his hopes of Telesile, would not besmear him with a lye: Menecrates thinking himself obliged unto me for ridding him of a terrible Rival whom Diophantes preferred before all the rest, would make me a recompence by his sincerity: yet however, the Combate caused a great neyse about the Town: the place where he was wounded did aggravate the crime: The Bithian made loud complaints, the people of Delphos said it was an ill passage: and since Androclides was dead, which was the next day, I knew there was no safety for me in the Town. Presently after the Combate, I retired unto Melesander, who the same night conveyed me unto the house of a friend, where in all likelihood they would not search for me: It is not an easie matter to relate unto you my sorrows upon this occasion: for when I considered how I must leave Telesile, in a time when Diophantes would infallibly marry her, and in a time when she had a Thousand servants, I wished with all my heart, that Androclides were alive againe: And if I had killed the dearest friend upon Earth, I could not have greaved more, then I did for the killing of my Rival: Telesile was extreemly sad at it: and both by her natural goodness, and many other signs, she testified as much: In the mean while, I am prosecuted and fought after: and all the endeavours of my Father to qualifie the matter were in vain: All he could do, was to protract the matter, and keep them from pronouncing speedy Condemnation: since the Councel of the Amphictions did not sit. Page 36 I had less protection, then if they had: At the last, the sentence was, that I should be banished for three years, and not to return into any part of Phocides upon pain of death: This sentence of Grace, was indeed to me a sentence of death: for when I considered what joy my Rivall would apprehend; how much my banishment made for them, and how I had ruined my self, my reason was so confounded, that I was not master of my own thoughts: I told Melesander that I would not go out of Delphos, but remain still concealed, and indeed I stayed then above a month after my condemnation; during which time I understood that my Rivals were every day with Telesile, nor could I blame her, since she could not avoid them: and though I understood by Melesander that she was exceeding sensible of my misfortune, which she out of her goodness was pleased to call hers, yet I could not endure to be deprived of her sight: In the mean time, I was in danger to be taken three or four times, and I was forced to change the place of my retreat above six times, because Melesander and I were informed that it was discovered where I was: nor was it either strange or difficult, for all my Rivals were spies unto them which prosecuted against me: So that Telesile not liking that I should expose my self unto so much danger for her, did write a Letter unto me, by which she absolutely commanded me to depart not only out of Delphos and Phocides, but also out of Greece. Since I did lie concealed I had written very often unto her, but did receive no answer: after I had read her Letter, I answered her, that since it was her pleasure I should depart, I beseeched to permit me the sight of her, and to bid her adieu: Melesander did all he could to hinder me from asking such a favour as might so much endanger me, and which perhaps Telesile would not consent unto; but I did peremptorily tell him, that I would never out of Delphos until I had spoken with her. This faithful friend then went unto her, and told her my full resolution: she was extreemly angry: she told Melesander, that my affection unto her was inconsiderate: that her honour was not deare unto me: that I was not reasonable, and that I asked such a thing which she ought not to consent unto; and therefore she protested that she was resolute, and would not upon any terms allow it; but, said Melesander unto her, were it not better to suffer it, then to suffer them to find out Thimocrates, and put him to death? Ah Melesander (said she unto him) you are no less unreasonable then your friend, to press me unto that which I will not do, and to urge me unto it against my mind: At the last, after a long contest, she told him, that so he would contrive a way, which would not any way expose me unto danger, and which would be handsome for her, she would see me, though (said she) it be to ground me in my obstinacy: Melesander then bethinking himself, proposed unto her, to make a visit unto one of his cousins, as formerly she used to do, who was one of great merit and virtue, unto whom he would bring me the night before she came thither. But (said she unto him) what wil your cousin think? what wil your self think? & what wil Thimocrates think? No, no, Melesander, I cannot, I cannot consent unto such a meeting; and indeed he could not that day perswade her. But the next day, I was in such danger to be taken, that I was glad to take a new Sanctuary, and she fearing to be the cause of my death, it moved her to consent to see me at Melesanders cousins, provided that she and he would be present at our discourse. I cannot express the joy I then apprehended when I heard I was to see Telesile, though it was only to bid her adieu. But in short, I was that night carried unto Melesanders cousin, where my adored Telesile should meet me the next morning, waited upon only by that woman, who was my confident: It is not easie for me to describe how this visit did go against the hair of her disposition, and against that precise virtue whereof she made profession: she came unto the chamber, where I was alone with Melesander, and her cousin, as if she had committed a great crime in coming, and addressing her self unto her, What wil you think of me, (said she unto her,) for coming to you with resolutions to quarrel with your friends? I should think (answered she, for we had told her all the business) that you would have been most inhumane, if you had exposed so precious a life as that of Thimocrates unto danger. Madam, (said I then, not giving her time to answer) I most humbly beseech you pardon the trouble I have put you unto, and beleve that if I could possibly have done otherwise, I should not have forced your inclination so far. After this we all sat down, and discoursed a long time of the misfortune which had faln upon me, and of the resolute obstinacy of my enemies in prosecuting against me, since Telesile would not permit me any privacy with her: But some or other desiring to speak with Melesanders Cousin about some important business, she desired Telesile to excuse her a little while, and when she had spoken with this party in another chamber she would return unto her again: so that without neglecting this opportunity, whilst Melesander went unto the window with a woman which accompanied his cousin; Madam, said I, are you then resolved upon my departure, and that I must absent my self from you without any knowledg whether you will honour Thimocrates with any remembrance Page 37 of him? But Madam, he is not able to depart upon such conditions: The affection he bears unto you is too violent to endure it: and if you be not pleased of your goodness to give him some obliging hopes, to comfort him in his absence, he will not depart at all. I shall tell you, for your satisfaction, replied Telesile, that I do much lament your misfortune, and am so sorry that I should be the cause of it, as that your absence will much grieve me, and I shall heartily wish and long for your return.

This is much Madam, (said I unto her in a most respectful manner) but it is not enough to preserve the life of a man who must be an age from you. I know not (said she) whether this which I say unto you be enough for you, but I am perswaded Thimocrates, that it is a little too much for me, yet I do not repent of what I said, (said she smiling) but if you please I will repeat it again. Not to trouble you with any repetitions of what you said already Madam, (said I unto her) I beseech you speak something more then yet you have. What would you have me say? (said she.) I desire (replied I) that my adored Telesile will assure me, that my absence shall not root me out of her heart, and that neither Menecrates, or any other of my Rivals, shall supplant me, and take possession of it. I promise you, replied she, to satisfie you in your first scruple, and permit you to hope that none of the rest shall prejudice you, without any fears of being deceived: For indeed Thimocrates, I have so bad an opinion of all men, that I wonder how you come to be so much in my opinion: You laden me with honours and delight (said I unto her) but Madam, notwithstanding all these sweet and gracious favours you are pleased to consent unto, I am afraid of your virtue, I fear that when Diophantes moves you to marry Menecrates, I fear, I say, that absent Thimocrates has no such prevalency in your heart, as to hinder your obedience. Thimocrates, said she then unto me, me thinks you may be very well contented with what I have already said, without forcing me as you do to give a more rigid answer. Ah Madam, (said I unto her being extreemly transported with sorrow) I understand you too well, I see you will not chuse Menecrates, but you will accept of him if it be the pleasure of Diophantes. If he will absolutely have it so, replied she, doubtless I shall obey him. Since it is so, said I unto her, I need not think any more of my departure from Delphos: But I will stay, Madam, I am resolved upon it, and say what you will unto me, I will never leave you in such a cruel uncertainty: But Thimocrates, said she, you have lost your reason in speaking as you do. But inhumane Telesile, replied I, you have lost your goodness in answering me as you do. For what would you have that man who infinitely adores you, do? who when he is gone, leaves you in a mind to marry him, whom of all the rest of my Rivals, Diophantes intends to propose unto you? from whence can I have any consolation, cruel Lady, during so long and rigid an absence? Can I ever contemplate your beauty? without thinking, that perhaps it is the felicity of Menecrates, not mine, to enjoy it? Can I with any delight remember that sweetness which has several times proceeded from you, since I am in fears that you will be eternally severe unto me? Can I with any satisfaction think upon these favourable words which I hear, when I do imagine, that perhaps I shall never hear any more? Indeed Madam, is it possible I should live at a distance from you, in such uncertainties? No, no, indeed I cannot; and I had much rather die before your eyes, and by the hands of mine enemies, then to go upon any such terms. But Thimocrates, said she unto me, what is it which you desire? I do not desire Madam, said I unto her, that you should promise the unfortunate Thimocrates to marry him: I only desire, that you would assure him not to marry either Menecrates, nor any else during my absence. You insist upon good security (said she unto him smiling, notwithstanding the melancholy of her eyes;) But yet Thimocrates, all that I can say unto you is, that I will endeavour as far as any handsomness will permit me, to break off my fathers designs in marrying me unto you; but to promise you that I will so far dishonour my selfe as openly to disobey my father, is a thing which I cannot do: and perhaps (said she almost against her intentions) if you shall render your self worthy of it by your obedience, I shall do more then I will promise you; but indeed Thimocrates, (said this virtuous Lady) we must not merit our misfortunes through our own imbecilities, nor trust too much unto humane prudence, but leave something unto the conduct of the Gods, who in spire of all our endeavours will bring us unto that pass they would have us: I do confess that considering the manner wherein Telesile expressed her self, I had good reason to be contented, although I was not; but I did so violently press her father, that she was ready to leave me in an anger, seeing I would not depart, unless she promised me all that I desired: She then called Melesander to her relief, and his Cousin also, who just then returned unto us; and do what I could, it was not possible for me to obtain any further from her: Then she did command me so peremptorily to depart as soon as I could, that at last I resolved upon it: Page 38 Melesander put me into some hopes, that as soon as I was gone they would endeavour to procure a revocation of the Sentence: but for all that, I was so dismally desperate at my departure, that I was not capable of any consolation. Mean time Telesile left me, before I could speak one word more unto her, for when I perceived by her actions that she intended to be gone, my reason left me, and I neither knew what she said unto me, nor what I my self did; I knew only that she held out her hand unto me, which I in all humility and respect did kiss, and then she immediately vanished out of sight; so that being in no hopes to see Telesile any more, I thought upon nothing but my departure, I had a good mind first to fight with Menecrates, but Melesander dissuaded me, saying, that since Telesile had so many lovers, it would be an everlasting fatal piece of work to kill them all. In conclusion, within two days after this interview, I departed with Leontides, who is here at this present, whom the King of Cyprus had then sent unto Delphos; & who returned at that time: Since all Countrys where Telesile was not, were indifferent unto me, I followed Leontides, and resolved to wander through all the Islands of the Aegian Sea, as I did, until the King of Cyprus & the Prince Philoxipes, did me the honour to give me the Command of their Troops with Philocles: you may very well imagine then, that this last absence was infinitely horrid unto me, because it was to be a long one, Menecrates, as I understood, and an hundred other fresh servants since I came from Delphos, are continually courting Telesile; Diophantes perpetually moves her to make choise of an hus|band: Menecrates is a most compleat man: my enemies are continually more and more hot against me: and all my Rivals solicit secretly, to prevent any revocation of my sentence; for reports went that I only was the cause which moved Telesile to deny them in their suits: so that I have no foundation to ground any certainties upon; although Telesile be not yet mar|ried, yet I know not what she may do, since she only afforded me some hopes: and therefore I have great reason to fear, that either her weakness or her virtue will render me most miserable, either by her obedience unto her father, or by suffering her self to be wooon by Menecrates: See hear, O my most equitable Jugg, what experience I have had of all those horrid rig|gours in being absent from the party loved: and it will be no difficulty to make it appear unto you, by reason as well as by example, that absence is such an evil as incomprehends all the rest. Indeed, as love has its beginning by sight, and is continually kept alive by the same, so it must necessarily follow, that absence is that which is most opposite unto it. And as nothing is more delightful then the sight of her one loves, so nothing is more cruel then not to see her; short absences augment love, but long ones turn it into furie and despair: when a determinate time is limited, then impatency until that time is expired will admit of no rest: and when there is no certainty how long the absence shall continue; melancholy does damp all the sweets of any hope: and indeed, whether it be long, or short, terminate, or without limits, I am most con|fident that whosoever knows how to love, they are most insupportable unto him, and will maintain, that absence comprehends all other evils, and is most sensible of all manner of sor|rows. He who does maintain that not to be loved, is the greatest torment of love, is much in the wron*, and cannot compare his sufferings unto mine: since to speak of things in gene|ral, he who finds a scorn upon all his services, ought to use the like scorn as a remedy for it, and by a generous resentment may cure himself of his unaccepted passion: But a lover who is loved, and absent from her he loves, he can do nothing else but suffer; for to think that re|embrance of past favours is sweet, is an error: in love when one is absent, since sorrow is all the felicity he can enjoy as long as he is absent. He who mourns for the death of his Mi|stress is doubtless worthy of compassion: but yet there is a notable difference betwixt him, and a lover that is absent: The greatest evil in death is only the absence of the beloved object, and I dare boldly say, that after the first great blow has wrought its first effect, the soul finding it self in a condition of neither any hopes or fears, does by little and little return unto it selfe again, and will be in such a calm as shall insensibly appease all the tumults of his passion, and sweaten those bitter sorrows which at first he endured: But absence, when hopes, and fears, and all other passions, are tumultuously active, is a punishment which every day augments it self, and can find no remedy, but its own end, or the end of him that endures it: yet per|haps it will be objected, That jealousy has an horror above absence: But I answer by way of Question unto those that say so, Who is he that ever was long absent but he was jealous also? and what effects can jealousy produce, which absence does not the like? yet notwithstanding this difference may be put between them, that a jealous man who sees his Mistress, enjoys some happy minutes which he who sees her not cannot obtain: and also there is a great distinction to be made, between a sorrow which bottomed only upon a phantacie, and a sor|row which reason does uphold and authorize. A jealous man who is with his Mistress, al|though Page 39 he be unfortunate, yet doubtless has some pleasing minutes, either in crossing the designs of his Rival, or contemplating upon revenge, or in discovery of some intricate business which he desires to know; and although these delights are not full of tranquility, yet they are delights: but an absent Lover is so extreemly miserable, that he cannot find a delectation in any thing; and therefore O my equitable Jugg, since I have had such experimental trials of all the miseries in absence, and am the most unfortunate of all Lovers, I deserve the greatest share in your compassion.

Thimocrates had no sooner ended, but Martesia turned towards Cyrus, and asked him what he thought of his Story and Reasons: and Cyrus answering as he thought. In truth, (said he sighing) you were unjust if you should deny Thimocrates that compassion which he de|mands; for his discourse has so sensibly moved me, that I know not how to express my self. Sir (answered she unto him) Thimocrates obtains from me what he desires, for I could ne|ver know a gallant man miserable, but I did sensibly interest my self in his sorrows. Bestow not all your compassion upon him, I beseech you, (said Philocles) but reserve a share for me. For my part (said the Prince Artibies) I must only desire to be lamented, since my misfortune is so great, that whosoever knows it must needs do so much for me. I know not, (said Leontidas) whether I shall lament or no: but I am sure there is no comparisons betwixt the mis|eries which I endure, and those which Thimocrates complains of. You must give me leave to make a doubt of that, replied the absent Lover. Before any judgment can be given (said Ere|nice) we must understand all your misfortunes. And to understand them (said Aglatidas) we must give over discourse, and hearken unto them. 'Tis true, replied Martesia, but since Thimocrates spoke the first concerning Philocles, who maintains that not to be loved, is the great|est misery in love, and afterwards he answered unto what the Prince Artibies said, who thinks the most severe punishment of his passion to be the death of her he loves; and since he named Leontidas the last, who thinks jealousy the greatest torture of all; I think Sir, said she, and looked upon Cyrus, that it is not amiss to follow that order, and that Philocles speak the first, of these three which remain: Cyrus approving of her opinion, and Philocles sitting over al|gainst Martesia, who was to be Jugg, he began thus.

The second History of the Lover not loved.

Since you do know the Conclusion of my Adventure, before I acquaint you with the be|ginning, or the Sequel; and since by consequence, that pleasing suspention which makes a dis|asterous Story harkened unto with delight, is not to be found in my Story. I therefore conceive it fit not to abuse your patience with any long Relation: I will only acquaint you, that although I was born a Subject unto the King of Cyprus, yet my family was originally from Corinth, and that I had honour to be allied unto the wise Periander, who at this day is their So|veraign. I had no sooner attained my sixteenth year, but my father sent me unto that Court, unto an Uncle I had there, and under the tuition of a Governour, with intentions I should re|m|ain there; for since he had then many children, he was very desirous to keep up his name in his ancient Country, which was then ready to extinguish, there being none of that name left but only my Uncle, who was very old; I will not go about to describe famous Corinth unto you; for I speak before so many understanding Auditors, who are so well informed of every thing which is worthy of knowledg, that it would be in vain for me to discourse of the beauty, magnificence, and splendor of it: There are none here I am sure which hath not heard of that famous Isthmos, which is so well known unto all the world: and of that stately Castle which commands that goodly Town, and defends it: also of that great and convenient Port, which do infinitely adorn it, and of the huge Commerce which continually does fill it, making it superfluously rich in all abundance of delights, and whatsoever can be imagined to render a place delectible, is to be found there: The Prince who governs it is a man of a most high soul, the Queen his wife, called Melissa, is also admirable fair, and has a daughter, who without all contradiction is the fairest, and most accomplished Lady in the world. This was the State of the House Royal when I came to Corinth; Periander also had a Son, but he was at Epil|daurus with his Grandfather by the mothers side, who was Prince there: so that all Court divertisements did flow from Melissa, and the Princess Cleobuline her daughter: and I must needs say, that if there were any disposition in me to goodness, I was in such a place as I must needs advantage my self: For the Court of Periander was always full of the greatest men in all Greece, and it was his Generosity to honour strangers so much, that his Palace was conti|nually full of men of several Countreys: But since I was not yet arrived unto such an age, as Page 40 required the conversation of the wisest, and most knowing men; I betook my self rather unto such things as might divert me, then unto such as might instruct me. The famous Arion, whose melodious voice, tuned to the ravishing Aires of his warbling Harp, which made him so fa|mous throughout the world, was both my Master, and my friend: my inclination was so in|t|ent upon musick; that in lieu of making it my diversion, it was almost my profession: and in|deed my Governour would sometimes chide me for being too serious upon it only, though in it self it was a commendable quality. I then began to participate of other divertisements, and the famous Thespis being come unto Corinth, I was charmed with his Posies, and witty Com|medies. So that as I had learned to sing a little with Arion, I became a Poet with Thespis, there being a Genius in me which prompt me unto it: Pictures also moved my disposition that I practised to limbe, and without being excellent in any thing, I did almost know every thing. Thus did I recreate my self until it pleased love did disturb my delights, by the very same thing in which I so long time delighted: and see how the misfortune came to pass. Cleobulus one of the wise men of Greece, and Prince of Lindus, sent unto Periander concerning some im|portant Affair: but his Agent dying at Corinth, I was made choice of to go unto Cleobulus, (for I had now attained unto twenty years of age,) and since this Prince had one daughter called Eumetes, whom the people called Clobuline, after her father, though her name was not so, and since it was the same with the Illustrious Daughter of Periander, I confess that I was much pleased with the voyage, and because I had a great desire to be known unto the Princess of Lindus, of whom I had heard spoken so much, both of virtue, and spirit, and since I had no business at Corinth, I was very glad to depart: and since the Princess Cleobuline did esteem me much above my deserts, and held a great correspondency with that excellent Lady unto whom I went, by reason of their sutableness in their spirits and humour, she did me the honour to send a Letter unto her by me, to the end I might be the more acceptable unto her; and since this flattering and obliging Letter was the cause of my love; And I have so perfect|ly remembred it, that I believe I shall not alter a word in relating it unto you: though I must needs blush in telling it, to make you the better understand the beginning of my passion: And thus it was.

The Princess CLEOBULINE, unto the Princess EUMETIS.

What share soever I shall participate in that joy, which Philocles goes to receive in|set|ting you, and in that happiness which his acquaintance will bring unto you; I know very well that I am neither friend nor Cousin to prefer the interest of another before my own, since I cannot (me thinks) sufficiently rejoyce at the delight you will take (in the person of Philocles) to know all that is admirable in Corinth, and that he will find in you all that is il|lustrious in Greece: This petty Jealousie moves me to tell you that which his modesty will questionless conceal: how that besides those essential qualities, which of themselves are enough to make a most compleat man, he is one of Ap|oles best Disciples, and greatest FA|vourite of the Muses, especially of those Muses which are your friends: Move him therefore to im|part those qualities, which he uses to bide from all but such as are like you: Make him shew you his Verses, his Pictures, and his Aires, all of his own composing: I have charged him to bring me back a Character both of your mind, and face; and if you please, let him not steal it against your will, but afford him such convenient time, as he may worthily acquit himself of his Commission which he has received from me: make an exchange with him, some of his Verses, for some of your ingenious Riddles, which you have composed, and which troubles all them that would unfold them. But after all this, remember that I do but lend, not give, this Treasure unto you: Send him therefore generously back, and do not ruine Corinth by re|taining Philocles with you, Since I have discoursed that which perhaps he would have con|cealed: Tell me at his return what progress he hath made in your opinion of him: what in|genious Pieces he has written of you, and how many Conquests he has made amongst your La|dies; for I know him too modest to tell any thing advantageously concerning himself, and too judicious to talk of any thing but you at his return: I could tell you much more concerning him, I will leave it unto you to discover some vertues of his soul, which are more excellent then his wit: After all this, be pleased to consider him as my kinsman, and that you have pro|mised to esteem every thing that is dear unto me: And lastly know that I am your

CLEOBULINE.

Page 41 This Letter so full of flattery being written, the Princess as I came to take my leave of her, told me with as much Gallantry, as Civility, that she had engaged me deeply in many things by her Letter unto the Illustrious Eumetes, but that she was not sorry for it, since she knew I would not pass for one of a prejudicated opinion. Madam, said I unto her, what you tell me makes me afraid, lest intending to favour me, you ruine me. See, said she unto me, shewing me her Letter wh|ch was yet unsealed, whether you will not gallantly perform what I have promised in your behalf. I would then have excused my self, and not have seen it; yet since she absolutely commanded me, I obeyed her: But as soon as I had read seven or eight lines I blush|ed for very shame; and not daring to read any further, Oh Madam, said I unto her, what have you done? and what have I done, that you should in such an ingenious manner do me so bad an office? No no, Madam, (said I, and would have given it back unto her,) I must not carry that which would dishonour me. Yet you may see it at the least, (said she laughing) though it be only to teach you what you ought to do, if you do not agree that can do as I say; and since I refused, she took the Letter, and read it aloud: I confess I was so confounded at it, that I could not chuse but interrupt her; and although prayes be sweet especially unto young men, yet I was extreemly fearful, I could not be able by my presence to make good what the Princess Cleobuline had said of me: But since I did absolutely refuse it, she made use of her absolute Authority to make me take it, and after her Commands to seal it; I must take it, and promise her to deliver it, although I knew it might much prejudice me, since certainly all excessive commendations in new acquaintances is very dangerous, especially unto persons the most accomplished, although it be not an easie matter to resist flattery: So, not well knowing what I should do with this Letter, I took it, and departed with a man of good quality, called Antigones; of the same age with my self, who intended the same voyage, and certainly he was as pleasant company as any in Corinth: we were at that time two intimate friends; we were of the same height, of the same garb, and loved the very same things, and he had a Genius as well as I unto Poetry, Limning, and Musick: If the Princess Cleobuline had known of his journey, doubtless she would have mentioned him in her Letter, for she highly esteemed him; but he concealed his intentions from all the world, not desiring that his father should know whither he went, fearing some considerations of his family should obstruct his curiosity: But Antigones and I embarked together, and arrived at Jalissa, a Town where the Prince Cleobulus did commonly reside. I presented the Packet which I brought from Perilander; I rendred him an account of the business between them, and I presented Antigones unto him, who received him very nobly, and whose name he knew; but so it happened that the Princess his daughter was in the Countrey, two dayes journey from thence, recreating her self in the company of several Ladies, and intending to continue her divertisements for some certain days yet longer. I desired then to take hold of that opportunity, and making it therefore known unto Cleobulus, that I had a Letter unto the Princess Eumetis, and that I was very glad, I durst not offer to depart from him, and carry it unto her: he returned me an answer according to my desires, that it were not just he should deprive his daughter of so much happiness as to receive news from a Princess whom she honoured so much, and that he would not deprive himself (as he said most civilly) of the delight he took in my company by permitting me to go unto her: and therefore he ordered one to take the Letter from my hand, and to give it unto her; and also by the same Messenger he appointed the Princess his daughter to return, being desirous that I should see his Court in all its glory, for he had been a Widower many years. Thus was the business ordered; one came and took the Letter which I had for the Princess, and so she received it by another hand, and not mine: commanding him who carried it, to let her know that I presented it in that manner unto her, by the Command of the Prince her Father. Mean while he pleased to know, that there was a Corinthian Family of men in high repute which dwelt there, the prime man of which house was called Alasis, who had one daughter, whose name was Philista, who the Princess of Lindus had carried with her. This Lady was indeed a most admirable beauty, not that the figure of her face was so regularly composed, but she was young, flaxen haired, fair, of an handsome height, and good garb; she was, as I said before, a most admirable and surprizing beauty: she had a transcendent mind, and her wit was very agreeable unto all company: she then being with Eumetis, when this Letter was presented, after she had read it, she turned towards Philista, and shewing it unto her, See, said she unto her, what the Princess Cleobuline sayes concerning one of her Cousins. Philista having read the letter, In truth Madam, said she unto her, if Philocles be as the Princess Cleobuline has described him, she has good reason to call him a Treasure, and to Page 42 desire his returne quickly. True, said she, but the sooner to restore him unto her, the fair Philista, must cloud some part of her charmes, as it is likely she will, if it be true that resemblance is a cause of love: your discourse Madam (answered Philista) is very obliging and full of flattery: but it is not altogether ill grounded: for if Philocles have as great a desire to see me, as I have to know, it would be a great step unto love, and I do assure you, that if you do not return speedily unto Alissa, my curiosity to see him will much disquiet me, and indeed (said she laughing, for she was of a gay and jocund humour) if he resemble his picture, according to the description of him, he is such a man as I could wish either in the way of a suitable friend, or an accomplished gallant; or an agreeable husband: and questionless, replied the Princess, Philista has all the accomplishments requisite to conquer the heart of as gallant a man as Philocles seems to be, by the relation of the Corinthian Princess: Yet, replied she unto her, it would not be an act of Justice, since he came hither free, to make him return a Captive: and therefore I have a kind of desire not to obey the Prince my Father, who has commanded me to return to morrow: Oh Madam (said Philista then) I beseech you, not drive me into despair; for I am certain that I shall not stay with you, if you do not return, so high is my impatience to be acquainted with such a man as this. Thus did these two Ladies divert themselves, in discoursing of me, as the Princess of Lindus did tell me afterwards. But to keep my self within the limits which I prescribed at the beginning of my discourse, I shall only tell you, how that same day, and the next following, I was the subject of Philista's mirth, who talked of nothing but me, and my name was up continually amongst them, as long as their journey lasted. The woman which waited upon the Princess waged war with Philista about me, and all of them had so great a longing to see me, that I verily beleieve, if I had known of the passages, I should have returned unto Corinth before I saw the Princess of Lindus; at the last she came to Alissa, but it was so very late, by reason of some accident which befell the Coach, that coming first unto Philista's lodging, she would not be set down at it, do what the Princess could, but continued the contest concerning me; Philista, said she unto her at parting, remember that I have entreated you, to hide half your attracting charms tomorrow when you come unto the Palace; then, without giving Philista any time to reply, the Coach went on, and Eumetis went unto the Prince her Father in his closet, whether he was retired, so that I was not then with him, but it was the next day before Antigones and I had the honour to salute her: But the greatest wonder was, that when the Prince Cleobulus, did us the grace to present us unto her the next morning as she was going unto the Temple, and as she passed through a Garden where we were with the Prince her Father, she found such a similitude, and so much conformity between Antigones and me, that not yet knowing our names very perfectly, she doubted which of us two was he, of whom the Princess Cleobuline spoke in her Letter: So that addressing her self unto us with a complement which obliged us both, she asked me, whether I was he of whom the Princess Cleobuline had spoke unto her in her Letter; Yes Madam (said I unto her) I beleieve it is, for she knew not that Antigones was to come thither; then did she redouble her civilities; and Antigones making it known by his garb, that he was not one of a mean quality, we both waited upon her unto the Temple: and in the afternoon we went unto her, and she talked a long time of the Princess Cleobuline, with all testimonies of esteem and amity possible: she asked me whether she was not the most perfect beauty in the world? she enquired of her recreations, and of her employments, and she was pleased to be so civil, as to tell me, whilst Antigones was in discourse with other Ladies, that now she began to know mee, and that she was much puzzled before, to distinguish which of us two Antigones or I, was Philocles. But said she unto me, to punish my self for this fault I would have him go and visit a fair Corinthian we have here amongst us, and try whether she can distinguish you, before she be informed: if she can, I shall then confess I deserve punishment for my error; if not, I shall at least be comforted. I answered unto this, according unto my duty, but she not hearing me, sent to know how Philista did, and why she came not thither that day: he who had this order, having done his message returned, and told her in a low voyce, yet not so low but any might well understand him, that Philista did most humbly thank her for that favour, and that if she had not found her self something ill, she would have honoured her self and waited upon her, but since her glass had that morning perswaded her she was not in a condition to make any conquest, she would therefore try if she could strengthen her self by sleep: The Princess laughing at the answer: certainly (said she, speaking unto a Lady named Stesilea who was next her) Philista is of a most admirable wit: and in a low voyce she told me what her answer was, and what was the cause of it. It is requisite Madam, said Stesilea unto her, that you honour her so far as to go and visit her, and to surprize Page 43 her the more, to carry with you these two strangers. The Princess who thought upon nothing but how to divert her, and knew not that there was any envy between Stesilea, and Philista, (which made her desire she might be seen in her careless dress) consented unto the motion, and they carried Antigones and my self unto this fair Corinthian. But first she spoke much good unto us of her, and we were no less desirous to see her, then she was to see us. As for Antigones she had never so much as heard him named since he came unto lissa, nor had ever seen him, for as I said before, she was not born at Carinith, though her Father was, but she was born at lissa: We followed then, the Coach in which the Princess was, in another; and when we came to the gate, she gave her hand unto Antigones, the more to deceive her, and obliging me to lead Stesilea, and follow her, we found Philista in a dress as if she had been ill indeed, though her complexion and eyes spoke her to be in perfect health: This fair Lady was alone in her chamber, in setting forth her Jewels, as if she intend that night or the next day to go unto some Ball: What Philista (said the Princess unto her) I thought to have found you in bed, and I find you ready to go unto some publique Feast? Pardon me Madam, (said she unto her smiling) you rather find me preparing my self for a war, for you know very well, (said she unto her in a low voyce,) and shewing her all her Diamonds, and Pearls which were upon the Table) that these are the arms which those who have no beauty, must trust unto, upon any important occasion: And behold a good on, (said the Princess, answering her alone) for I have brought you two in Lieu of one Philocles; in saying so, she caused Antigones and me to advance together. But Philista wondering, Madam, said she, that is not possible, since I have much a do to beleieve one such can be found in all the world: No no, (said the Princess, who had forbidden us to let Philista know which was the true Philocles) I must not be so satisfied; I will see whether you who was so much taken with the discription; can know which is the substance: and therefore I will give you two houres time to find out which of these two illustrious strangers, do most resemble the Character which the Princess Cleobuline gave in her Letter to me: you are as well acquainted with the description as I am, and therefore you cannot fail in your Judgment. But Madam, answered Philista, you which would have me find him out, did you do it your self? you shall know that afterwards, replied she, and then sitting between Philista's bed and the fire, she would needs have this beauty placed between Antigones and my self: I do confess, that this Lady did at the first inchant me both with the splendor of her beauty, and by her discourse: I already knew, that she desired to see me, and the message which she had sent did flatter me, and dispose my heart to desire very earnestly that she would not take Antigones for me: and it seems also that Antigones desired to be mistaken, for whom he was not, and we were both of us so mute upon the matter, that to speak truly we did neither of us resemble that Philocles in Cleobulines Letter: But yet (said the Princess then) what think you Philista? which of these two take you to be the man, so accomplished, and universally knowing in all dilectable things, and for whose acquaintance your curiosity did so trouble you? Do you think Madam, replied she, that I dare name him after you? and why would you have me procure an enemy of him, I name not? You do not well consider what you say (replied the Princess) for if you name neither you will offend them both, and the other way you will offend but one. For my part (said Antigones with a troubled spirit) I am certain, that though you should not name me, yet I should not be your enemy: for though I be Philocles, yet I am sure I am not such a one as is Characterized in the Princess of Corinth's Letter, and if I be not Philocles, I should be very injurious to complain, not to be taken for another: No no, said the Princess, I will not suffer you to speak any more, you shall not help Philista to know you, for she has such a discerning wit as vaunts to discover the most close thoughts of a heart: she has seen you, and she has heard you speak, there needs no more: Answer me (said she unto her, by pointing with her hand, which is Philocles; I do not know Madam (said Philista unto her with a most pleasing melancholy) which is the true Philocles, but I know well (said she and turned from me towards Antigones) whom I wish were he. You do well to wish (replied the Princess ravished that she could not guess right) since you cannot really make him so; and all that he can be for your satisfaction is, that indeed he is worthy to be so: I wish the Gods Madam, replied Antigones with extream joy, that what you say were true: and I wish the Gods, replied Philocles very sadly, that I were not Philocles, but in the room of Antigones: never was seen such a medly of opinions as was in every one in the company: The Princess of Lindus was glad that Philista, had not guessed right, and by consequence was sorry to perceive some melancholy in my eyes: Philista, she was vexed that the name of Antigones was not Philocles, and that she might be twited for being mistaken. Stesilea was very well satisfied that Philista was in the wrong. Page 44 Antigones was ravished with joy, though in respect of me, he would not express it: but for my part I was all confusion and anger: in the mean while these two last named passions, which do not use to contribute any thing to the causes of love, did yet quicken that passion in me: I did not at the first intend to let Philista know, that I was not altogether unworthy to be Philocles, but only in point of honour: yet the truth is, that was too tender a reason to restrain me. Fair Philista (said I unto her with a serious look) you are only mistaken in the name, since most certainly, Antigones is owner of all those qualities mentioned to be in that Philocles, in the Princess of Corinth's Letter. Antigones, replied my friend, who was now become my Rival, is not so much obliged unto this fair Lady, as you imagine: Why so, replied the Princess? The reason is Madam, replied he, because she does not positively say, that she thinks me to be Philocles, she is only pleased to wish I were so. That seems unto me the more obliging (said Stesilea) for if she had only said, she thought you to be him, it had been barely a mark of her esteem; but since she bestows an advantageous wish upon you, it is an evident signe of her inclination towards him. You need not take so much pains (said Philista, smiling) as to interpret my thoughts in my presence; for if any do make any doubt of them, I shall my self expound them. No Madam, said I unto her, I beseech you interpret them no further, lest Antigones die for joy, and I for sorrow; if you should express more marks of your inclination to him, and if I should perceive any further aversion in you towards the true Philocles.

Philista, hearing me say so, would have expressed her self unto me in some civil language, thereby to make her peace with me: but the more she desired to speak, the more she was gruelled. For seeing how much she had already obliged Antigones, she had no mind to disingage him, so that since she could not handsomly deliver her self, nor keep within that just mediocrity she endeavoured, the Princess and Stesilea laughed, and were exceedingly delighted in observing her disorder: and she perceiving it. I see Madam, said she unto her, that you jeer me, because I would engage two in lieu of one. But yet be pleased to know (said she very angrily) that though Antigones is not Philocles unto all the rest of the world, yet he shall be so unto Philista. And I am very much deceived, if (though he should not have all those qualities which the Princess of Corinth's Letter does attribute unto the right Philocles) my conversation with him, do not in a little time infuse them all into him. I stand in great need of it then Madam, (said Antigones unto her,) and that it is the greatest honour I can pretend unto; You are already so close, said I unto him, that I shall hardly know you any longer. But not to abuse your patience any longer, thus did that day pass away, and after we had waited upon the Princess unto her Chamber, Antigones and I went into ours, for they joynd close together, but both of us retired, and not a word passed betwixt us at parting: and afterwards he coming into my Chamber, and silently sitting down: Doubtless, Antigones, said I unto him, you are musing upon your own honour. I am thinking, said he, what I shall do to support that great Name which the fair Philista has bestowed upon me. And do not you, (said he unto me laughing) pity me, to see me thus charged, and will not you infuse some of your excellent qualities into me, that I may thereby save the honour of Philista? Philista, said I unto him, does know your merits so well, and perhaps has made a Conquest upon your heart, that I know not why I should pity you: and Philocles stands more in need of the help of Antigones, then Antigones of his: I would by this discourse have moved my friend to have discovered his thoughts unto me, but he would not: so that I making him my example, I spoke no more unto him concerning Philista. In the mean time, I beseech you take notice, and admire at the phantastical honour of my fate.

As Philista was a Lady of honour, and a little humourish, she was so vexed to be so mistaken, that she did really entertain an aversion to me, and resolved to set such a value upon the qualities of Antigones, that if he had been one of her ancientest friends, she could not more deeply interest her self in his honour then she did: and I believe also that her own natural inclination did bias that way. That which was the greatest cause of her spight, was, that when she turned towards Antigones, and named him, she was verily perswaded out of her subtlety that it was Philocles, and therefore she did confidently fix upon him: for since she understood I did sing well; she set her self to observe both our voices as we spake, and finding that the tone of Antigones was more sweet then mine, she thought he had been Philocles, though what both of us spoke were the very same words: yet for all this, I did oftentimes applaud this beauty; and since all the Court was acquainted with this accident, every one did contend against her, which did so much exasperate her phantastical Resolution, that she could not endure to hear any speak well of me; not but that she made a shew, as if what she did was only out of her Gallantry; but the truth is, I am fully perswaded that from the very first time of seeing Page 45 us, her Genius was averse towards me, and inclinable towards Antigones. Observe now, how we employed our selves, he endeavouring to answer the Princesses of Corinth Character of Philocles, better then my self, and I also to shew that I was not absolutely unworthy of her applauses. Then, it is most certain, that the Princess of Lindus, either in respect of the Princess Cleobuline, or my good fortune, did me the honour to take my part: and all the Court after her example, did put some difference between Philocles and Antigones, and the fair Philista did put as great a difference between Antigones and Philocles; for in any company, or in walking, or at Bills, I found that Lady who of all the world did best please me, and my fancy, every day doing a thousand things with intention to displease me, and yet whether I would or no, I was pleased: Whether I would or no, I say; for certainly, I did all I could not to love her, but all in vain, and impossible; for there was such of I know not what kind of gallant and pleasant Aire in her, which I could not resist: so that from the first minute of my passion I was most unfortunate, and much more then they who are made so by an hundred thousand accidents which may chance in love: since certainly, a natural antipathy and aversion cannot possibly be overcome by any wisdom, whatsoever cruelty is qualified by tears; furie is allayed by submission, an imperious mind is mitigated by obedience; an inconstant person recollects himself sometimes by the example of an unparalled constancy; in all these cares there are some remedies to be found: but all the humane wisdom upon earth knows not how to vanquish a natural antipathy, since it is the thing will changes all objects, as well as jealousy. In the mean while I could not find so much consolation as to complain against Philista: for, argued I with my self, what would I have her do? for her opinion is rooted in her heart with her consent unto it, nor did her reason contribute any thing unto her aversion: and since there are some men who do hate Roses, which almost all men love; Why should I blame Philista for her secret hatred of me? by this argument would I have dissuaded my self from loving Philista: but the business came unto that height, that though Philista would not be uncivil, yet she could not dissemble, but her inclination to Antigones, and aversion unto me was apparent: when he spake any thing, she applauded it to the skies; if I spoke never so well, I was put at: if at any meeting, she danced with Antigones, it was with such an aire, as made it apparent that she was taken out by a hand that pleased her: she carried her self with a finer grace, her eyes were more sprightly and gay, she danced more lightly, and with a more swimming behaviour: she would then attract the looks of all the company, and delight all the company as much as she dulled me: but on the contrary, when I did take her out sometimes against her mind, she seemed as if she were not the same person: and I believe were it not that Antigones would have seen her dance ill, she would not have so much as minded the Tune, so negligent and careless was her action; and that so apparent, that the Princess did tell her of it. Philista (said she unto her) I once intreated you to hide half of your charms from Philocles, but I intended not that you should shew him all your incivilities; and me thinks you would not do ill, if you did a little more equally impart your favours. But Madam, (answered she, and laughed) did not you tell me, that it would be unjust that Philocles should return a Captain unto Corinth? Yes replied the Princess, but I would not have him go from Allissa discontented, therefore if you love Philista, be not so partial in your civilities. Philista blushed at this discourse, for she understood her well enough that the Princess did accuse her of too much complacency with Antigones, yet seeming to take no notice of it, she told her that she would correct her self for it; and indeed I found her for a while much more civil; and since I was ignorant of the Princess her discourse unto her, I was infinitely joyed at the alteration; and Antigones who was no less in love with Philista, then I was seemed to be sensibly displeased at it. As he had several opportunities of speaking with her, so had he several private discourses also, wherein, as I believe, he acquainted her with part of his thoughts. But as for me, it was a thing impossible to do so.

Whilst this happy interval, wherein she was grown more complacental continued: I met with a fit opportunity to speak with her, as she was walking, and I resolved to close with that blessed time; so that upon the first occasion which she gave me, to alter our general discourse into more particular. Is it possible (said I unto her) fair Philista) that you should not oppose this good fortune which I now enjoy? Can you at the last resolve to know Philocles to be the same he is, that he is, (said I, without giving her time to answer) the most faithful and passionate of all your Servants. Ha Philocles, said she, I know you better by the Princess of Corinth's Letter, then I do by your discourse. That Character of me whereof you speak, Madam, (said I unto her) was full of flattery, and I do not think it strange, you should not believe it was made for me, but my discourse, Madam, is most sincere, and true. Page 46 I should be very angry I should, (said she interrupting me) both in respect of your interest, and my own. Why then you must, (said I unto her) for it is not more true, that you are the fairest Lady upon earth, then it is certain, that I am the most. Stop there, Philocles (said she) lost you force me to answer you more sharply; and know, I could not know you when I would, I will not know you when I could. You might have known me Madam, (said I unto her) in knowing your self, since it is not possible you can be ignorant of the force which is in those inevitable charms of your beauty, your mind, your wit, and how they have charmed me every way unto your service. No Philocles, said she unto me, deceive not your self, I never knew any thing, but what I had a desire to know: my eyes do never shew me any thing but what pleases me, and my reason does sometimes comply with my desires, because they are not unjust, and also yield something unto my will. It would be more advantageous for me, (said I unto her coldly,) if your will did yield something unto your reason. What would you have me do? (said she, and laughed) and why do you not take the same counsel which you give me, since you have need of it? If my reason (said I unto her) should tell me that it were a crime to love you, I believe I should endeavour not to commit it. And though mine would persuade me, replied she, that Philocles were the most amiable man alive, yet Philista would not love him. By what way then is it possible to come unto your heart, said I unto her. I know not that my self, answered she, and if there be any blind parts, which may conduct any one unto it hereafter, it must be chance that makes him find it out. Since it is so, answered I, I am resolved to seek it all my life. But not find it for all that, (said she) therefore Philocles trouble your self no further in it.

I did intend to speak further unto her, but divers others came and joynd with us, so that our discourse altered, and ever since she carefully avoided all manner of private conference with me. In the mean while Antigones and I did live together, as it were by constraint, for we never discoursed but of things indifferent. The Name of Philista which was so dear unto us both, was never so much as pronounced amongst us when we were alone together. Antigones observing that the civilities of Philista unto me, did not continue, his displeasure at it did vanish: so that seeing there was nothing to be feared from me, in lieu of hating me as his Rival, he pitied me as his friend, and resolved some time or other to speak sincerely unto me concerning it: and coming one morning unto my Chamber, he said unto me, that he thought himself the most unfortunate man in the world, because he imagined that I was in love with Philista, as well as he; and protested unto me, that if he had observed any inclination in her to love me, he would rather die then be any obstacle to my felicity: but since he saw her mind was so far from any advantageous thoughts of me, he thought he was not injurious unto me, <◇> falling in love with one whom I could not love before him, since we saw her both together the first time, and since the first minute of her sight was the first beginning of his passion: Indeed he spoke unto me with as much generosity as I Lover, who would not quit his Mistress, could do: and I answered him with as much discretion, as a desperate man, and one who had some virtue was capable of, speaking unto a Rival that was more happy then himself, and one who he esteemed as his friend: I confessed so ingeniously unto him, that I had no lawful cause to complain against him; but I told him further, that for all that it was impossible for me but to be infinitely angry at his good fortune; That it was but a piece of railery to think that two Rivals could ever be true friends, and that all which generosity and prudence could do in such cases, was, to prevent them from being mortal enemies. Moreover, since I was too just to desire him to give over his designe, so I desired him not to take it ill I continued mine, and told him, he might well enough agree unto so much liberty, since there was very small appearance it would any thing advantage me.

In conclusion, after a long conference, we agreed to discourse no more together concerning Philista, but both of us to endeavour all we could to obtain her love: and that he who of us two could arrive at that honour, should move that fair Lady to pronounce a sentence of death against him she loved not. After this, Antigones and I lived better together, and was as civil one to another as any men could be, who endeavoured all they could to ruine one another, since the Prince Cleobulus would retain me a long time with him, and since I had received new Orders from Periander, which would imploy me longer there: I had the leisure to put in practice such expedients, as are usually advantageous in matters of love. I followed Philista whithersoever she went: I was perpetually in conference with her, I spoke of her eternally unto all my acquaintance, and I applauded no other beauty but hers, but was continually whensoever I had any occasion extolling her to the Heavens: I composed verses in her honour, which were better relished by all the Court then those of Antigones, though perhaps his were more Page 47 ingenious: I added musick unto my poetry; I composed Aires as well as words, and sung them my self with all the art I had, so joyning the charms of harmony unto my expressions, I sighed as I sang, and endeavoured to enchant her heart by her ears: I was at vast expences in clothes, in Balls, in Collations, and Banquets, and in all manner of Liberalities; I got the friendship both of all her friends, and all her Lovers: Alas! her father loved me very well, a brother she had did not hate me; her women, and all her Domesticks, were all won by my gifts; I spoke unto her with as much reverence as he who approaches unto the Gods. I expressed my passion both in Verse and Prose, my tears also did often plead in my behalf. The violence of my love did sometimes, whether I would or no, blow furie into my eyes, and dispair into my discourse: I saw I was vexed, jealous, my face changed, and to say all in few words, the most miserably man in the world, yet I could not alter her heart from that stubborn version which she had towards me. I remember that one of her intimate friends, who afterwards became mine also, asked her one day, Whether it was possible she should not esteem me, since I had the good fortune to get some share in the esteem of all the world besides, she did then acknowledge unto him, that she knew very well I did not deserve those rigid treatments I received from her: yet for all that, she could not help it: and that since some men do fall in love, when they know no reason for it; so it was no wonder if there were some which hated, when they had no cause. But (said that friend unto her) those who love, as you say, do ordinarily resist against their passion. It is true, replied she, but it is only because that passion might move them unto some dishonourable actions. And do not you (replied her friend) act some unjust ones? No, answered Philista, for I am not bound to love all the gallant men which are in the world; but esteem my self very happy, that I have so good a remedy against so terrible an enemy. But (said this charitable Confident further unto her) why do you not defend your self with the same Arms against Antigenes, which you use against Philocles, since you do only fight for your own liberty? Cruel friend (said she unto him) urge me not so far, I conjure you, and force me not to tell you that which I dare not think upon without a blush: Content your self with this consideration only, that love and hatred are two tyrannical passions, which oftentimes do mock both at Reason and Prudence: all that I can say unto you, is, that I have not resisted that strong aversion which I have unto Philocles, because it can never do me any harm, and that I have much resisted against that sympathy and inclination I have towards Antigenes, because it may be prejudicial unto me.

Thus did this conference pass, whilst we were every day with the Princess, unto whom all the Ladies resorted, but amongst the rest, Stesilea, who indeed was a very passable beauty, was most frequent: This Lady had a good wit, but such a jealous and envious mind, that she wished her self the only fair one in all the world: yet was my heart so altogether taken up with Philista, that I perceived not things most visible. So that I, not knowing she abhorred her Rival in beauty, did sometimes discourse with her: she was so crafty, and full of spirit, or at least, made many believe so, that indeed she suited her self with my humour: she began to dissuade me from my passion; afterwards to pity me, and complain of the incivilities of Philista towards me, and of her indulgence towards Antigenes, and carried the matter with so much art, that her company was more agreeable unto me, and requisite to comfort me: Then did I discover the bottom of my heart unto her, I laid open all my imbecility before her, and conjured her to become my friend, I asked her advice, I moved her to suffer me that I might relate all my misfortunes unto her, beseeching her to have some thoughts of pity towards me, since Philista had none: She harked to all this, as if she had been all goodness; she was much moved at my misery, and made me value her at so high a rate, that I esteemed her as a most sincere friend: I had not one jealous thought, but I imparted it unto her: as soon as Philista had looked upon me with any disrespect, or any roughness, I made my complaint unto Stesilea. So that since Philista did avoid all occasions of speaking with me, and since Stesilea on the contrary, gave me all possible freedom, all the Court in a short time did observe my secret conference with this Lady: and since they knew, there was a secret hatred between those two Ladies, they could not imagine I would chuse the enemy of Philista for my Confident, but believed that I had altered my mind, and that the continuation of my addresses unto Philista were only to hide my new passion unto Stesilea the better, Antigenes was extremely joyed at it, and all the Court was glad I had cured one passion by another, Stesilea, when I was not with her, was joyed to see her designe had so prosperous event: Philista only in point of honour which reflected not upon me, but, Stesilea, was moved with much spite: this fiery and inflexible spirit was not at all mollified towards me, but her designe only was to make me hate Stesilea, it she could, by any kind of crabbed course she could invent.

Page 48 But to compleat up the Sum of my misfortunes, since I could not be in any favour with her of whom I would be loved, I was loved by another unto whom I could grant no further then friendship: I must therefore tell you, that Stesilea did find something so noble, so pure, so great, and so vertuous in my passion unto Philista, that she desired that from me which I could give unto any but the other: so that transacting for her own interest, she gave me an hundred crafty counsels which I followed, because they seemed to be good, although they did much disadvantage me concerning Philista. This being the state of things, Antigenes came one morning unto my Chamber; and coming unto me with open Arms; My dear Philocles, said he unto me, what pleasure do you take in concealing your good fortune, and my own from me? Antigenes, said I unto him, not answering coldly unto such signes of tenderness as he expressed; If it be true that I am happy, I am afraid you would not be so glad. I protest unto you (said he unto me) that your contentment is as dear unto me, as my own: and I could not be more joyed if the fair Philista should love me, then I am, that you do not love her any longer. I love the fair Philista no longer, said I unto him all amazed. Ah Antigenes, do not deceive your self, for that is so rooted a passion in me, that it and I must die together. But (replied he, more amazed then I) all the Court, and Philista her self, thinks you are in love with Stesilea. Does Philista (said I all surprized) think I am in love with Stesilea? Yes, answered he, and I, like all the world, believed it also: This discourse did so much astonish me, that I was never more troubled in all my life then at that time, fearing this might make worse for me in the opinion of Philista, and grieved that I must now be deprived of the consolation which I found in the society of Stesilea: so that without any longer conference with Antigenes, I parted from him, protesting, that I was never more in love with Stesilea then at that time, and that I would take such order as should undeceive the world in their opinion, that I was in love with Stesilea: yet since I was upon terms of friendship with that Lady, and thought my self obliged unto her, and had received consolation from her, therefore I conceived it not fit to change my course of familiarity with her, before I acquainted her with the reason. Going then unto her by a blind way, taking all heed that I should not be perceived, I found her alone in her Chamber only with two of her women: As soon as she saw me, she easily perceived, that there was some new cross accident in the wind. What's the matter Philocles? (said she unto me) Has Philista given you some fresh affront? Philista (said I unto her) has not much contributed unto the disaster whereof I now complain; but Stesilea against her will is a greater cause then she. She blushed at this discourse, I cannot easily guess (said she) what harm I can possible have done unto you, nor know I any but one remedy which I could wish, which is, to remove that passion out of your heart which torments you, though I know you will not think that which would cure you, to be a remedy. But Philocles, said she, leave me no longer in suspense, but tell me I beseech you, how I have contributed unto that sorrow which I see in your eyes. Your beauty, said I unto her, is the true cause of it. Philocles, said she smiling think well what you say unto Stesilea. I do so, said I unto her, for if she were not so fair as she is, all the Court would not report it that I am in love with her: Philista would not have thought it, and Antigenes would not have believed it: but because the truth is, her beauty is extream, and because she cannot imagine why I should so frequently visit her, unless I give her my whole heart, therefore they do believe it: all the Court does esteem me happy in changing my chains: Antigenes rejoiceth, and Philista is angry, and this I have gotten by coming so often unto Stesilea. The truth is, things are brought into such a condition, that I am forced to deprive my self of the greatest comfort I have, which was, to be often with you. Why Philocles, (replied she in a great amaze) because fond rumours run you love me, will you therefore hate me? Heavens guard me, said I unto her, from a thought so unjust; for I shall esteem you as long as I live, and my friendship unto you shall be as constant as my love is unto Philista. But sweet Stesilea, since you are pleased to admit of my confidence only in relation to my own interest, I hope you will permit me to withdraw my self from seeing you upon the same reason, to the end I may undeceive Philista. The Gods do know, said I further, how difficult it is, to resolve upon such a designe; and the Gods do know, (answered she with a sigh) you have no reason to take such a resolution. What then would you have me do? (said I unto her) for if Philista continue in a belief that I love you, she will never love me; and your beauty is so admirable, that as long as I continue my visits unto you, she cannot be convinced of the contrary, and therefore I beseech you, permit me amiable Stesilea, to deprive my self of the happiness in seeing you, especially since your interest is not concerned in it: for since it is not the pleasure of the Destinies that my heart can be yours, I would not contribute any thing unto the belief which the world assumes, whilst in the mean I am the most miserable Page 49 man upon earth, who out of fear to displease her who loves me <◇>, <◇> forced to quit another, which hath given me so many Testimonies of her goodness, and who doubtless <◇> me for this last misfortune: Indeed I do (replied she blushing) and perhaps more then I thought. But I am to be lamented as well as you: for if it be so that the court believes you be in love with me, what strange tales will be told unto my disadvantage if you leave off your seeing me upon a sudden? will they not suppose that you have either fooled Stesilea, or that it is carried so out of subtily? No no, Philocles, the alteration must not be so suddenly: or if you will needs have have it so, you must in regard of my honour, make it seem as if I treated you <◇>: but if so, said I, I shall not justify my self in the opinion of Philista, since she will have some can be to think, that I quitted you, only because you chased me away. And indeed, it was <...> of Stesilea, to make Philista think so. But Philocles, replied she, do you think that Jealousie is a bad procurer of love: for my part, I think it an excellent good one; and am fully perswaded that if you were really in love with any other Lady, then Philista, she would love you the better for it; Yes, said I unto her, but you must imagine that her affection would be then very indifferent unto me, if I should love her no longer: Its true, replied she, but if this way wereless unjust then Philista her self is, you would be for ever happy.

Stesilea pronounced these words in such a manner, that the tenderness of her friendship was of another nature then mine: and it troubled me so much, that the rest of our conference was in very ambiguous phrases from both parties, which I believe perswaded us, that both of us understood one another: But since I could not alter my heart, and would not deceive a Lady unto whom I had professed so much amity, I parted from her, complaining against my self, and as I believe, giving her some reason to complain against her self, for the cruel resolution I had taken to discourse no more in private, nor to speak with her but very seldom. Mean time, since this visit lasted very long, and was known unto Antigenes, this change in my course of living with Stesilea, did not work those effects I hoped, and the rumour went that this separation, was a compact only twixt her and me: insomuch as Philista was not at all undeceived: and Stesilea made high complaints whensoever she found opportunity for it: Saying, it was strange I should have so little care of her reputation, as to sacrifice it, for one who loved me not: During all this while, Philista, though she would love me her self, did what she could to make me hate Stesilea; yet do what she could I still retained a friendly opinion of her: It is very true, that it did conduce to my greater persecution: for I was even desperate, to see that I was the cause of her disquiets. Thus stood the state of things, when I received an express order to returne unto Corinth: you may imagine into what a damp this drove my soul. I was to leave a Lady whom I loved, but who loved not me: I forsook another Lady, who did a little love me, and whom I doubted not but should ruin me, as much as she could in the opinion of Philista, during my absence: But for one piece of good fortune to me, that father of Antigenes hearing where he was, did peremptorily command him to return, so that this was no small consolation unto me, nor was the news I heard of Alasis his returning unto his own Country very shortly, less joyful to me; but I kept it very close from Antigenes; because I had the intelligence by an indirect way: The Prince Cleobulus did embrace meat parting, and the Princess his daughter, who indeed was a most admirable Lady, gave me a Letter to the Princess of Corinth, which was writ no less in my advantage then that I brought. But when I was to bid adieu unto the Princes, and afterwards unto Philista, that was a doleful story to me: Antigenes and I met both there together, and I had so much satisfaction by it, that I hindered him from speaking in private unto Philista, but yet I found so much dissatisfaction also, as to see a notable difference in the adieus of this beauty: every time she looked upon Antigenes in this last conference, I saw in her eyes a melancholy cloud, which without any dim unto her beauty, did augment her sweetness, and when by chance she looked upon me, I could find nothing but indifferency, or disdain; she bid me adieu, and hardly looked upon me; but her eyes followed the happy Antigenes, as far as they could possibly see: To tell you how Antigenes and I lived together, during our Navigation, would be superfluous, it being easie to be imagined we mused continually upon the matter; and hardly spoke a word, but thought the more. I was something comforted, in that I brought my Rival away with me. As for Stesilea, I took no leave of her, though I endeavored it: Dispirit, and sorrow, and honour, would not let her discover her weakness. At the last we arrived at Corinth, where Periander, and the Princes Cleobuline received me with joy: but yet there was no delights to be so used in it for me: I shuned all such company, as formerly I was wont to court: Arion only was he who did a little comfort me, for he was of a great spirit, and passionate Soul: I found in his discourse and songs, I knew not what kind of charming power, which Page 50 did allay my sorrows, and keep me alive. Mean time, I was even desperate to see Antigenes, would not engage himself unto any fresh beauty: and thus did I live for almost a whole year: but in the end, it was known that Alasis father of Philista would come with his daughter (for he had not a wife) to inhabit in his ancient country: Oh Heavens! how this news rejoiced me! but this joy was qualified when I understood, that the elder Brother of Philista had married Stesilea, a little before their departure from Jalissa, and that she came also with them: Indeed this marriage did much augment my sorrows, yet did I hope, that since Stesilea was virtuous, the change in her condition would work upon her Soul, and that it would be more advantageous unto me to have a friend, so neer allied unto Philista. Antigenes was so glad of this news, that his joy appeared in all his actions, which did not a little trouble me; but in conclusion, this long'd for company arrived: you may very well imagine, that I prepared the mind of Periander, of Melissa, and of the Princess Cleobuline, to receive that Lady who was so infinitely dear unto me, very favourably: and I was so happy as to understand that Philista knew how I had done her that good office: but though she did acknowledge her self obliged unto me for it, yet did she love me not a whit the better, but came unto Corinth the very same I left her at Jalissa, which was, very bitter against me, and very sweet unto Antigenes: as for Stesilea, I found a noble alteration in her: for her beauty was a little impaired and she had a mask of so sad a melancholy on her face, that I durst never ask her the cause: and since I did not seek for any occasions to speak in private with her, she also did avoid them as well as I. In the mean while, there was no thing which I did not, that might divert Philista, for she durst not openly refuse my civilities, because her father, having some obligations upon him towards me, would have took it ill from her: I shewed her then all that was delightful in Corinth: Poo-Arion did sing so often to her for love of me, as I was astonished, that a voice and a harp, which charmed the Dolphins, could not sweeten the fierceness of her obdurate Soul. But she was all this while immovable, Stesilea for her part, was not only resolute never to express any Testimonies of her affection to me, but intended to cherish that aversion which Philista had unto me: and indeed, this unjust Lady, since their new alliance had perswaded Philista, that I was in love with her. So that Philista did treat me worse at Corinth, then at Jalissa. I could never go unto Philista, but I found Stesilea in her chamber or else Philista was in hers, which angered me to the heart: for I think there is nothing more irksome, then every day to see together one whom I love, which loves not me, and another who loves me, and I love not her; though her whom I do love, thinks that I do love her whom I do not love. Yet did I endure this Torment a long time, without finding any consolation in any thing, and not obtaining one favourable word from Philista. I remember one day, when I came unto this hard hearted Lady, one desired to speak with Stesilea: I took hold of that opportunity, and beseeched her to tell me, if she could possibly remember all the sorrows which I suffered at Jalissa, and not have some thoughts of repentance: then did I repeat the original of my love, and a hundred Thousand petty things, which had taken so deep a root in my heart, that I resented them as if they were yet to come: But Philista hardly hearing me, did answer me far from the purpose, and in such a slighting manner, as would have caused any other then my self, to have out run his patience. Since I did complain in most respectful manner; Truly Philocles (said she unto me smiling,) you must pardon me, for I do not remember what you said unto me; I know very well, that I had the honour to see you at Jalissa; but to imagine, that I should here remember either what you said or what you did there, would be to abuse your self; for I use to charge my memory with very few things; Time past, and time to come, are two things I never think on: What most unjust Lady said I unto her) do you not remember how oft I have told you how passionately I loved you. Although I should remember such a thing (replied she) yet should you be never the better for it. Then repeating the places where I expressed my passion, sometimes in the Garden, other times at the Princess of Lindus lodgings, and several times at her own, I perceived that she did not remember one quarter of those things I told her: which vexed me more then if she had given me the worst language, there being nothing so offensive, nor a greater sign of scorn or indifference, then oblivion. Is it possible (said I unto her being much moved and grieved at it) that I should remember all the actions of Philista, all her words, and even all her looks, and that she would not remember one of the hundred thousand torments which I endured, and which she caused? Oh most obdurate and cruel woman, must I be more unhappy then ever? what do you think, (said she laughing at my anger and complaints) I thought to be only hated (said I unto her) but by this cruel oblivion, I see I am in a more deplorable condition then I thought: since I am most certainly scorned: I see now you have a Soule which is not only incensable of me, but Page 51 (if it may be permitted me to say it) it is a most dead Soul; you look upon me, and will not see me; you hear me, and will not understand me: nor am I certain whether or no you hear me now. Yes, answered she, and I understand very well that you tell me of one of the most fantastical things in the world, but I will not promise you to remember it when you are out of my sight. In the name of the Gods (said I unto her) treat me not thus: hate me, if you cannot love me; but do not forget all that I do and say. Why Philocles, (said she unto me) had you rather be hated, then forgotten? Without all question I had (answered I) But in the mean time (replied she) there is nothing more contrary to love then hatred: Pardon me (said I unto her) for there is at the least some thought in a Soul which hates, nor is it absolutely impossible, but love may kindle amongst the sparks of anger: but a cold and insensible Soul which retains no memory of all one does to move it, what hopes is there of any tenderness or acknowledgment? how can it ever love those it never thinks on? But yet (replied she) I cannot conceive it better to be hated then forgotten. Alas fair Philista, said I unto her, you were never either hated or forgotten: But I, whom you have caused to know both too experimentally, do really profess I had rather you would remember me, and hate me, then not remember me at all: Yet hatred in my opinion, is a very great obstacle unto love (said she.) Yes, said I, but oblivion is a greater, since it is an absolute impossibility any love should arise out of it, as it possible may out of anger and hatred. In one word Madam, I think it so inhumane an act to banish an unfortunate lover out of remembrance, that I think it less cruelty to put him unto death: Banish me out of your heart therefore Madam, if you cannot endure me, but leave me I beseech you a little room in your memory: forget if you please to speak ill of me, & to complain of me for loving you so obstinately against your will, but I beseech you forget not how my love has importuned you: Is this Philista (said I unto her) which I now beg too much? Yes, replied she, for hatred is a turbulent passion, which disturbs the rest of all those who have it; whereas oblivion on the contrary, is a dull sleepy spirit, which has nothing of choller in it, and which makes one pass away their time with pleasure. Then (said I unto her, not being master of my own resentments, so much was I incensed) I beseech you forget the delights, which the conversation of Antigenes affords you, as well as the perplexity which the company of Philocles does cause: No, (replied she in a scoffing raillarie) I have a better way then so, for I always remember what pleases me, and forget what perplexeth me. As I was beginning to answer, the princess Cleobuline entered, and I immediately went out, it being impossibles for me to stay any longer with her who denied me every thing but her hatred. It seemed after this, that fortune began to smile a little upon me, but it was only to make me more sensible of her frowns, as after wards you shall know. It fell out so, that Antigenes was forced to go unto Thebes upon some urgent occasions; so that I enjoyed so much happiness as to be quit of my beloved Rival, and in his absence to speak with more liberty unto Philista: but the more I entertained her, the more did it augment her aversion, and to that extremity, as she could not endure me: Yet did I solicit, as if I were not out of all hopes: I courted the friendship of her Brother and of Alasis very diligently, and I so obtained it, that both of them did openly testify they should be very glad to have Philista marry me: My Uncle, who liked of this alliance, and knew I was in love with this Lady, did speak unto them concerning me, after he had first written unto my father about it, but spoke not a word to me, until after they had given him favorable answers. So that I saw no obstacles at all, but only Philista her self, but that was so great a one, as it was invincible: Her father had no sooner commanded her to look upon me as one who was to be her husband, and expressed himself so peremptorily that he expected an absolute obedience without any resistance, but she fell into extream despair: she employed Stesilea to his brother, but in vain, and indeed she found all her tears her complaints, and her prayers to no purpose. In the mean time, the rumour of this marriage ran all about, and all the Court rejoiced for the love of me: and every one came unto her to tender their complimentary services; but to avoid such persecutions she feigned to be ill, and by this cunning device she deprived me as well as the rest of her sight: Stesilea was with her all this while, doing me as ill offices as she could: and assisting Antigenes to my prejudice. The melancholy of Philista was so extream, that she became sick in earnest in feigning to be so, and so sick too, that Physicians thought she would dye; but afterwards, she recovered, and was able to endure company, but yet she continued in a languishing manner and so very melancholy, that her humour could not be known. I among the rest came to see her, and she durst not deny me: yet did I see her almost without any satisfaction out of any opinion I was the cause of all her ill.

During this time, many did speak unto her in my behalf; and the Princess Cleobuline would Page 52 needs know of her why she carried the matter so violently against me, but she could not possibly get any other answer from her, but that she did not know the cause her self; she agreed with the Princess, that I was of such a family as that alliance with me would be an honour unto hers: that I had a better estate then ever she could hope for, that I had a fair esteem in the world; and doubtless I loved infinitely, since I continued it notwithstanding her extream disdain: but yet for all this, she would always say that she could never love me: and that there was something in her heart which she could not master, and which was opposite unto any thing that would be advantageous unto me. But, said the Princess unto her, is it not your secret choice of Antigenes, which denies Philocles any entrance into your heart? No, (said she unto her) for though I had no liking at all unto Antigenes, and though my heart were absolutely free, yet should I ever have an aversion to Philocles: for indeed, since I do not hate him out of any reason, but out of a secret cause, which I understand not, I need seek no further. The Princess who did me the honour to favour me, seeing the fancy of Philista, endeavoured to withdraw my affection, but since there was so great a sympathy in me to love her, as there was antipathy in her to hate me; she could not prevail. I did acknowledge against my mind, that there was in Corinth as excellent beauties as Philista every whit, as sprightly and noble; but yet for all that I could not chuse but love her above them all: so that finding as great an impossibility to make me forget her, as there was to move her to love me, so we continued both most miserable. Stesilea only found in her heart some malignant satisfaction at our misfortunes, taking much pleasure, doubtless to see that man whom she had loved, to be hated by her he loved: and also to see her whom she imagined to be the cause why she was not loved again, to be miserable both by my passion, and her own. In the mean while Alasis was much incensed against Philista, so much as he sent her word he was resolved to see her no more until she resolved to marry me, and live complacently towards me: her brother was in the same humour, so that she having no hopes in her, but all despair, she lived so melancholy a life, that all the Court discoursed of it: yet she suffered not alone, for I did participate of her miseries in a most cruel manner: sometime I would needs resolve to love her no longer, and almost imagined my self able to do it: But alas, I had no sooner took up that resolution, but my walk carried me unto her, whether I would, or no. Antigenes was all this while absent, and there was none to cause all my miseries, but Philista. One day when I was with her, when it fortune, Stesilea contrary to her custome, was absent; after some Ladies which were with her were gone away; we both of us did sit mute, and spoke not a word to one another. Philista deeply musing, and never looking at me, and I continually gazing upon her, and durst not begin discourse: I found so great an alteration in her face, that I wondered at it. But when she looked up, and perceived her eyes so full of tears, which she could not restrain, that she did endeavour it as much as possible: I was so sensibly moved at it, that it was impossible any should be more.

Madam, said I unto her, May I take so much liberty, as to ask, whether those tears which I see, proceed from any cause which is known unto me? Yes, said she in a languishing manner; and more then that, you may cause them to cease. I, Madam, (said I unto her?) Yes, replied she, for if you were as generous as you should be, I should be at more quiet, and you also: and indeed, why cannot you hate me? The same question, may be asked Madam, (replied I) why, cannot you love me? The reason is, said she, because I cannot. The same reason is for me, Madam, said I unto her, for I can no more cease from loving you, then you cease from hating me. Know then however, said she, that by reason of this impossibility I am not in any fault. Be pleased to know also by the same reason (answered I) that I am most unfortunate, since I cannot live without you, nor you live with me: but I better understand upon what reason I love you, then I do what reason you have not to endure my love. Look for neither any reasons, nor excuses, for what I do, said she, for I not look for any my self. Perhaps, said I unto her, that time and my services may at length alter your mind. No, Philocles, replied she, deceive not your self: I have hitherto carried the matter as well as I could, I have invented pretences and excuses to defer the marriage, which my father will needs make up with you: I have counterfeited sick, and that so long until I was really so; but for all this, if he, or you, or both, do not alter your resolutions, I am fully resolved to disobey him openly, and by consequence be blamed by all the world: yet I cannot do otherwise. Alas Madam, said I unto her, are you absolutely determined to oppose my good fortune? Call not that marriage, good fortune, said she, which would be so disadvantageous both for you, and me; for what pleasure can you find in seeing me perpetually melancholy, and receiving an hundred signs of indifference from me? No, Philocles, you would not find any happiness in it, and therefore if you be wise think Page 53 upon some other course: and I am so generous, said she, as that I would not punish a man who loves me (as you do) so cruelly; no: is your own interest in this business, less concerned then mine: And I am most certain, said she, that I should never marry you, although the whole earth would be given to purchase my consent; I do consider also, that affecting honour, as I do, I should think my self infinitely obliged unto you, if you would not force me to an urgent necessity to resist my father; but of your self resolve to forsake me. To forsake you Madam? (said I unto her with extream sorrow) Oh H avens! how can I obey you? Had you rather (said she) that I should look upon you as my persecutor, and that I should turn my indifference into fury against you, and despair against my self? And have you a mind to make me as miserable, as you are unfortunate? you may very well think, that if I could love you, I would obey my father, but since I am not able to do it, what grand injustice is it to wish me unto things above my power? No Dominion was ever so tyrannical, as that which one pretends unto over the soul: Think well with your self, Philocles; consider it; and if there be any reason remaining in you, make use of it in qualifying your own misfortunes, and making mine to cease. Madam, said I unto her, do you intend that I should leave you the liberty to marry Antigenes? <◇> Oh no, no, I love you too well over to consent unto it. If I were perswaded that your disdain of me, proceeded from a natural antipathy which you could not overcome, I should then be so respectful of you, as that I would resolve to die in resolving never to express any more symptoms of my love, or persecuting you any longer: But unjust Lady that you are, since your aversion to me is caused only by your inclination unto Antigones, and that you would not cast off Philocles, but only to give him room in your affection: be pleased to know that I can not brook it, nor will ever suffer it: Antigones has been my friend, it is true, but since he is become my Rival, he must prepare himself to unloose the bands of friendship: I have hitherto restrained my resentments, I have seen him favoured and loved, but I will never see him the Husband of Philista; and therefore, to make all parties happy, alter your designe, Philista. It must be the Gods must alter it, answered she, and since I cannot think they ever will, all that I can say unto you, is, that although Antigones were not in the world, though I had never known him, yet should I be the same unto you I am. But however Madam, said I unto her, confess the truth, Antigones should have the honour to be the fair Philista's choice, if Alasis would consent unto it. I am too sincere, replied she, to deny what you say. O most cruel Lady, said I unto her, will you make me absolutely despair? But Philocles, said she, would you have me lose my reason? what right have you unto any part of my will? Did I ever give you any hopes, since the first time I know you? No, said I unto her, but you have procured in me abundance of love. Am I to blame, replied she? Have I not an hundred times desired you to cease from loving me? 'Tis true, all that ever you said unto me was in vain, for Philocles shall never enjoy me. And I swear by the Heavens, said I, Antigones shall never enjoy Philista, as long as Philocles lives. I had rather chuse that misfortune then the other, (replied she.) Would you so? (said I, with a mind full of anger, jealousy, and love.) I have already told you so, answered she. Since it is so (pursued I) be pleased to know, that if you will you may be rid of the unfortunate Philocles; he shall not persecute you any more; nor unless you please, shall ever see you again. Which way (said she) can I obtain so great a happiness? By breaking off with Antigones, said I unto her, and solemnly promising never to see him no offer them me: for to imagine, that you should cast off me, and I suffer you to enjoy a thousand happy days with my Rival, is a thing impossible. I know very well Madam, that I do in some sort transgress against the respect which I owe you; but whosoever has no more reason then I have, is not subject unto any Law of Complacencie: Speak then, Madam, I beseech you, Is it your pleasure, Philocles shall see you no more? it is in your power, and you may do it presently. If I were your wife, replied she, what would, you then do? If I should enjoy that honour, said I unto her, I should then trust my self with your virtue, but since I am only the object of your aversion and disdain, I must trust unto my self: therefore Madam, if you would not have me move Alasis to compel you unto what he has promised me, write a Letter unto Antigones, which shall absolutely forbid him to see you, at his return, and I shall immediately leave you in peace, upon condition that the promise which you shall make be sincere, which is, that you will never marry Antigones. You tell me of such horrid things (answered she) that I cannot possibly endure them: you also have given me such dismal answers, replied I, that I wonder I can hear them and live; but how ever Antigones shall never thrive by my disgrace: yet since I can never be yours, replied she, why should you care whose I be: Why Madam? (said I unto her) alas, you do not know the fury of that passion which rules in me, to think there is no difference between a Rival that is loved, and another which is not: I know Page 54 that to lose the possession of her one loves, is a cruel fate, but to see her enjoy the Rival which she loves is infinitely more terrible, therefore never imagine that I can ever change my thoughts; Allow me then some time to consider upon such a fatal Proposition. I am contented Madam (said I unto her sighing) and afterwards assuming more calmness of mind, I would to the Gods, Ma'dam, said I, that during this time of consideration, you would change your thoughts of me: and thus did I leave Philista; and left in a most unquiet mind: for she saw I had given her an occasion to be delivered of all my importunacies, yet it was upon condition to quit her self from Antigones whom she loved: On the other side, she fear'd that if she persisted any longer in her obstinacy, her father would either force her to marry me, as there was great likelihood he would, or else I would kill Antigones: for my part I was in no less perplexity then she, for I had seen Philista so sick, or altered, and so melancholy, that I feared the being a cause of her death: Moreover, I thought such an angry piece of business, to force her inclination in marrying me against her will, by the authority of her father, that I could hardly resolve upon it: Sometimes a generous disdain made me ashamed of my unworthy perseverance, but presently after love became predominate, and took up its first place, chasing all other thoughts from my heart: sometimes anger would so transport me, that I would not marry her, but only to take her from Antigones, and treat her ill afterwards; this seeming the sweet way of all: sometimes again, when my mind was more serene, I would win her no way but by my submissions: But the Result of all my thoughts was, that Antigones should never marry her: Mean while Alasis was angry at the proceeding of his daughter, and began to hasten on the marriage, sending her word by her brother; that it was his peremptory pleasure she should consent unto it: Seeing her self then in such a narrow and desperate condition, she sent for me: and with tears in her eyes, Philocles (said she to me) you have overcome me. Ah Madam, said I unto her, is it possible? Yes, said she, and upon condition you will break off with my father, I promise you to break off with Antigones. O Heavens, Madam, said I unto her, how dismal is this victory, and how dear do I buy those tears? But Madam, said I, Can you cast off Antigones, purposely to cast off Philocles? Keep, said she, within the limits of your Proposition, unless you intend to drive me into some desperate resolution: Philista pronounced these words in such a manner, that notwithstanding my choller, I did pity her. Madam, said I unto her, what assurance can I have that you will cast off Antigones? This Letter, said she, which you shall give, or send unto him: I beseech you, added she, since I do for you, all that I can, do for me what you ought, and see me no more I conjure you. In saying so, she left me, and went into her Closet: but so pale, so changed, and so much sorrow in her eyes, that I saw Antigones was more in her favour then I had thought. It is not easie for me to tell you the state of my soul at that time: I quitted her, and her Chamber, and went unto my own, where opening Philista's Letter, I read these words.

PHILISTA unto ANTIGENES.

Since Philocles hath promised me to see me no more, I do conjure you by that power, which you have given me over you, to do the same. This is the only way, which can keep me from becoming his, and it is by his will only, that mine is not tyrannized over by my father. To prevent my marrying of him, whom I love not, I must deprive my selfe of him, whom doubtless I would have loved, if it had been permitted me. But what should I do? Fates will have it so, and there's an end: Mean time, remember that I expect obedience from you, and that I never see you; also that you neither quarrel with Philocles, nor he with you, concerning me: for since he deprives himself of all he loves, (which is my self) for the love of me: It is but just that you do as much for him, since it conduceth to the tranquility of PHILISTA.

"Oh Heavens, what variety of thoughts did this Letter beget in me! one while I was pleased in thinking Antigones should see Philista no more: immediately after I was all sorrow to see how ill I stood in her fancie. I thought a hundred times, and a hundred times to alter my resolution: and as oft again to follow those resolutions I had taken, I desired a friend of mine to go unto Alasis, and to beseech him most humbly, that he would not use any forcings upon the inclination of Philista, but at the least to give her some time to consider upon it. It so fell out, that I was to take a journey upon some important business, and was within a few days to leave Corinth; Alasis began presently to suspect the truth, and would needs have it so, that notwithstanding Page 55 the aversion of his daughter I must marry her: but I departed, without bidding adieu unto any, and went unto Antigones: you may easily imagine that I undertook this journey with extream sorrow: as soon as I came to Thebes, I enquired where Antigones lodged; and found the place, but they told me, that he was gone into the Gardens, which are beyond the Castle of Cadmus: being shewed the way, I went thither, and found him there, with many beauties walking in the walks which were very large: As I espied him at the end of one walk, I passed into another, not desiring to speak unto him before so many: and coming unto the end of a walk just opposite to that where he was, I saw the conversation of those Ladies, and him, was very high, gallant, and pleasant; and me thought, for a man that was in love at Corinth, he was a little too blith, and merry at Thebes: but since I was not in the same humour wherein I saw him, I would not mingle into the company of such who were all unknown unto me but my Rival, but returned, and waited for him at his lodging: since it was late before he returned that night, my patience would hardly hold out, yet I had so great a desire to give him this cooling news, that I stayed still: he was no sooner come in, but going into the Chamber, where his men had placed me, I went towards him in a cold kind of manner; but I was much surprised to see him come unto me with a freer countenance then ever he did since we were Rivals: Is Philocles, said he unto me, at Thebes? Oh Heavens, is it possible! Yes, answered I unto him, and he came hither purposely to Antigones, by order from Philista: Are you upon such good terms with her (said he unto me) that she should give you any such Commission? You shall see by her Letter, said I unto him, and gave it him. Antigones blushed in taking of it, and going unto the Table whereon there was a Candle: I confess, said he, I cannot guess at the business, but after he had read the Letter, without any great resentment as I expected: No, no, Philocles (said he unto me, repeating some words of Philista's Letter,) Antigones shall not quarrel with you; and though you would quarrel with him, yet he will not suffer it to be so. I do confess this discourse of Antigones did much surprise me; but after he had embraced me, he told me how the Gods had cured him of his passion: And though I cannot confess it (said he) without shame, yet for your tranquility, I will acknowledge my mutability, and tell you that I am now in love at Thebes, as I was at Corinth. How, said I unto him, is Antigones whom Philista loves inconstant? and is Philocles whom she hates and scorns faithful? So it is, replied he, and I can give you no other reason for it, unless this, that the Gods would not have me any longer continue a Rival unto one of my dearest friends. I did not at the first, give any credit unto the words of Antigones but the next morning he shewed me the Lady whom he then loved, who indeed was a miracle of beauty: I enquired further in the Town, I found that ever since he came to Thebes, he seemed to be in love with her. Then did we renew our ancient friendship; and I returned unto Corinth, with permission from him to make Philista acquainted with his inconstancy; hoping that perhaps it would conduce unto my advantage: But alas, this hope was ill bottomed, for she not being able to revenge her self upon Antigones for his infidelity, would needs cast all her revenge upon me, and treated me more cruelly then ever.

At that time her father died, so that that now fearing none, but having the staff in her own hand, she did beat me with it, and not see me any more: and to compleat my misfortune, this cruel Lady, being well recovered in her health, and fairer then ever, returned unto Jallissa, unto an Aunt of hers there, and a little while after was also married there; never shewing any thing but signes of extream aversion unto me, or at the best, indifferencie: so that by consequence I may well say, that I have not only been deprived of all the sweets of love, but have also had sad experience of all its bitters; never being any without doubt, which could equal this: I could not endure the place where I had been so long tormented; and notwithstanding any thing that any could say unto me, I left Corinth, and returned unto Cyprus, where I continued adoring that obdurate Lady; so that without hopes of ever being loved, I persisted still, and ever shall do in love; and by consequence must be the most unfortunate man that ever loved, or lived: Absence is doubtless a most sensible evil, but to be absolutely casheered out of the heart of her one loves, is much more cruel then to be only out of her eyes: this evil has a thousand remedies, which may cure, at the least, comfort it. The remembrance of pleasing passages joyned unto the hopes of return, does sweeten many an hour, whatsoever Thimocrates is pleased to say; nor do I know whether the joy and pleasure which one takes to see his Mistress again after a long absence from her, be not greater then all the miseries that absence can cause: But to imagin that one is not loved no more ever shall be, this is an incomprehensible misery, at Page 56 the least to one that hath had experience of it: for this grand absence comprehends all other sorts of absences, since in the very presence of her one loves, he is absent from her heart and mind, unto which no other absence can be comparable: I do confess that doubtless the death of a mistress is more rigorous then absence; but I cannot endure any should say, that he who is not loved should be less miserable then he who loseth that which he loves: This last evil is certainly, a most violent one; yet notwithstanding, according to the intention of nature, it loseth something of its force as soon as it is come unto its limit: but this which I endure, contrary to the order of all the universe, is more violent and durable: the longer it lasts, the more it augments, whereas the other on the contrary does at length deminish. That impossibility which there is, to raise one from the dead, make a Soul rest it self, whether it will or no, in its own sorrow: it shuts it self, as one may say, within the Tombe of her he loves, and lulling it self a sleep in the Coffin with her, its sorrows by degrees does there languish, and he has some consolation there, that he can be dew with tears, the ashes of his Mistress. But a scorned love, who sees himself dead in the heart of his Mistress, enjoys no rest: for being perswaded, that it is not absolutely impossible, but some alteration or other may happen in his business he plots a hundred several devices, which none of them biting the make he aimed at, does continually drive him into despair: all his hope is to be quiet, and not to be comforted: and doing every thing which others use to do which may make themselves loved, he does them all in vain, the more he loves, the more he is scorned or without any power to cure himself or ever de|siring it, he endures an incredible forment. Jealousie, indeed is a very dangerous poyson: but it spits not all its malignits on the heart of that lover, who thinks himself sometimes loved, and < > jealousy can ever be ranked amongst the greatest miseries, doubtless it must be, when he who is jealous is perswaded that the Lady whom he loves had never one good thought of him. Yet it com-s not neer that torment which I endure: for I am perswaded, that if I had only one single thought. I should hereafter be loved by Philista but one poor day; the very thoughts of that one day would sweeten all my miseries, and fortifie my hopes as long as I lived. A jealous man may himself imagin that perhaps, what he thinks is not so; for that passion does commonly inspire only •ncertain thoughts, and ill grounded phansies: But when one finds by a long, and a sad experience, that there is an absolute unalterable aversion in the heart of her he loves: what more pleasant thought can he have, then the desire of death? For truly, all the cares, the services, the sighs, the tears, and every thing else which the most faithfull lovers do, are all done, that by them they may obtain the happiness to be loved: that is all the recompence of love, the prize which is only aimed at, and without it all other things are nothing: and to obtain it, they will willingly suffer whole years of misery: he then that is deprived of that which is the end, the aim, and wish of all lovers, who ever did love, do love, or ever shall love; must needs be the most lamentable; and I dare affirm, that I suffer more then any one in the World can, and by consequence, it would be extream injustice, not to lament me more, then any unfortunate men, who suffers less. Thus did Philocles, relate, and end his Story, with his reasons, which seemed so strong unto Martesia, that she could not forbear her bitter invecions against Philista, in so much as Philocles was forced to take her part and excuse her: For my part, said Cyrus, as I must needs blame her, so I must needs pity Philocles: for the Gods it seems are much incensed against her, for making her to look upon that as a misfortune, which would have made her infinitely happy: But since she her self, replied Erenice, is the cause of her misfortune, me thinks, Sir, that she deserves it. Philocles said Aglatidas, is questionless, much to be lamented: for if fortune had only crossed his designs, he would more easily have endured it, then to see Phillista, do it. This misery is great indeed, replied Thimocrates, but when I think upon what I suffer, I think it little: but I conceive it more insupportable then yours, replied the Prince Artibies, though a Thousand degress short of mine: Oh I wish to the Gods, that the adored Lady whose loss I mourn for, were in such a condition, that I might suffer the same for her: This is a very strange wish added Leontidas, yet I do not know whether those which I have often made in my jealous fits, would not seem more strange unto you: It is not your time to speak yet, said Martesia, but if you be pleased to think well of it, Sir, said she, and looked upon Cyrus, the Prince Artibies, according unto the order which you approved of, shall tell his story before Leontidas: You are their Judg, replied Cyrus, and it is only you, unto whom they all must be obedient, and I beleve the Prince Artibeis is well pleased with it. Then after he had called to mind, all •he dismal Ideas, of his dead Mistriss, his countenance altered, his eyes were more melancholy then before, and after he had sighed two or three times, he began his Story thus.

The Lover in Mourning. The third History.

The remembrance of misfortunes is doubtless very pleasing unto those who do not endure them any longer, and who like men escaped from ship-wracke, and out of all fears do tell the dangers they have avoyded: But the misery which I endure being eternall, or at the soonest, must not end but with life, it is hard for me to have a Soul so free, as to exactly tell you, the original and progress of my passion: And though it were possible to find some sweet|ness in complaining against such evils, yet would there be none in the remembrance of such past pleasures, which can never be enjoyed. Pardon me therefore I conjure you, if I descant upon nothing but what is fatally dismal: and think not ill of me, if my soul which is used unto no thoughts but death, does entertain you with dull and melancholy relations, and fill your imaginations with nothing but Urns, Coffins, and Tombs. I shall not insist to tell you the reasons, why the Prince of Cicilie my brother, sent me unto Thebes, since it is not pertinent unto your knowledg, that it was my passion, brought me thither: it will be sufficient to inform you that I was two whole years there: But perhaps it is not altogether impertinent to let you know that the Princess my Mother, was descended from the race of Cadmus son of Agenor, who was so illustrious amongst tho Thebans. I went then to Thebes in an equipage befitting my birth: I was received there with much honour: and within a few days I was acquainted with all that were great and noble there. He who then was Poetarch, that is, Captain General of Poetia had a son called Palimnis, neer of my age, with whom I contracted a most inti|mate friendship, and who shewed me all the Ladies of quality in Thebes, amongst which I found abundance of rare beauties. But in all the companies wherein I was, I heard no discourse but of the sickness of one in the Town, whom all reports made to be the fairest in the world: and I asked Polimnis whether it was true, that this person whom they said was in danger to dye, was fairer then any I had seen in Thebes? He assured, that she had more beauty then all the rest, put them all together: afterwards I understood she was his Consin, and descended from Etocles nephew of Creon, and son of Jocastus who wore the Crown with so many misfortunes, and that this Lady had all the rare qualities which could render one most perfectly accomplished. I began then upon these reports, to interest my self in her condition; and eve|ry day asked Polimnis how this fair sick Lady did? not yet being more sensible of any sorrow, as you may well suppose, then the love of any beautiful things in general might cause, and such as natural compassion might infuse into a man, who had a tender soul and quick imagination. However, it was an easie matter to discover her lovers, for they were all of them so melanco|ly, that the most discreet amongst them did shew their passions by there tears, or at least by their sighs, Upon a day when Polimnis and I passed by the door of Leontina (so was this fair Lady called) and the same who had cured Antigenes of his love to Philista) we saw many men go hastily in, and saw others come out, with eyes and faces all tears. Polimnis stayed one of Leontinas woemen who he saw grieving very much, and she told him, that her Mistris was dying, and that she was going to fetch one of her friends whom she desired to speak with, be|fore she lost her speech. Polimnis, who was of kin to this sick Lady, and loved her very well desired of me permission to go unto her; I was so far from denying him, that I said I would go with him. We entred into the house, where the condition of Leontina had caused such dis|order, that much ceremony was not to be observed: all the doors were open; all the domes|tiques in tears: several chambers through which we passed were full of people, and when we came neere her chamber, Polimnis having not yet met with any who could exactly tell him the state of his Cousen, left me at the door, and entred himself into her chamber, which he found full of men, who had no more reason to enter then he had: and coming neer the Canopy of cloth of Gold, I saw upon a bed which was under it, the incomparable Leontina in a sound: but Oh Heavens, how this sight did surprize and trouble me! The fight of so great a beauty, in so pitifull a case, did deeply penetrate my soul? she lay negligently, on one side, with her head a little turned: her hair half loose, her right arm out of bed; her neck alittle open, her eyes shut, h•r mouth half open, without any signe of life; only a weak kind of breathing, which was hardly discernable, yet although the paleness of death was upon her face, I who entred af|ter Polimnis, could say, that I never in all my life saw any so fair: you may well imagin how sad I was to see her in that condition; and to observe, that all remedies and phisique would do her no good, which in an houre after, I thought, I saw her ready to expire. Polimnis, who saw me neer him, would diverse times move me to go out, and avert our eyes from so sad an object: but seeing none tooke any notice of us, but that without any offence we might Page 58 remain there, I held him, and would not let him go out; for I was so much moved to see Le|ontina in that condition, though I had never seen it in any other, that indeed I was turned a very stock, and could not stir. But at last, when I was almost past all hopes, I presently per|ceived, I saw a fresh colour appear upon the paleness of her cheek, and as it were drive away that mortal paleness which had spread it self over all her face: Presently after, she opened her eyes, but though she did immediately shut them again, I saw something so splendid in them, that I was dazled; a little after that, she sighed, and turned her self with so much strength, that she gave evident signes and hopes of her amendment: so that the Physicians being put in some hopes, they caused all to go out of the Chamber, but such as might be useful, that she might have no more air, and they better help her: It is impossible for me to tell you, how half dead Leontina did raise an immortal passion in my heart: Let it suffice, O my equitable Judg! that you know I loved her, though dying as she was, and compassion did so molifie my heart, that love wounded it without resistance.

After this, I was more careful then Polimnis was to enquire every day how she did & also more diligent then all the rest of her ancient Lovers. Mean while it was the pleasure of the Gods to restore her unto the earth: she recovered, and she lived in perfect health, and that so fair, so charming, and so admirable in all things, that I esteemed my self infinitely happy in being her Slave. Polimnis, carried me unto her, as soon as I was in a condition to be seen, and I was relceived with much civility; I found also so many graces in her mind, that there was no need of any beauty to captivate mine, if it had not been so already. I shall tell you, (but follow that rule which I proposed) how I did all such things, as a springing love does usually produce; how I endeavoured to please her, to divert her, and to get my self into her esteem: But I shall on|ly tell you, that though I was not very improsperous in these three things, yet was it very long before I could receive any signes of complacencie in her towards my passion. Leontina was very civil, it is true, but so she was unto all the world, yet my love was not at all satis|fied; but though I thought she did not love me at all, yet did I continue to love her infinitely, as after her recovery it appeared: for she being gone into the Countrey with some of her friends, there ran a rumour about all Thebes, that she was drowned in going over the Riv|er Ismenes, the Coach being overturned in the midst of the water: This sad accident was related with all manner of circumstances; how Leontina was found dead, some five or six palces from the place where the Coach was broke, and there was no question made of the truth in this tragick news: It is hard for me to tell you how I received it, I lost my speech, and al|most my life, I cannot tell you what I then said or did, my reason was so confounded, and my sorrows told all the world, that I had much ado to hide my passion, because the humour of Leontina was not to affect those publick Adorers, who make a vanity of their passion: since it was two days journey from Thebes unto the place where they said this dismal misfortune happened, it was long before we could be informed of the certainty. But Oh Heavens! every houre was an age, and I passed them all without any hopes; and if Polimnis who was acquainted with my love, had not prevented me, I had gone my selfe unto the place, where they said Leontina was drowned: But my impatience was so high, that I took horse, and went out of Town, though it were but to go into the way through which the Cor|ps of Leontina was to come: Polimnis knowing of it, followed me, and desiring to comfort me, he told me that I was happy his Cousin had been no more favou|rable unto me, since if she had loved me, I should have been much more unfortunate then I was: Ah unjust friend, said I unto him, you know not how to love, do you think it possible I should be more grieved then I am? No, no, said I unto him once again, you do not know what are the effects of love. Alas, (said I never thinking Polimnis stood by) Leontina is dead: Le|ontina the beauty of the world is most miserably lost; she did not love me, it is true, but perhaps she might have loved me hereafter, and because she did not at the present love me, must I therefore leave lamenting her; and was not my love of her sufficient to make me eternally be|wail her loss? Yes, yes, (said I, and turning towards Polimnis) there needs no more to prove unto you, that I must be for ever joyless, I loved Leontina, and I have lost her, what needs more to make me desperate? We do never use to mourn for them who loves us when we do not love them; and we do always mourn for them we love, though they love not us. Lament, lament eternally, and weep for the incomparable Leontina. As I was thus condoling, Polim|nis not hearkening unto me, but looking towards a great plain, (for Boetia is a very flat and open Countrey) I stopped and looked as he did, and casting my eyes the same way, I saw a Coach appear, guarded and conveyed by some horse: After Polimnis and I had looked a while, whilst the Coach drew near us, we knew it to belong unto that same fair one, whose loss I so la|mented: Page 59 Ah Polimnis, (said I distractedly) look where they bring the Corpse of Leontina: in saying so, this sad object did so work upon my spirits, that my soul was too weak to sup|port so great a grief: I would have put my horse on towards the Coach, which was coming towards us, but not knowing what I did, but having absolutely lost my reason, I went back|ward in lieu of forward; Polimnis coming towards me, seeing my countenance change, my eyes twinkle, and I holding him by the hand, said in an undistinguishable tone, (I shall see her dead Polimnis) and after this, he saw I let the bridle of my horse fall, and if he had not held me up, I had fallen my self; he then took me by the Arme, and one of my men helping him, they took me off my horse very gently, and set me upon the ground some two paces from the way, where I lay in a sound: Polimnis was then in a pitifull case, to see his friend dying, and his Cousin dead: but as he was very busie about me, and the Coach came nearer, he was extreamly surprised to hear Ladies in it laughing and singing; then did he rise up to look who they were, and he saw Leontina in the Boot of the Coach, who knowing him caused it to stay, that she might ask him what he was doing there, but casting her eyes at the same time upon me; Oh Heavens! said she, is not that the Prince Artibies which I see? Yes, replied he, it is the same, and he is in great need of your help; but said he unto her, how did you rise from the dead, for all in Thebes thinks you so? It is not now a time to tell you, replied she, but rather to help your friend: In saying so, she came out of the Coach, as all the rest of h•r friends did, and commanding one of her men to go in all haste unto the next house for some water to fetch me out of my sound, Leontina did most charitably come to me, and laid her hand upon my Arme, to try how my pulse did beat: Mean while he who w^ont for water, returning, they threw some in my face, and by little and little I revived. But Oh Heavens! how was I surprized to find my self in that condition, and to see my admired Leontina livⁱng, though my imagination during this long sound was filled with her death. When Polimnis saw what I would revive, he came towards Leontina, who turned towards him, asked what was the cause of this accident: Your self, inhumane Cousin, said he unto her, and then in few words he told her, the news of her false death, was the cause of his true and real sor^row: but though she seemed not to believe it, yet she afterwards told me, that she was fully perswaded of it, especially by my manner of looking upon her, when I returned unto my self, by the confusion I was in, to find my self in that condition, and by an hundred other things which I did and said upon that occasion.

But in conclusion, after I was fully assured that Leontina was living, and had thanked her for her charitable help, she would not suffer me to take horse, but desiring her friends to make room for me, she took me into her Coach, which I was constrained to accept of, for I had not yet recovered out of my weakness and sorrows. In our return to Thebes, I unde^rstood, how that which raised the reports of her death, was that indeed she found the River of Ismenes very high, and being likely to be put to swim, she thought of no way but perishing, yet by good fortune they turned the Coach back again to the side, and it did not overturn until they were near the Banks, so that she and all her friends were easily relieved, and rid out of their fears to be drowned; but they stayed a day to refresh themselves after this fright, and resolved not to continue on their journey, until the River was lower: so it is to be imagined, that some or other seeing only the Coach overturned, had raised this report. However, this accident was very favourable unto me; and the mute eloquence of my sounding had more Rhe^ltori^k in it to perswade Leontina, then all my words: I found her, me thought, nothing so rigid unto me as she used; and if it were pertinent at this time to remember delightful passages, I should tell you that for two months together, I fully tasted of all the sweets, which hopes of being loved could feast me with all; but since it is not at all pertinent, I shall only tell you, that after so many happy days Antigenes (as you heard from Philocles) arrived at Thebes, and there, as many others did, fell in love with Leontina. As he was a man of a very pleasant conversation, of an agreeable disposition, quick-witted, and gallant, he moved so much jeal^ousie in me, as maugre all my endeavours, I could not hide it, and I think that once I made it too apparent unto Leontina, in so much as she was more offended with me for my jealousy, then she was for my love, when I had made it known unto her; so that both to correct and punish me, she treated Antigenes more civilly, then ordinary. In conclusion, the matter was so carried, that though Leontina knew well enough, she did not love Antigenes, yet to be revenged on me, she resolved to treat him more favourably then any. And since her heart was not placed in her forehead, every one believed that she preferred Antigenes before all the test of her Servants: and all my friends at Thebes, came to comfort me; in so much as my sorrows and my spite, made me resolve to overcome my passion: I contended with it, and Page 60 I vanquished, at least thought so, for I could never look upon Leontina without anger; I shunned her with care, and I thought that I passed from one extremity unto another, and halted her. Then did I desire Polimnis, that we might go and hunt for a certain time at a stately house his father had, about an hundred Leagues from Thebes, beyond Mount Helicon, thither then we went, and my soul, as I thought, was in much tranquility, and sufficiently disⁿgaged from Leontina.

Upon a day, a friend of Polimnis invited us to a feast, where we were all in our altitudes of meriment and joy, with divers other persons of quality in that Neighbourhood. That same day, unjust man that I was, in my height of railery I mocked two or three times, at the complacency of Leontina towards Antigenes, my heart being, as I thought, never better pleased, then when I had handsomly twitted the person whom I hated, or thought I had hated: Then it happened that a man came in, and addressed himself unto me, who had heard all the passages of our discourse concerning her; Sir, said he, Artibies will be sufficiently revenged, for Antigenes shall never enjoy Leontina: How, (said I unto the man) has she quitted him for another, as she did me for him? No, said he, but death has done it for you both. Is Leontina dead? (said I unto him) Yes, replied he, she died at Chalcos, whither her father had carried her: Indeed I understood that she had been in the Isle of Eub^eus, for since it is separated from Boetia only by a little Arm of the Sea, the families of quality do make alliances one with another, and Leontina had an Aunt at Chalcos. This man then told me that there came certain news unto Thebes, that Leontina was dead, and that one of his friends assured him in the Ismeⁿian Temple of Apollo, that he saw her Funeral at Chalcos, I looked upon him then, and spoke not a word, and afterwards I left the Company very abruptly with an extremely troubled mind, and knew not what to think on it. I lost my self in a Wood, not far from the house, purposely because Polimnis should not find me; my soul was sadly troubled, my heart was sobbing out my sorrows, and my reason was not against the troubles of my spirit: I would have perswaded my self, that to lose her who had treated me ill, and one whom I hated, was rather a good then a bad misfortune. But alas, my imagination no sooner fancied this adored Lady in her Tomb, but my hatred vanished, and my love revived: I did not any longer consider her as inconstant, or unjust, but did look upon her as the fairest in the world, and as her whom above all upon Earth, I loved, I made some slight attempts to quell my sorrow, but it was impossible for me to do it: and love, since I became past all hopes, returned into my soul with all its vigour: as soon as I apprehended Leontina gone, all other cogitations vanished out of my mind; and despair was so predominant, that I was not a Master of my own actions: I walked sometimes fast, sometimes slow, sometimes I stopt, and spoke aloud, though I was alone, and sometimes shed tears in abundance of bitterness, and sometimes again my heart was so full, that I could neither cry, nor sigh, nor speak: but Polimnis afterwards knowing this news of Leontina's death from the same man, he sought me out, and having found me in a most deplorable condition, and as he told me afterwards, more altered in my face then ever he saw man in his life; What, said he unto me, can the Prince Artibies lament the death of her he hated? and is he more troubled at it then I am, who have more reason to grieve then he? My hatred (said I unto him sighing) is dead with Leontina, and my love is revived to punish me for hating her. Indeed, my grief did cause such a prodigious resentment in my soul, that I never was more deeply plunged in the gulf of love then now, and by consequences never more unfortunate: Two days together, was I in this condition, at the end of which a violent feavor seized upon me, but for my cure and comfort, I afterwards understood that this news of Leontina's death was false: and that it was true there was an admirable beauty whose name was also Leontina, was dead at Chalcos, but that she was only a Kinswoman to that Leontina at Thebes; I understood also, that their conformity in name and beauty, had deceived those who had spread abroad the rumour of my dear Leontina's death. Polimnis no sooner knew this, but coming unto me with open Arms; Courage Artibies, (said he unto me, imbracing me, and smiling) you must now begin to hate Leontina again, since she is not dead; and then he told me the original of the error, which caused so great a confusion in me, that passing from extream sorrow, into the contrary extreamity of joy, my feaver in^creased, and it was thought I would have died that night following, but the Gods reserved me for a further misery, and restored my health; bringing me also unto Thebes, where I found Leontina alive: I had a desire to hate her still, but it was impossible. Why (said I sometimes unto my self) has this false report, which has wrought no alteration in the heart of Leontina, so much changed mine? yet must I submit, whether I will or no, unto this new revived passion, which has got the dominion of my mind, sometimes I was ashamed, and sometimes Page 61 again I rejoiced at it: supposing, that to be in the world, and not to love Leontina, was the most high injustice upon Earth. Yet when she was informed by Polimnis, that my love of her was the cause of my Feaver (as indeed she did not hate me) she changed her way of living both with Antigenes and my self: and conferred those favours upon me, which she withdrew from him, and if he had not gone out of Thebes presently after, he had found by experience how sad a thing it was to see another better loved then himself.

I did then mollifie the heart of Leontina: she permitted me to express my love unto her, and indeed acknowledged unto me, that if her parents would consent unto it, she would like better to live in Cicilie, then in Greece, though there was a great difference, in the goodness of the Countries: yet was I not without great crosses, for the father of Leontina, would not consent to marry his daughter out of his own country: This obstacle was extremely tormeⁿtive, and seemed invincible, for since the father of Leontina would not marry his daughter un^to a stranger, the Prince of Cicilie my brother, would not permit me to dwell there as a bare Citizen of Thebes. I was then grieved to see Leontina, persecuted by her parents for the love of me, for I understood that the resistance which they made unto my designe, did most sensible greive her; But yet after ten thousand crosses and thwartings Polimnis did so earnestly sollicite the matter, as he removed this Remora, and won the parents of Leontina to give her unto me, provided the Prince of Cicilie consented unto my marriage: I immediately sent unto him, and by the mediation of the Princess my mother, who was a Theban, I obtained his consent. Now, you may imagine me the happiest man alive. Leontina was never so fair as then; and since she now lived with me more freely then usual, and expressed such thoughts of her Soul as were advantagious unto me, I thought that never was felicity comparable unto mine. No^thing was thought upon but Feasts and pleasures: All preparations for our marriage were in readiness: as a magnificent Feast, as all rich marriage clothes; a mask also was prepared, and a general Bill was to be kept three days together: In conclusion, that day, which I thought the happiest that ever dawned, did come, and in the morning I saw Leontina in a most glorio^us dress, who notwithstanding her modesty was pleased to make it appear in her eyes, that she did participate in my joy: She was conducted unto the Temple by her father, and waited upon by all the Ladies in the Town: I also waited upon her, according unto the custom, and was accompanied by all my friends: But as soon as she came to the Alter, she was suddenly taken, as she said, with an extream pain, and terrible beating at her heart, she was forced to sit down, not being able to kneel any longer: and finding her self very ill, she was forced to complain unto some of her Cousins which were next her: As my eye was always upon her, I saw she grew high coloured, and was very sick. But alas, why should I insist so long upon vain circumstances? Leontina could not accomplish the Ceremony: she was so good as to excuse it unto me, and they carried her home in a chair, where a feaver feized suddenly upon her: and notwithstanding her youth, and all the art of Physicians, and notwithstanding all my prayers, the seventh day her disease was at the height: you may suppose that as the terms stood then betwixt us, I had the liberty to see her, during her sickness, at all houres, which handsomeness would permit: I saw her then endure it with admirable patience, and she seemed to be sorry for nothing, but that she was to leave me: she did hide a great part of her pain from me, least it should too much grieve me: and though she thought to dye, ever since the first minute of her falling sick, yet would she not speak a word of her death unto me, until the last day of her life: Oh most dismal and unhappy day! I saw her then endure and hardly complain, and I received from her own dear mouth, a thousand assurances of a most innocent, and pure affection: she desired me to continue mine unto her memory, after her death: and after she had invoked the Gods, she commanded me to submit, as she her self did, unto their will; her speech failed, yet she still looked upon me; and after her sight was also gone, yet she held her hand out, and weak as she was she gave it unto me; then breathing out a deep sigh, she expired, not loosing one jot of her beauty, nor struggling into any unseemly posture. Ask me not, Oh my just Judg, what I did or what I thought, since you may well imagine, that a man who grieved for her whom he was not loved, and wept for her whom he thought he hated her, would be absolutely desperate, when he saw her dying, before his eyes, at such a time when he was beleved, and steady to enjoy her; I apprehended it so sadly, that if Polimnis had not been, I had killed my self at the first minute of my sorrow; but his care of me was so great, that I may almost call him the cause of all my sorrows I have suffered since that time, and of all those I shall suffer hereafter: I thought the face of the whole Universe was altered: I look^ed not upon any thing as I was wont, or to say better, I saw nothing but Leontina either dead or dying: when they took me away by force from that fair Corps, her image did follow me Page 62 in all places: and drooping as I was it appeared to my phancy in a hundred different manners: her Tomb was more sacred unto me, then the Temple: her Name as holy as Angels; and my sorrows were so sweet unto me, that I hated all them that would comfort me: Although the places where I had been with her, did augment my grief, yet did I frequently visit them: Those whom she did tenderly love were they only whom I could endure, and although I had been alone in the world, I could not have been more sadly solitary, and whosoever has not tried what it is to see her whom he loves, die, doubtless do not know the most supream misfortune. I do confess absence to be a great misery, but what kind of absence can be comparable unto that eternal and terrible absence, which is never to return, which carries the party beloved into such obscure and dark Cells as humane spirits cannot enter: and into such sad and doleful places, from whence no news of her is ever to be hoped for: Truly my apprehensions are so strange, as oft as I imagine, that the most fair and perfect Leontina should be no more then an heap of ashes; that I am astonished, any should offer to contend with me for the first place amongst unfortunate men. I know very well, that not to be loved is a grand misfortune, but to lose her whom one loves, and to lose her for ever, is a far greater: for he who is not loved, does wish and desire a happiness which he never had any trial of, nor does he know the sweets be^longing unto love; whereas to see her (who honoured a man with her affection) to die, is to lose a Treasure which he possessed, and whose riches he knew how to value: Moreover, the worst treated Lover in the world may yet comfort up his heart with some hopes, which he, whose Mistress is in her Tombe, can never have: his soul is abandoned of all comforts, and re^mains in such a horrid despair, as certainly is inconceivably by any but such as had had experience of it: nor am I ignorant that jealousy is a terrible torment; yet whosoever shall well consider the cause of jealousy, shall find, that fear to lose her he loves, is it which causeth his disquiet: for if he were assured, he should never lose his Mistress, his soul would be serene, not would he care a pin for having an hundred Rivals: Moreover, a jealous lover may find out an hundred ways to busie himself in, out of which he may find out some comfort: But to see her one loves in her coffin, is such a miserable object as leaves the soul in so sad an quietness, as is a thousand times worse then all the pains in the world he knows not whither to go, nor what to do; all the Universe is indifferent unto him: The more pleasant the time past was unto him, the more insupportable it makes the present, and all the time of his life which is to come, has nothing sweet, but his hopes of death. Moreover, jealousy being a passion, which of its own nature is mutable, various, changing, and uncertain; it produces fear and hope an hundred times in a day, and by consequence admits of some relaxation of mind: But the death of the party loved is a torment continually rigorous, which no time can ever remove: for indeed, though I should live out an hundred Ages, yet would Leontina be the same unto me, as now she is, dead: Slight, petty sorrows may be lessened by habit, custome, and time; but grand, and violent afflictions, the longer they last, the more insupportable they are, and more augment: Let me further tell you, that the impossibility to find a remedy for such a sorrow, is only a cause of consolation in the mouths of Philosophers; but in the soul of a Lover, it is the greatest torment of all others: Yes, yes, that horrid thought, that all the Kings upon Earth, that all the valour of Heroes, that all humane Prudence, cannot revive a dead beloved Mistress, is that which properly can be called an abridgment of all the sorrows which love can cause: Pronounce the sentence then, Oh my most just Judge, that I am the most worthy of your pity, by reason of great misfortune; and I shall confess that the miseries of Timocrates, of Philocles, and of Leontidas, do more deserve your pity, then mine does, in respect of their own personal merits, so that rendering justice both unto the misfortune, and the misfortunate, I shall have less cause to complain of your Equity, then I have to complain of my Destiny.

The Prince Artibies ended his discourse with so much sadness of heart, that he had much ado to pronounce the last words distinctly, so extremely did the remembrance of Leontina's death perplex his mind: his melancholy did participate it self unto all the souls of that Illustrious Company: and he forced compassion, even from them that contended with him, for the first Rank amongst the unfortunate: Notice was taken of his ingenious and passionate silence, by which he concealed the rest of his adventures, since the death of the fair one whom he loved; as if he would tacitely intimate unto them, that since her death he did not value his own life. After that melancholy humour, which this fatal Story had caused in their minds, was a little dissipated, every one maintained his own opinion, and that with obstinate heat. But Cyrus, seeing it was late, told Martesia, that it was time Leontidas related Page 63 his adventure and reasons, if she intended to pronounce judgment that day, so that as a Judge imposing silence, she appointed Leontidas to begin: which accordingly he did in this manner.

The jealous Lover: The fourth Story.

Since Sorrow has its different operations, according to the several tempers of those who are possessed with it; since it is sometimes mute, and sometimes eloquent, you must not wonder, if it work not in me, as it does in the Prince Artibies, who by reason of his excess of sorrow, has shortened his relation: But I, who am none of those whom sorrow makes dumb, and who on the contrary never speaks but when I have great cause of complaint, cannot do so; nor can I, as I conceive, in few words express the greatness of my sufferings. I shall be as little impertinent as I can, and therefore in short, give me leave to tell you, that the Isle of Cyprus is my Countrey, and that I have the honour to be of a Family sufficiently illustrious; I shall hereafter tell you, that I went out of this famous Isle which is consecrated unto the Mother of love, so young, that I had not time to fall in love with any: for the war which was then between the people of Samos, of Priennes, and of Miletos, moving me to learn there, that mystery, which the drowsie peace of my Countrey could not teach me, I left it; and in my choice of these three Countreys, the fame of the valiant Policrates, who was made Sovereign in the Isle of Samos, did invite me into his, though perhaps his cause was not the most just, unless you will allow the Right of Conquerours, to be the most ancient of all others. So then, it was in this famous Isle, and in the Court of this illustrious Prince, where my Love took first beginning, and where my jealousy has treated me cruelly. The reputation of the happy Policrates is so great, that I need not characterize him unto you: yet notwithstanding shall in few words tell you, that justice would have much ado to find a man in all Greece more accomplished then he, nor more fit to distribute his favours with more equity, rendering himself most perfectly happy, without giving cause of murmur unto any. He is as never man before was; for he is born only a Citizen of Samos, and he is become Sovereign of the same without hate: he has all the Authority of a most absolute Tyrant, yet he enjoys the love of his people as much as if he were their Father: All designs of war are prosperous under his hands; he is become terrible, not only in the Jonian, but through all the Aegean Sea; The greatest Kings think it an honour to be his Allies, and all his Neighbours both love and fear him: he is very handsome, of a good presence, and great Spirit, of a disposition, as sweet in time of peace, as it is furious in time of war: you may well suppose then, that the Court of Policrates must be very delightful and gallant; since it is commonly like as the Prince, so is his Court: when I arrived at Samos, he was ready to imbarque, and to go and fight with the Prince of the Milesians; so that after I was presented unto him, by a man of quality, named Theanor, whom I knew at Paphos, I imbarqued the next day with him, before I had seen any in Samos, but only Officers of Gallies, with one of which called Timesias, I had a quarrel at my imbarquing, and two other small squabbles during the voyage: This expedition was not long, but very prosperous; and we returned Conquerours over those we fought against. Policrates at his return unto Samos, was entertained with high magnificence: and since I had so much happy honour to get some part of his love during our Navigation, so had I also some share in those delights which he was pleased to take at his return. The same night I came to Samos, after all the magnificence which was prepared for the entry of Policrates was past, Theanor whom I affected as much as I was averse unto Timasias, would needs shew me, as a stranger, all the rarities of the Town. He carried me into the Temple of June, unto whom that Island was consecrated, which doubtless is one of the greatest and fairest in the world, and which they more esteemed at Samos, because the Architect who built it was a Samion: from thence we walked towards a famous Water-course, which surpasseth the greatest wonder that ever I saw in the world; for it runs through a Mountain which is an hundred fathom high, upon the top of which is a way made, which is above seven furlongs in length, and eight foot wide: at the end of this way is digged a pond about twenty Cubits deep, and from this most clear and abundant fountain they conduct water into the Town: after I had well admired at this prodigious work of Eupalina, (for the undertaker of this Water-course who was of Magares, was so called) we came into the Town, and went to walk upon a Hill, some twenty fathom high, and two furlongs in length, and above, which extends towards the Sea, and railed on both sides with Balasters of Corinthian Copper, which makes the goodliest object in the world when one comes to Samos: < > much to know the beginning of Autumn, and the season Page 64 of the year most pleasant, a great number of Ladies resorted thither to walk towards the Evening, as it was the custom of the Countrey: at this time they came in greater numbers then ordinary, for since we had taken four Gallies from the enemy, it was a kind of honour unto Policrates to be desirous of seeing those marks of his victory: All the Ladies therefore of Samos came thither where we were; all the men of quality, as well those that had been the Voyage, as those which stayed behind, came thither also: The Prince Policrates himself did take a turn or two, and indeed I never saw so glorious a sight, as this walk, and those in it: The Sea was all serenity, and though the Sun was set, yet was there day and light enough to discern the beauty of all the Ladies: since I knew none of them as yet, I looked upon them all with indifference; I was much pleased to see some leaning over these stately Ballisters, and beholding the Gallies gained from the enemy; and others less curious, but more solitary, looking only upon the open Sea: some complement which such Captains as they had not seen since their return; others in more serious and private conference; others again without any designe but to see, and be seen, walked by Troops, and the general designe of all was to walk, and talk, and take the pleasure of the Evening. Theanor was not a little troubled in telling me the names of all the beauties; for as for all the rest, I spared him the labour of information: since this divertisement was new unto me, and that it was long since I saw any Ladies, I made it late before I could resolve upon departure, yet the night drawing on by little and little, we could hardly distinguish one another: but yet many men came still in, because the Moon began to rise.

Theanor having left me to speak unto some Lady; I walked a while alone, and after several turns, walking behind two men, whom I did not think I had known, I saw something white fall from the pocket of one of them: my first thought was to tell him, but not knowing any reason why, my second was to take up that which I saw fall, and afterwards to give it him, after I had seen what it was: stooping then presently, and finding what I sought for, I looked, and saw as well as the obscurity of the night would permit, that it was a Case of a Picture: The time while I took it up, and looking what it was, also considering whether I should look in it, or restore it before I looked, was so long, that he who had lost it, did mingle among other company: so that in lieu of seeing two men before me, I saw a Troop of Ladies, and found it impossible to restore that which I had found unto the right owner: after this I looked for Theanor, to tell him my adventure, but the darkness of the night had so separated us, that we could not meet, but staying no longer, I went unto the house where I lodged at my first coming to Samos, my Servants according to my orders staying there for me, I went in all haste with a longing curiosity to see what I had found: I was no sooner come into my Chamber, but going unto the Table, and the Candle, I began to look upon this Picture which I had pulled out of my pocket, as I came up the stairs, that I might sooner see it; and I found that it was Gold with a circle of Rubies and Diamonds round about it: and I did not stand any longer looking upon it, though it was very curious and rich, but opening the lid hastily, I was more dazzled at the splendent beauty of what I found within it, then I was at the lustre of those jewels which adorned this Case: I found there the picture of a young and a fair woman, but so fresh and lively, that I did not conceive it a flattering piece: and one might easily see by the excellency of the Art, that the Limner took delight in drawing after so fair a Model: It must be confessed, that nothing upon earth could be more beautiful then this picture: I looked upon it therefore with admiration; and calling to mind the Ideas of all which I had seen fair in the walk, I could not remember I had seen that Lady whom this Picture resembled, and indeed she was not there: I opened, and shut this Case several times, being not able to forbear looking, and admiring at so fair a thing, afterwards I began to pity him who lost it, and sometimes also; I envied him; for I imagined that it was given unto him, and I esteemed him so infinitely happy in being loved by so fair a Lady, that I was troubled at it: yet at the last I went to bed and slept, but it was not without a dream of this picture which I found; I rose the next morning very early, but with so hot a curiosity to know the Lady whose shadow this was, and him who had this so considerable loss, that my curiosity might almost be termed jealousy: I dressed my self in all haste, and I went unto Theanor, who was ready to go out of his lodging: he excused himself for losing me last night in the croud, but giving him no time to continue his complement, and not taking any notice of his melancholy I told him that our separation was so happy unto me, as I had rather cause to thank, then complain against him; for (said I, shewing him the Case and Picture) see what I found last night, and help me, I conjure you, to discover who that happy Lover is, who has been so unhappy, as to lose so precious a jewel, a <...> ards the Name of this beauty, if you Page 65 know it. Theanor blushed at the sight of the picture, and after he had taken it in his hand, he was a long time looking upon it, as if he had not known the party it resembled, but urging him to speak, As for the name of this fair Lady, said he unto me, if you were not a stranger in Samos, you would not be ignorant of it: for the fair Aloidamia has rendered it too famous, to be unknown unto all that have any reasonable Souls in our Island: but as for that happy lover, as you call him, who lost it, I know him not, but perhaps, said he, this picture was bestowed upon some of her friends: But said I unto him, it was a man who let it fall, and not a lady; That may be also, replied he, for she has several Cousins, whom she might bestow a picture upon, without any scandal unto her honour: but if you will follow my advice, said he, you shall not shew this picture unto any, lest you should make so fair a Lady your enemy: It is not my intention (said I unto him) to provoke her, but I have a very great desire to know this Lady whom this picture represents: I shall better inform my self, said he unto me, and then I shall render you an account, but in the mean while, speak not a word of this picture, but if you please leave it in my hands, for I believe it will be as safe, in mine, as yours: for, said he, I have a kind of fear you cannot for bear shewing it unto some or other. I promise you, said I unto him, neither to speak of it or shew it unto any; but pardon me if I do not render it unto any but him who lost it; and that too but unwillingly, for it does infinitely please me. Theanor used all his arguments, that he might keep it, but I did so obstinately deny it, that he was forced to be contented: after which we went unto Policrates at Court, and with him unto the Temple. After dinner, this Prince did me the honour to present me unto the Princess Hersilea his sister, who was a Lady most admirably accomplished, with whom there was then many Ladies, and amongst the rest, one named Meneclida, with whom it was said Policrates was in love. There also did I see the wonder of the world Alcildamia, so admirably fair, that I never saw any so amiable. The Princess Hersilea willing to grace a new Favorite of the Kings, did place me next this glorious beauty, whose Soul did so powerfully second the charms of her face, that I could no longer preserve my freedom. TheJanor coming into the company, and seeing me next Alcidamia, seemed unto me, as if he were troubled at it, yet did not then take any notice of it: and my mind was also so much disordered, that Alcidamia had not any reason to think my conversation very agreeable. Which of all these (said I in my self, in looking upon all the men which followed Policrates to his sister) is that both happy and unfortunate lover who has lost this picture which I have found?

Afterwards I began to think how much this Lady would be astonished, if I should shew her this picture which I had about me: afterwards I bethought my self, how unfortunate that man would be, who should fall in love with so fair a Lady as this, whose heart might perhaps be already engaged: and indeed I had a thousand several thoughts in a short time, and it may be almost said, that jealousy, which uses to follow love in others, did precede it in me, since it is certain that I found all the symptoms of jealousy in me, before ever I gave her any testimony of my love any manner of way: I enquired very diligently of all the lovers of Alcidamia, hoping to find out him unto whom this picture belonged: but those of whom I enquired told me, That there was not a man of quality in all Samos which loved her not, so that all my conjectures finding no foundation, but (said I unto them) has she not made choice of any? That is a thing (said they) not easily to be discovered, for Alcidamia is wise, and able to disguise her thoughts if she please; all we can say is, that if she have any Favorite, her discretion conceals him, since it is certain there goes no rumour of any about the Court. Thus did two or three days pass away, during which time I often saw Alcidamia either with the Princess, or in the Temple, or walking, or at her own house, for I urged Theanor to carry me thither: I say I urged him, for he excused it as much as he could: Mean while, I was continually conjuring him to tell me if he could, to whom the picture of Alcidamia belonged, and he always answered me, that this unprofitable curiosity ought at the least to be well intended; and that though he did know whose it was, yet would he never tell me, unless I would promise him before hand to make good use of that knowledge, and not incense Alcidamia by it. Since I did not yet think I should be fettered in the chains of love, I promised him what he desired: so that a few days after, he came one morning unto my chamber, and seeming to be very joyfull, Leontidas, said he unto me, I have at last discovered him, unto whom the picture which you found belongs, and he is a person of so high a quality as you have reason to rejoyce that it is in your power to do him so great a favor as to restore it. I blushed at this discourse of TheJanor, who seeing me change my colour, changed himself also, and asked me why I did not thank him, and satisfie his curiosity and desire? It is Theanor, answered I, because I have altered my mind, and now do fear as much to know who is the owner, as I desired it before; Page 66 and my reason is, because I cannot yet resolve to restore it: But I am engaged that you shall, (answered Theanor much surprized) for I did not think you desired to know the owner, with any intention to do him so much injustice. But yet Theanor, (said I unto him) I beseech you who is the owner? I must not tell you, replied he, since you will not restore it: The party who permitted me to trust you with this secret, did not allow me to acquaint you, but upon condition you will restore it, for otherwise it is not just to acquaint you with such a secret as this. But said I unto him, is he who owes this picture in love with Alcidamia? Desperately, replied he: And was this picture given him by that fair Lady? When you have restored it me, replied he, you shall know that, but until then, I have no commission to tell you any thing. Cruel friend, replied I unto him, I had rather have this picture then your secret, and if I restore it unto any, it shall be rather to the party who gave it, then to him who lost it: Oh Leontidas, said Theanor, I beseech you do not as you say, unless you intend most absolutely to disoblige me. As we were thus talking, one came and told me, that Policrates asked for me, so that I was constrained to leave Theanor: but, oh Heavens, how melancholy was I all that day! for indeed after this which Theanor told me, I doubted not but my conjectures were well grounded, and that this picture was not given by Alcidamia unto him that lost it. I began to perceive also that I was not right master of my reason; and I resolved to love Alcidamia notwithstanding all will or reason, or any thing else. Am I not very inconsiderate (said I unto my self) to suffer such a growing passion without any opposite, which most apparently will cost me abundance of sorrow? I know that Alcidamia has fixed her love, and what would I obtain of her? Shall Leontidas suffer a Rival to rest in the heart of this beauty? or shall he drive him out? But who is the Rival, said I? alas, alas, I know him not at all; perhaps it is some man, who is unworthy of such an honour; perhaps it is Theanor himself, and whosoever it be, said I, he is not over passionate a lover, since he does not make himself known by his death, after such a loss: All this while Theanor was no more at rest then I, for, to discover the truth unto you, he was in love with Alcidamia, and it was himself who lost this picture, though he durst not confess it unto me: for since I was very young, he durst not trust too much unto my discretion, but thought to scruce this picture out of my hands by craft, and under the name of another: and observing indeed that I was become his Rival, he knew not what course to take, so that both of us were much perplexed, for Theanor knew that Alcidamia would extremely hate him, if she should know he had lost this picture, and I also feared as extremely that it was his. Then did I enquire of several persons, whether Theanor was in love with Alcidamia, and to my sorrow I found he was: you may then imagine how much I was troubled at it, for I was obliged to love him, both by my own inclination, by reason, and indeed by duty, since indeed he had done me many great favours towards Policrates, and had taken my part with much zeal against Timasias, of whom I spoke before, so that I found it against the Law of generosity, not to resist my passion; and I strived with all my power to give a check unto my self, but all in vain, for love did so much, and so absolutely command my Soul, and so much withdrew my affection from Theanor, that I was often in a wonderful confusion. Alcidamia was then ever predominate in my heart, and it was more easie for me to quit my friend, then her whom without any comparison I loved more then he: All my business was then to colour this infidelity, and to that end I thought it best to acquaint him first with my passion, feigning to be ignorant of his. I went unto him, and found him in his chamber more unquiet then my self, for he began to suspect me for his Rival. Theanor, for ought I see (said I unto him) is as melancholy as Leontidas, though doubtless he be not so amorous. Since we have been almost always in the wars together, ever since we were acquainted (answered he very coldly) we never discoursed but of gallant matters, and I do not know, why you should now suppose that you are more amorous then I, or that I cannot be so much as you. My meaning is (said I unto him, a little damp, for I knew that what I did was not very generous) that if it be as true you love any Lady violently, as it is certain I do most desperately love the incomparable Alcidamia, I shall extremely pity you, as I desire you to pity me. I thought (replied Theanor with such a coldness as much surprized me) that your heart could not avoyd the charms of that beauty: But Leontidas (said he after a little study) you are not he alone who loves that enchanting Lady, and that picture which you found, ought (me thinks) to have nipt your growing passion in the bud. But quite contrary, said I unto him, it is that which makes it grow the faster, for when I do not see Alcidamia, then I do look upon it, and it preserves the memory of her beauty so fresh in my Soul, that I can never forget it. After this, Theanor was a while silent; afterwards assuming a more serious countenance, he told me, that loving me as he did, he was very sorry to see me engaged in a love which would cost me much sorrow, and that if it were permitted him to name the Rival unto whom that picture belonged, he should make me acknowledg, Page 67 that I ought not any longer to continue loving Alcidamia: Though you should make me acknowledg it, said I unto him, yet all would be in vain, because my passion does not depend upon my will: though it should be your self which is that happy Rival you speak of, or though it should be Policrates himself, yet must I continue loving Alcidamia: Love then Alcidamia, said he unto me blushing, but never hope to be so soon loved again, and do not perswade your self that she will ever give you her Picture; for I can assure you, that he who is owner of that which you have, did not obtain it without abundance of sorrow and trouble, although she do not hate him unto whom she gave it.

Cruel friend, said I unto him, why do you infuse as much jealousy as love in me? Because, replied he, I would cure your love by your jealousy. No no, said I unto him, that's not the way to destroy it, and the more you make me know that Alcidamia does favour that happy Rival, the greater envy and desire shall I have to distrub his felicity, and the more resolutely shall I continue loving Alcidamia. Let me tell you once again, said he unto me, you may continue loving Alcidamia, but let me also tell you once again, that you shall not be so soon loved: I confess that this coldness of Theanor made me almost despair: for after I had consulted with my reason, I concluded that this coldness of his proceeded from his confident assurance of the affection of Alcidamia, so that not looking upon Theanor any longer as an officious friend, with whom I should keep any good correspondence, but I looked upon him as a Rival in favour, and by consequence as a mortal enemy: so that changing my designe, my countenance, and my voice, In the Name of the Gods, Theanor, said I unto him, tell me the name of him who is owner of this Picture, that I may exactly know whom to hate: I cannot, replied he, until you have restored the Picture of Alcidamia. The Picture of Alcidamia, (said I, not knowing almost what I said, since jealousy had so troubled all my senses,) No no, I cannot do it at the price of that Secret, which I desire to know; for not desiring to know the name of my Rival, but with intentions to remove him out of the heart of Alcidamia, I shall not restore him this Picture. However (said Theanor) I beseech you promise one just desire, which is, not to shew this Picture unto any; since thereby you do more wrong unto Alcidaamia, then to your Rival, who I believe will not become your enemy, until he see, that you find more favour then himself. I confess then, that I thought to have laid aside all patience, but several people coming in, we parted at that time, and I went from Theanor, the most sad and melancholy man alive. Certainly, said I, this cruel friend thinks himself so sure of Alcidia's heart, that he is in no fear to lose it: or else he scorns Leontidas so much, that he cares not for his being a Rival. But it may be, said I, that my conjectures may deceive me, and those who told me that Theanor loved Alcidamia, may be deceived themselves. At the last, I concluded, that either Theanor did not love Alcidamia, or else that he was loved: I wished the Gods, that it might prove the first of these. I being in these uncertainties, I resolved to satisfie my self a little better, and to talk unto this fair Lady, and to discourse of several things concernling Theanor, thereby, if possible, to discover the truth, so that not thinking to make my own passion known unto her, I endeavoured only to discourse concerning my Rival: I went then unto the Princess Hirsilea, where I knew she would be; and after that several people were come in, and gone out again, at the last I addressed my self unto Alcidamia, who according to her usual custom, entertained me with much civility; presently after, Policrates came in, and almost all the men of quality in Samos followed him, except Theanor, who melancholy retained him at home: after a little while of general discourse, Policrates having some private business with the Princess his Sister, took her to the window which opened unto the Main Sea, and left me an opportunity to execute my designe; me thought also that Alcidamia did contribute her willingness unto it, though truly, it was in such a manner as did add unto my unquietness: As it was but a little while that I had yet been at Samos, she had no reason to speak unto me concerning any thing, but general things; and as she had observed that Theanor was more friendly unto me then any other, so she was readier to entertain discourse with me, then those with whom I had yet no particular acquaintance. After then we two had been a while together, and said nothing one to another, What have you done with your friend, said she unto me, and how comes it to pass Theanor is not here, now all the Court is present? This unexpected question surprized me; and I could not hear the name of my Rival from the mouth of Alcidamia without a blush: for truly, though I intended to speak concerning Theanor, yet did I not think she would begin the first. Madam, said I unto her, I have left him in his Chamber so melancholy, that at the present I did not think his humour fit for company. You're then a very ill friend, said she unto me smiling, to leave your friend in such a case. It was because his humour was so sullen (said I unto her) that my presence was trouble some unto Page 68 him, and perhaps also more then anothers would be: In truth, Leontidas, replied she, you vex me, for Theanor is a very compleat gallant man, and if any great misfortune should befall him, I should be extremely sorry. Madam (said I, more unquiet, more curious, and none jealous then ever,) Since I have been but a while at Sames, I cannot be well acquainted with the news of the place; but you, who knows all, I suppose you are not ignorant, that TheJanor's disease, as I think, proceeds from a violent passion. Alcidia thinking then, that I would speak in behalf of Theanor, changed her colour, and looking upon me more seriously then before; I knew not, said she, that your friend was in love, neither do I think he is but indeed Leontidas, if there be no other cause of his melancholy, but that, I should not pity him so much as I do: It is because perhaps, (said I, and looked more attentively upon her) you know he is not to be pitied, but that he is loved by the party whom he loves. I know not, answered she, whether he be loved or hated, for I am neither his Mistress, nor his Confident. I wish the Gods that half you say were true, (said I, interrupting her very sharply) for Leontidas would then be much more happy then he is. Leontidas (said she smiling) was born in that Isle which was consecrated unto the Mother of Love, where Gallantry is Law, where they never speak of any thing but love; and where the Ladies are never entertained with any discourse but such as obliging, sweet, and flattering: but we who reverence another Deity, are less gallant then they, and also, if you please to have it so, something more severe, I must tell you as a stranger, that you must not mention any such things unto our Ladies, who would perhaps be more offended at you then I am, because they do not know how to excuse the evilstom of your Countrey as I do: All your Ladies? (replied I hastily) Ah Divine Alcidia, you do not know Leontidas, if you think he will ever say unto any other but you, that he is desperately in love. Seriously Leontidas, said she, either correct this ill habit which you have brought over with you, or I shall complain unto your friend, and desire him to break you off it, if it be possible. He cannot, answered I, though he should attempt it. Then must I fly your company, replied she, until such time as you have better learned our customs. It is the custom Madam, for all that, replied I, to adore such beauties as you: And it is also the general custom of all places, replied she, except Cyprus, that those beauties of whom you speak are glorious, noble, and severe, and will not suffer any discourse of such things. But is it possible, replied I, that all the beauties in Samos should be inexorable? Was there never any that would suffer themselves to be loved, and have permitted hopes that they themselves would hereafter love? and have bestowed their pictures upon their servants, and have been complacential many other ways unto such as they have accepted on? I know not, (said she, wondering why I should use this odd discourse;) or if I did, their example shall never be followed by Alcidamia. But however Leontidas, let me once more intreat you to leave off this ill custom, if you have a mind to enjoy any of my company. Alcidamia spoke this in such a manner, as I was afraid she would banish me her conversation: and since my jealousy persuaded me that she was so severe unto me only because she would be more faithful unto my Rival, even very spite made me entertain love still in my heart, so that beginning to speak again, If it be only an ill habit, said I unto her, you would be unjust to think it possible I can lay it off upon a sudden; therefore Madam, I conjure you to allow me some certain days to unaccustom my self: Alcidamia, who was very glad to turn the discourse into raillery, said, that she would allow me the rest of the day: but I used so many arguments, and urged her so much, that I obtained eight days, after which I was not to speak a word of my passion, or love, she telling and laughing, that she would complain unto Theanor, if I broke my word. Thus <◇> lieu of speaking of my Rival, Alcidamia spoke first unto me; and in lieu of discovering <◇> thoughts of him, I declared my love unto her: In my going out from the Princess, I thought my self for a while to be very happy in that I had let her know I loved her: but when called to mind all that Alcidamia said unto me, I observed that she changed colour as <◇> she heard Theanor named, and that I had no cause to doubt but that she loved him: then <◇> I become extremely restless in my mind, and if I had not had some obligations upon me <...> towards Theanor, I believe I should have found out more violent ways to satisfy my self, than those I took: yet not well knowing what course to take, I was most restlessly miserable. What will it advantage me, said I, to have the Picture of Alcidamia, if Theanor have <◇> heart? Give over then, that designe which may bring into an hundred inconveniences. <◇> perhaps, said I afterwards, this Picture was stolen from her, yet if it was so, yet certainly <◇> was stolen by some that was in love with her; and though it were happy for me if it <◇> so, yet it is a great misfortune to be Rival unto a man who hath obliged me: All this while <...> the soul of Theanor was no more quiet than mine: for as I told you before, he was passionately Page 69 in love with Alcidamia: from whom, as I understood afterwards, he had not obtained any thing: not but that the Picture which I found was his, but it was not given him by Alcidamia, who knew not that he had it; for he pleased to know that she caused it to be made, and gave it unto a friend of hers named Acasta, and indeed, it was she who was the owner of it. But within a little while after, Policrate being ready to imbarque for a fresh war, every one went to take leave of their acquaintance, and a great number of quality went unto Acasta, to bid her adieu; and amongst others, Theanor came, as she was newly gone out to make a visit; and when he found none below, he went into her Chamber, and found upon the Table the Picture of Alcidamia, which she had forgot to take with her; so that loving her, as he did, and being ready to depart out of Samos, he did, as I think my self should have done, if I had been in his room; that is, he took this picture, and not the Case, which indeed was too much to be taken, and went out so happily, that he was not seen by any. Presently after, Timasias who was a Cousin to Acasta, came unto the house, and found none in it also; he went into his Cousins, and found it as Theanor left it, that was, all open, and the Case of the Picture upon the Table, which he had forgot to shut: so that Timasias, who was also in love with Alcidamia, and had seen it often in the hands of his Cousin, wondered why the Picture was not in it: so that knocking to cause some to come unto him, he asked how it came to pass that the Case should lie upon the Table without the Picture? The women, much surprized at it, told them that they knew not, but said, they saw it there since their Mistress went out; afterwards they accused Timasias, being a Lover of Alcidamia, for taking it, and began to desire him that he would put it in again: he denied very hotly, and in the mean while Acasta returned, and heard of the business: at the first, she believed as her women did, and imagined that her Cousin, whom she knew to be much in love with Alcidamia, had taken it, and say what he could, she would believe no other, inasmuch as she was extremely angry with him: yet since he swore so deeply, that he took it not, that she enquired who else came into the house. But her women, to excuse themselves of their negligence, did swear, and protest, as also all the rest of the Domesticks, that there came none thither, but Timasias. Yet Theanor, to take away all suspicion of him, returned unto Acasta to bid her adieu, and not mentioning his being there before, she complained unto him of her loss, but he gave a crafty in lieu of a comforting answer, that if he had lost it, he should die for sorrow: In conclusion, he departed with his concealed treasure, and making another Case which he had to serve for that Picture, for all those Pictures are made almost of one size, he embarked as well pleased as Timasias was angry; for he imagined that it was some of his Rivals who had stolne this Picture.

In the mean while Alcidamia hearing of it, did at the first suspect that Acasta had given it unto her Cousin: But Acasta made it appear that it was otherwise, for she being persuaded that it was he who took it, she quite fell out with him at his return. Alcidamia for her part, took it extremely ill he should be so bold as to commit such a theft, and treated him very ill every time he spoke unto her after his return. As she was upon very civil terms with Theanor, though she did not much favour him, so she complained unto him, as she did unto others, and seemed to be so extremely offended at the Presumption of Timasias, that he durst never tell her it was himself who was the thief, fearing to incur that hatred, which she bore unto his Rival, who was the same man that became my enemy the first day I arrived at Samos. You see then, how Theanor not being any extraordinary Favourite, came unto the Picture of Alcidamia, for I came to know of all these passages most exactly afterwards: and you see also the reason why he would not tell me the Picture was his, which was, because he certainly knew Alcidamia would hate him as soon as she knew it. At the first my young years only did restrain him, but afterwards when he found that I was in love with Alcidamia, then he thought good to possess me with an imagination that she was in love, and that she had given this Picture unto some one, hoping thereby to avert me from my passion: he perceived, that though he had confessed unto me he loved her, yet that I would not give over loving her since I told him of it; so that, having no mind to fight with me, nor to ruin himself in the opinion of Alcidamia, by confessing it was he who stole the Picture, or by telling me a lye that she did give it unto him, he was as far from knowing what resolution to pitch upon as I was: and for some days we shunned one another with as much care as we sought for one another before. During which time, I saw Alcidamia, as oft as I could possible: and presuming upon that privilege which she had given me, I discoursed of my passionate love unto her, and she seemed always to think, that it was only a habit of speaking which moved me to express my self so unto her, bidding me to remember that I reckoned the dayes Page 70 aright, which she had allotted me. Yet being a whole day, and not seeing her, I went to walk by my self in the publick Gardens of the Town, which are as full of beauty as those of Policrates: and to contemplate with more freedom, I took a close walk, where having a desire to look upon the Picture of Alcidamia, I took it out of my pocket, and finding a convenient Seat, I began to consider it with much delight, but presently after I looked upon it with much melancholy, considering the cruel doom she had pronounced against him who lost it; and I think my jealousy moved me to pronounce some words, which moved Timasias, who unknown to me was walking in another Alley close by mine, to look who it was which spoke; for since I spoke but with a half voice, and had uttered but three or four words, he did not know me by my voice: he came then close up to the walk where I was, and looking through the thick leaves, he saw the Picture, and knew it to be of Alcidamia, and the same which she had heretofore given unto Acasta, and the very same that he took away; for he knew that Alcidamia had never suffered her picture to be taken but that once. Since it was but a little time that I had been in Samos, and since I had never any familiarity with Timasias since our last difference, he never perceived that I was in love with Alcidamia, so that he was extremely surprized to see the Picture of her he loved in the hands of his enemy, and a Picture also which had caused Alcidamia to hate him, and the same which every one thought he stole: That which did most amaze him, was, because he thought I was not acquainted with either Alcidamia, or Acasta, and since it was lost before I came unto Samos, so that he could not tell what to think of this adventure: yet being resolved to be further satisfied, he went hastily unto the end of that walk where I was, and found me so attentive in looking upon that Picture which I held in my hand, as all I could do was to shut the Case before he was close at me: since we were upon terms of civility, though there was no great love betwixt us, I rose up when he came near me, and after a cold salute, I offered to continue on my walk without staying with him, when he accosting me with a troubled aspect, Leontidas, said he unto me, although you are none of my intimate friends, yet since you are a man of honour, I hope you will tell me one truth, which much imports me, and which I much desire to know from you. I know not replied I, whether I shall tell you that truth which you desire to know, but I am certain, I shall not tell you a lye. Tell me then, said he, who gave you the Picture of Alcidamia, which by chance I saw in your hands as I was walking in the Alley joining unto this. Though so much curiosity, said I unto him, as you have to observe my actions, does not perhaps deserve so much sincerity, yet I shall tell you, that fortune only gave it unto me, and that I am not beholding unto any for it. Timasias hearing this answer, did think I would not tell him what I knew; so that being angry, I knew very well (answered he) that you have more cause to thank fortune for it, then the incomparable Alcidamia, who questionless would not give it you; but I ask, by what accident did blind fortune put it into your hands? Since I am not obliged (answered I with a much incensed spirit, because I had some suspicion Timasias was my Rival) to tell you all the truths I know, and that in the quality of a man of honour, I am only engaged to tell you no lye, I will not tell you any more, think what you please. But you shall tell me (replied he roughly) of whom you had that Picture. Leontidas (answered I, and looked fiercely upon him) was never used to <◇◇> which he has not any mind to have known, especially unto men who are not in the Catalogue of my friends. Then as your enemy (replied he, and laid his hand upon his Sword) I will make you acknowledge who gave you that Picture, and also compell you to restore it. No sooner had he said so, but without any return, I drew my Sword, and we began to fight: As he was very nimble, and I very lucky, we fought a good while without any hurt, but I coming close unto him, after I had given him a slight touch in the left Arme, we disputed the victory very stiffly; when we were in the heat of fight, and I had got so much advantage, as to present my Sword unto his breast, to make him acknowledge my victory, Policrates coming to walk there, entred; and followed by abundance of others, amongst the rest Theanor, who was the first who came in to part us. The fury wherein then I was to see that my old Enemy, and new Rival, should be pulled out of my hands, made me begin to quarrel with Theanor: But Policrates coming in, I was forced to change my course, and to ask him pardon, for, contrary to his Orders, quarrelling with Timasias. Since then he loved me more than my enemy, and since I was a stranger, and the other his Subject, all the blame did light upon Timasias; but he, desiring to justify himself, Sir, said he, if you did know the cause of our quarrel, doubtless you would excuse me, and say that I have done no more than I ought. I cannot believe, replied Policrates, that you had any reason to quarrel with Leontidas, and therefore, I would understand all the particulars of the business. Sir, (said I, even desperate that it must be known I had this Picture in my hands, and Page 71 fearing that Policrates should move me to restore it) you will spend a great deal of time, which would be better employed in many other things than this, and it will suffice, if you be only persuaded, that both of us have done nothing but what men of courage and honour ought to do: but say what I could Policrates was so solicited by Timasias, who desired to be justified concerning the theft of this picture, and to be satisfied concerning it, began to relate the business. Then Timasias putting them in mind of the loss of Alcidamia's picture (for all the Court knew it was taken away) and also putting them in mind how he as a lover of Alcidamia, was accused for it, and how ill she had treated him concerning it, he afterwards told them that he saw the same picture in my hands, and that he only desired to know of whom I had it, that he might thereby justify himself: knowing well that it was not I who took it, since I was not then at Samos when it was stolen from Acasta.

During this discourse of Timasias, I had variety of apprehensions in my mind, for I was extremely joyed to know certainly, by what he said, that this picture was not given unto him who lost it, and sometimes my jealousy diminished as much as my love increased, but seeing afterwards with what fervency my enemy spoke, and that I did contribute unto his justification, and perhaps unto his admission into Alcidamia's favour, I was then even absolutely desperate. Yet as soon as Timasias had done speaking, Policrates, who had a piercing wit, not yet imagining the truth of the business, and thinking only that I had a desire to conceal the name of him who gave me this picture, told me, that he would not move me to tell before all the world who it was, but desired me to tell him in private, which if I would do, it should suffice for the justification of Timasias, that I did publicly acknowledge, some one who likely did take it from Acasta, had given it unto me. I leave you to imagine how much I was joyed that I was not able to justify my enemy and my Rival: so that I began to relate with all ingenuity which truth could have, how I found it as I was walking:

concealing to my self the suspicions which I had that it was Theanor who lost it, for since they were only bare suspicions, I could not resolve in my mind, which of these two Rivals I had better ruine: at the first, my discourse did a little surprize Policrates, so that to confirm him better, I told him that Theanor, who was there by him, knew well I did not lye, since I went unto him, and told him the adventure which I had the first night I came unto Samos, and shewed him this picture, and out of my curiosity desired him to inform me who he might be who had lost it, and to tell me the name of her whom it represented. So Theanor was constrained to be my witness, and Policrates doubted not of the truth of what I said. So that it appearing I told no lye unto Timasias, and that he had no reason to think I spoke not sincerely unto him, he commanded us to embrace one another: but first Timasias beseeched Policrates that I should restore unto Alcidaemia the picture which I found: You make me beleeve, (said I then unto Timasias) that perhaps it was your self which lost this picture, and that repenting your self of that theft which wounded your reputation, you would have it restored. Timasias grew red in the face with anger at this discourse, and returned no answer, and that which did most vex him, was that every one beleieved it so, and publicly talked of it, and I beleieve Theanor did contribute all he could to make it pass so: for my part, I was even ravished to see Policrates laugh at what I said, and addressing my speech unto him, said, that it would be an odd thing, that since I took nothing from any one, they should oblige me to restore that which fortune gave me: or that I should be punished, before I committed a crime, or looked upon, like him who was the real robber, if he were known. Timasias would have answered, but Policrates beginning to speak, and desiring to take up this quarrel, told me that as my punishment, I should shew him this picture: Sir, said I unto him, it conduceth so much unto the honour of Alcidaemia to be seen, that I do it without any difficulty at all, upon condition you will promise me to do me so much honour as to restore it: Then after that promise I did shew it unto him: he no sooner saw it but looking upon the case, Leontidas, said he unto me, you need not wonder at the anger of Timasias, for by the richness of these precious stones wherewith it is set, it was to be imagined that perhaps you were his Rival, since it is not usual to be at such charges for an indifferent person: Sir (replied I) it was my fortune to find that picture in that case: yet to shew I am not covetous, I am ready to restore it without the picture, unto Timasias, if it was he who lost it. Policrates, fearing that this discourse might breed worse blood, commanded us peremptorily, to embrace one another, which without any incivility we did, though very coldly: after which, restoring me the picture, when he had contemplated it with such a seriousness as if he had never seen the person is represented, he told me smiling, that a lover of Alcidaemia would be very happy in having that honour which I had in it, and in obtaining that by fortune which would not have been so easily obtained from her self. After this, he went unto the princess his sister, and Page 72 would have me wait upon him: But as for Timasias he retired himself, being much grieved that his combate had no better success, but yet very glad in his imagination that what he had done might perhaps undeceive Alcidaemia, but for all that, he himself was deceived, for she still did think that it was he who took it, and afterwards lost it in walking, and to recover it again he fought with me. You may imagine what a noise this accident did make in the Court: and had published it, before we came unto the Princess, whither Theanor came not. Alcidaemia, who by chance was there, no sooner saw me but she blush'd, and was ashamed to know I should have her picture. As soon as Policrates entred, he caused me to come neerer the Princess Hersilea, by whom Alcidaemia stood: and relating unto them what they knew already, There needs no more, said he, to compleat this adventure, if Leontidas were really in love with Alcidaemia, as well as Theanor and Timasias are, the one of which is his friend, and the other his enemy; then might we see how one that is born in the Isle of Cyprus would carry himself amidst all those circumstances. Sir, said I unto him blushing, and smiling, if there need no more then that to make to adventure handsome, you need wish no more. Harken not Sir unto Leontidas (said Alcidaemia) as if he spoke seriously: for Sir, you know it is the custom of his Country to treat all Ladies thus: There are six days yet, said she, which I have to correct you in, and he hath promised me that afterwards he will speak no more in that manner unto me: How, said Policrates speaking unto Alcidaemia, have you given him leave to speak in that manner unto you, for six days? Yes Sir, replied she and blusht, but it is upon condition to speak no more so unto me afterwards; And we will beleeve him (said the Princess Hersilea smiling:) Indeed I cannot (replied Policrates looking upon Alcidaemia) for I am perswaded that since Leontidas has once told you that he loves, he will always tell you so; But it shall be in vain (replied Alcidaemia, since I shall not harken unto him: Yet Sir, said she, if it were fit, I could complain of a piece of injustice which you have done me, in not appointing Leontidas to restore my picture unto me. Policrates, having a pleasing phancy, as I understood afterwards, to see me vexed, answered, that his reason was, because he would not consent unto a thing of that nature at the request of Timasias, but at hers. If that be all, said she, I humbly beseech you, command him to restore it unto me presently. I can only intreat him (said Policrates) for I am not his Master. You may command me Sir, in all things, said I unto him, but as for this, I conceive it would be so unjust to do it, that I cannot beleeve you will: And what injustice is there in it, replied Alcidaemia, since it is but to render me my own? In truth, said the Princess, you have less right unto it then Leontidas; for did you not give it unto Acasta? Yes, replied she, but though I did, yet Leontidas has no right unto it. For my part, said Policrates, I find that Alcidaemia is not to blame: And I find, said the Princess Hersilea, that she has no reason to have it from him: for since Acasta was so careless in loosing it, and Leontidas so careful in keeping it, it is better in his hands then hers: Oh Madam, said I unto her, how infinitely am I obliged unto you, and what sufficient thanks can I possibly render you? Whilst I was thanking her, and shewing such reasons as might more convince them in my favour, I saw Policrates speak low unto Alcidaemia, and her laugh as well as he: and methought afterwards, I saw them smile once or twice privately at one another, and indeed Policrates was displeased at Alcidaemia, since she confessed she suffered me to speak unto her concerning my love, and the more to oblige me, told her that he beleieved I was really in love with her: but for further satisfaction, he said unto her, Will you continue obstinate all this day in desiring him to restore your picture? How Sir, said she, all this day? speaking in a low voice to him: Yes, and all my life long, or at the least until he do restore it. Yet since I did not hear what he said, and since I saw Policrates smile very often whilst Alcidaemia pressed me to restore the picture, I was much uneasy in my mind. But as the Princess took my part, and was glad that the affection of Policrates heretofore towards Timasias whom she loved not, did lessen towards him, and increase towards me; she said, that absolutely she would never suffer me to restore this picture; for (said she to Alcidaemia, in my behalf) you have no more right unto it since you gave it unto Acasta, and she has no more right unto it then you, since she lost it so negligently: but Leontidas has more right then either of you, since he found it so fortunately; since he has won it by his valor, since he has prevented him who stole it from injoying it, and since indeed he deserves it. Then Policrates, to divert himself a little longer, said unto Hersilea, that it were more just that the picture remained in his hands. But without giving him so much time as to tell his reasons, the sentence of the Princess was followed; Alcidaemia always declaring that she would never consent unto it: in conclusion the Prince retired, and I also: then after I had examined my memory concerning all the accidents of that day, I found more bad then good fortune in them: indeed I was extremely joyed that this Picture which I had was not given, and that I might almost Page 73 say it was my own; and might look upon it without any circumstance of secrecy: But I was extremely troubled when I found my friend and my enemy were both my Rivals: for I might very well imagine, that Theanor would never have perswaded me that this Picture was given unto him who lost it, but in hopes thereby to make me alter my designe: nor could I be ignorant considering the manner of Timasias his action, that he was deeply in love with Alcidaemia: and afterwards calling to memory the seriousness of Policrates in looking upon the Picture, how he whispered with her, and divers times smiled at her: remembering, I say, all these trivial circumstances, I imagined that this Prince was in love with her also: so that, to speak sincerely unto you, I was no less jealous of him, then I was of my friend, and my enemy. I might have had so much consolation (if I had known how to have taken it rightly) as to have thought that Alcidaemia did neither love him, nor Theanor, nor Timasias, but I apprehended it with so many tormenting fears, as if I had known that certainly she was in love with them all; for if I had apprehended it so, then all my jealousy would have had but one object, whereas now I suffered as many torments as if Alcidaemia had loved them all one after another. On which side soever her sensible soul inclines, (said I) I have great cause to fear that every one of these three terrible Rivals may move her heart. Theanor is a very compleat man, wise, complacential, discreet, and witty, able to act all that a passionate love can inspire, and ruine me before I know where I am: so that if Alcidaemia do affect the Courtship of such a man, I have great reason to fear him.

Again, if she be affected unto Fame, Valour, and Liberality, Timasias is a brave and gallant man, who may easily attract her inclination: But Oh Heavens, said I, if she be ambitious, what satisfaction may she not find in Policrates? if she affect glory, there it is to be had; if she love riches, since he is Master of the Seas, he can fetch her more, if his own will not content her: and thus repenting in my mind, all the good qualities of Policrates, I endured unimaginable torments, especially when I considered the good fortune of this Prince, which always was waited upon with success in all his enterprises. No, no, said I, all I have to do, is to inform my self whether Policrates loves Alcidaemia, for if he do, certainly she will love him: afterwards, when I considered that of all my three Rivals, there was only Timasias, against whom I could vent all my resentments, for the other two, one of them was my friend, and the other my Master: then did I almost lose all my reason, so that I passed away that night most unquietly: yet was I not fully resolved in my mind, that Policrates was in love with Alcidaemia, I did but only suspect it, not believe it; for commonly, I began with fear; afterwards, I suspected; and after that to believe what I feared, and suspected to be really true: After then a tedious and vexatious night, Theanor came unto my Chamber in the morning, who being still resolved to conceal the truth, and to take my love off from Alcidaemia, if he could, came now to tell me how glad he was of the advantage which I got the day before over my enemy; but yet he was very sorry to observe me every day more and more inclined to love Alcidaemia: yet if I would permit him to deliver his dissuading reasons, he believed that I would think no more of it. The most prevalent reason, that can be, said I unto him, I heard yesterday from Policrates, which was, that you and Timasias both are in love as well as I with her: But Theanor, I cannot help it, I must whether I will or no be your Rival, and since it is permitted Timasias to love Alcidaemia, me thinks, you may allow Leontidas the same liberty. When I began first to love her, I knew not that you did so also, but now at this day, since love has got the mastery, and absolute dominion of my heart, it is in vain for me to strive against it. Theanor perceiving that I knew he was in love, did not absolutely deny it: but he told me then, that it was true, he loved Alcidaemia, as all the rest of the Court did; yet it was as true, that for some reasons which he wished I knew, he endeavour'd with all his power to overcome his passion.

In conclusion, he used such obscure and ambiguous expressions, as made me plainly perceive that the only reason why he would withdraw his affection from Alcidaemia, was because Policrates had a secret mind unto her. Ah, my dear Theanor, (said I unto him, though he was my Rival, though Policrates be more to be feared then he,) I do already know as much as you tell me. Theanor, who only had invented what he told me, purposely to dissuade from the service of Alcidaemia, was much surprised to hear me say so; and fearing that he had spoken a truth, when he thought he had told me a lye, he pressed me to tell him what I knew concerning the love of Policrates, which (as he said) was such a secret as he thought none had known it but himself: But I, who was no less inquisitive then he, did swear unto him he should never know what I knew, unless he did first expound unto me all that he had formerly told me concerning Alcidaemia's Picture, which he assured me was given unto him that lost it. Page 74 Theanor seeing himself so pressed, and being extremely desirous to be satisfied of what I had said unto him concerning Policrates his love unto Alcidaemia, and being ashamed of telling me a lye, resolved to tell me another which should make good the first, and perhaps his own designe: he told me then, after he had pawed a while, as if he were half doubtful whether he should impart the secret unto me, and after he had made me solemnly swear that I would never speak of it, how Policrates was in love with Alcidaemia, and had been long: for that the business was managed by a Lady in the Court, called Menelida, whom every one thought Policrates loved, though she was only a Confidant unto Alcidaemia: How Alcidaemia, though she was very virtuous, yet answered his affection with reciprocal complacency; and how this Picture about which so much stir hath been, was given, though it seemed to be stoln: Is it possible, said I unto him, that this can be? Yes, said he unto me, for Policrates a little before his voyage, desired Alcidaemia to give him her Picture, and she consented; yet since she would not suffer it to be taken in secret, for fear of discovery; she seemed as if she would give her Picture unto Acasta, intending to have two drawn at a time, but the Painter falling sick, as soon as he had finished one for Acasta, Alcidaemia durst do no other but give it unto her, because she had promised: But the Prince, going unto Acasta to bid her adieu, and seeing she had left this Picture upon her Table, whilst she went upon a visit unto the Princess Hersilea, he commanded me to go and steal it for him, which I did accordingly; for at that time Alcidaemia and I were not kind at all, and I cared not though Policrates loved her. How Theanor, said I unto him did you steal Alcidaemia's Picture, and do you assure me, that she promised it unto the Prince? Yes, replied he: But, said I unto him, it was not Policrates who lost it that night I found it: for when that accident happened, the Prince was gone into his Chamber long before: Theanor was non plust at this answer: but upon second thoughts, No no, said he, deceive not your self; for the Prince Policrates does use to walk in the night, and come privately without any company with him into that walk, so that doubtless it was he, though you did not know him, who let that Picture fall that night you found it. But I remember, that I found you very melancholy the next morning, what was then in your mind? Nothing but sorrow, replied he, to find that absence had not altered the heart of Policrates, for as soon as ever he landed, he sent to see how Alcidamia did. What did that concern you, said I, since you were not then in love with her? and why did you trouble your self with any sorrow, since she was so indifferent unto you? I told you, answered he, that indeed she was so when I first imbarqued, but I did not tell you, she was so at my second return. It was no wonder then, said I unto him, that Policrates was so desirous to have me restore it unto Alcidamia. Then, to satisfy his curiosity, I told him how this Prince continued still his earnest desires unto me, to restore it unto her, how he was <...> ly whispering with her, and working at her, whilst she was importing me for it, and indeed I told him so exactly all my observations of every petty circumstance, which then did seem such strong arguments unto me, of Policrates his love, that I made no doubt at all of the truth. As for Theanor, he was even ravished with joy to understand that I knew nothing which could disquiet him, for he was not so jealous an apprehension as I was. But Theanor, said I unto him, What do you your self resolve upon? To overcome my passion, (said he unto me; hoping that I would follow his example,) for, to be a Rival unto a Sovereign, is an odd presumption. I am very glad you are so wise, said I unto him, and that my friend <◇> from being my Rival. Being a stranger as you are, replied he, you do expose your self unto an angry adventure in loving her that Policrates loves, unto whom you are obliged <...> Being his Rival (said I unto him, half angry) as you are, me thinks, you take a great deal of <◇> him: but yet if you will admit of any Lover of Alcidamia, it should be my self b <...> other, <...> ion have a greater influence upon your soul then friendship. Theanor suffered this discourse without any sharp reply, as well because he had no mind to fall out with <◇>, as because he was guilty of doing me wrong in deceiving me: but we parted in this manner, he left <◇> jealous of him, but much more of Policrates, who being so amiable and handsome as he was, became intolerable unto me. As soon as Theanor was gone out, I went unto Alcidamia, where I found Timasias, whom Acasta had brought thither, to <◇◇> how she had wronged him in accusing him for stealing her Picture: and though Alcidamia could not be <◇> from that belief, yet at the importunity of Acasta, she permitted him to see her, and that he might hereafter take the honour to visit her: so that when I came in, Timasias was ready to go out, and thanked her for this great honour which she had done him. When I had heard these last words of his complement, I imagined the matter, & was so very angry at <◇> that all the <...> ny perceived it. As soon as he was gone, Alcidamia turning towards <...> to you, said she, that Timasias is beholding, for the permission to see me sometimes, Page 75 which now I consented unto, since if you had not quarrelled, I should have still believed, that it was he who took my Picture. If it be the intention (said I unto him) which sets a price upon all good offices, Timasias has no reason to thank me for it, since I did never intend him any service in it. Presently after, Policrates came in, Theanor, and several others followed him; Timasias, also proud of his new obtained favour, came in with Policrates almost as soon as he was gone out. Imagine me now in the midst of three Rivals, the least of which I was in great jealousy of; which side soever I turned mine eye did meet with angry objects: for since it was very hard for Alcidamia, but she must often look upon either Policrates, or Theanor, or Timasias, though she had no designe at all in her looks, I suffered more then I am able to express: I would gladly have fixed her eyes upon mine, and none else, but alas, I was not so happy as to have my wish: for you must know, that Alcidamia, whose equal and impartial humour would drive all her Servants into despair, she used such a certain kind of indifferent civility, without any choice at all, as if she knew distinction of the men which visited her, though one were of the most delicate spirit in the world: and she had a phantasie to gain and win upon every one by this innocent way, so that by consequence she was very civil and sweet, and complacential unto all that came near her, and used an universal kindness unto all; she never seemed to be troubled at them who did most importune her: she was so absolute Mistress of her self, that she could change and vary when she pleased, and was so witty, that she knew how to turn discourse as seemed good unto her: you may imagine therefore how I was tormented that day; when Policrates talked with her, I could not endure it, and I thought that her joy, which she apprehended at it, made her seem fairer. If she looked upon Timasias, I imagined it was only to engage him deeper then before: and if she turned towards Theanor, I feared that her looks would not cure him of his passion, as he told me he designed. When Policrates spoke unto Meneclida, who was then with Alcidamia, I supposed it to be out of subtlety, and as unto his Confident of his passion: and if Alcidamia did me any civility, or held me in any general discourse, I looked upon her as one who would deceive me, and returned her a peevish answer: I confess unto you, that I could have wished Alcidamia fair only in my eye, or else that she were unto all the world invisible: I wished they would esteem her, and her honour was not indifferent unto me; but for all that, I would not have them love her, and I think, I should have rather wished them to hate her. The discourse of all this day was very agreeable unto all the company, except me. The Prince Policrates, chiding me for my melancholy, told me, that I was surely a very discreet Lover, and that he could not guess at any cause of melancholy I should have, since I had the Picture of the fairest person upon Earth: Sir, said I unto him hastily, It is not so great a happiness to have the Picture of the fair Alcida|mia only from the hands of fortune: but if I should have so much happy honour as to receive it from her fair hand, I should then esteem it much more precious then I do, although I do esteem it a high <ate already. Before you receive it from her hands, said Policrates smiling, she must get it out of yours: and therefore your best way will be to restore it unto her, as I desired you yesterday: And as I desire to day, said Alcidamia. If I were sure you would give it me again to morrow, replied I, I should doubtless restore it to day; but I should be very unhappy to deprive my self of that honour which I do already enjoy, in hopes of a greater good, which perhaps you will never honour me with: Afterwards Meneclida seemed as if she were very jealous that I should have Alcidamia's Picture, and not she, and because the excellent and only Picture-drawer which drew it at Samos was gone unto Ephesus. This pleasing contest between these two beauties was so hot, that Alcidamia to appease Meneclida, gave her a Seal of a very rare Emerald, her name engraven upon it, which she wore about her Arme in a flame coloured Ribon: the gift was so magnificent, both for the Lustre of the Stone, and for the Art of the Ingraver, who was the famous Theodorus, that Meneclida would not accept it, but upon condition that she would take another Bracelet which she wore, the clasp whereof was Rubies, and in the midst thereof a very fair Diamond. This exchange passing in my presence, I was so bold as to say, that I preferred Alcida|mia's Picture before them both, as magnificent as they were: Ten did Theanor make signes at me, as who would say I must not declare my self so openly before Policrates. But I, who was not Master of my passion, would needs cheer up my jealousy, by those signes of my love which I expressed, before my two Rivals. In the mean while I must tell you that the eight day being come, after which Alcida|mia would not hear me speak any more concerning my love, I discoursed so long, and so seriously unto her, that she perceived she must prepare her self for a long persecution: all that I had said unto her until then might have been interpreted, as gallantry only, but so it could not be at this time: for it was impossible for me to hide my jealousy from her, when Page 76 was expressing my self in love: and I think verily, that I thought more of conjuring her not to love my Rivals, then I did of intreating her to permit me leave to love her: after this, I lived in perpetual vexation and anguish of mind, though I did, if I durst say it, sometimes find some glimps of goodness towards me, in the heart of Alcida|mia, but yet I durst not put any trust in her: and I think that unless I lived alone with her in an uninhabited Island, where never any Ship came, I could not have fancied sufficient security from my Rivals. Therefore was I extremely miserable, for I must whether I would or no, find Policrates every day with her, and endure the frequent visits of Theanor, who could not hide his thoughts so close but I could easily discover he was in love with Alcida|mia: and I was forced also, unless I would quit Samas, to suffer Timasias, who was my Mortal enemy.

And to speak truth, whosoever hath not had tryal of all these three kinds of jealousies, does not know what it is to be rightly jealous: but mine rested not here: for be pleased to know that there was a man in the Court, of a very base condition, who had been a slave unto Xan|thus, the Philosopher, the same time that famous Esope was with him, and who was infran|chized by their Master, the same day as that excellent authour of those witty fables which are so famous every where, was set at liberty; the pleasant and merry making humour of this man brought him into the Court, and procured him the liberty to feast without any exception, upon all the world. Since Alcida|mia, as I told you before, was so complacential as to suffer those who were even troublesome unto her, you may easily imagine that she would not banish those from her, who diverted her: so that this old friend of Esope was continually with her; then since he knew all the news of the Court, and could tell it handsomely, he had always something or other to tell her in secret, and she had always something to ask him in private, so that there passed not a day but I saw them whisper long together, and sometimes laugh, although I knew not at what: And I saw this, I tell you, so frequent, that maugre my jealousy of Timasias, of Theanor, and of Policrates, I was also jealous of Hiparchus, for that was his name, who was as much below me, as Policrates was above me. This poor piece of jealousy troubled me more then all the others, because it brought me sometimes even to scorn Alcida|mia. After this Hiparchus could never move me unto any laughter, how pleasant and witty soever his Raillery was, for it is not possible for one to be both a good Buffon and a Rival unto any. This was the man|ner of my life, when Policrates (who indeed was in love with Meneclida, though for some state reasons, he did not then make it appear openly) intended a recreation upon the Sea, or rather a great fishing, at which all the Court Ladies were to be; the Princess Hersilea invited them all unto this Sea Feast: and though doubtless it was intended only for Meneclida, yet I supposed it to be for Alcida|mia, with whom she held a great privacy and familiarity at that time: for since the accident of the picture, Acasta, who before that was her prime confident, was now no longer so, but Meneclida had the highest place in her heart. All things being prepared for this grand fishing, and the day being set down; they were constrained to defer it, because there arrived an Ambassador from Amasis King of Egypt, who loved Policrates very well, and who sent to tell him, that his good fortune would procure him some quietness of mind, for it was the saying of a very wise man, it was absolutely impossible to be always happy: he did therefore advise him to prepare himself for some misfortune, by some voluntary loss, to the end, that if any angry and cross accident fell out, his Soul should not be surprized with it: Policrates received this counsell by many testimonies of gratitude for the care which so great a King did take of him, and he went into a Galley with this Egyptian Ambassador, and as it was reported, he threw into the Sea, upon a premeditated design, a Jewel of an inestimable value, to the end it might cause him sufficient grief: Yet it was not so; but see what was the ground of this report, which was rumoured not only throughout all Asia, but all the world. The morning that this Ambassador came, and had been treated with all possible magnificency, Policrates desired to recreate himself at this great fishing. This being in the end of Autumn, which commonly is the most pleasant time of the year at Samos, the Sea was so calm, that it was most delectable being upon it, yet not so good for fishing, for the great calm is not the most proper for it.

Twelve gilded Gallies were provided for this glorious company; all of them had most magnificent Tents upon the deck: and a Thousand waving Flags of divers colours, in several places of the Gallies: but above the rest, that which was appointed to carry the Prince Policrates, the Princess Hersilea, the Egyptian Ambassador, the fair Meneclida, the incomparable Alcida|mia, and other Principal Ladies of the Court, was the most glorious and gallant Galley in the world. Yet I who thought all this magnificency was only an effect of Policrates his love of Alcida|mia, did observe it more then any other, though without any delight: I got into this Page 77 Galley where she was, and that day was she fairer then ever Galathia, Thetis, or Venus, could by the Art of any hand be drawn: All the Nets which were used were of silk; all the fishers were dressed in Tritons habit, and all the Ladies like the Nereides. As we were in such a place of the Sea, as was full of fish, Policrates presented unto all the Ladies, Lines, and Angle-rods of Ebony, and blue silk lines with hooks of Gold. This Prince who naturally was civil unto all, did as much as he could hide his affection unto Meneclida, and taking one of those Angle-rods, gave it unto Alcida|mia, before he gave one unto Meneclida, which passage you may well imagine did extremely trouble me; so that whilst every one was taken up with delights, I was tossed in a turbulent Sea of jealousy.

Theanor, and Timasias, who were in another Galley, did so fix their looks upon that, where|in Alcida|mia was, that I believe they did not think their fishing good sport, in theirs; for my part, all my employment was to observe what Policrates did, and to my great misery, I was no less unquiet, when he spoke unto Meneclida, then when he discoursed with Alcida|mia, because I conceived her to be only a Confident of his love. I observed that whilst the Egyptian Ambassador was entertaining the Princess Hersilea, and whilst many Ladies were busie in their sports, some fishing, and others looking on, Policrates, as I told you before, presenting a Rod and a Line unto Alcida|mia, before Meneclida, said unto her out of his Gallantry, that if she were as happy in taking of fish, as she was of hearts, she would catch fish enough. Then I know not how Meneclida, taking her Angle-rod in her hand, did so entangle it in that Ribon which she wore about her Arme, and which Alcídamia had given her; but I am sure she let it fall, and gave a great cry upon it, and that if Policrates had not stooped hastily, and caught it, it had certainly fallen into the Sea: Then holding it in his hands, he expressed many signes of joy, as well as Menecida, who infinitely esteemed it, as well for its own value, as for the hand which gave it: But as for Policrates, who only valued it as coming from the Arme of Menecida, he told her, that in lieu of restoring it unto her, he would keep it unto the end of the fishing, for fear she should lose it again: Then calling me unto him, Have not I more right unto this Seal, Leontidas, said he, then you have unto the Picture of Alcídamia? And may I not keep it if I will from the fair Menecida, as well as you the Picture from Alcídamia? since you found yours in a place where it would not have been for ever lost, as this which I happily preserved would have been. Sir, said I unto him very angrily, because I supposed he only loved the Seal because it was Alcídamia's, you were so opposite unto me concerning this Picture whereof you speak, that for all the respect I owe you, I have much ado to judge favourably in your behalf. Then must the fair Alcídamia assist me, said he, in perswading the fair Menecida that I may enjoy that which she lost. Sir, replied she, most cruelly as I thought, I shall never be opposite unto any thing which may be advantageous unto you, and I find that Menecida has made this Seal which I gave her so precious by her wearing it, that you have great reason to desire the preservation of it: If the Prince, replied Menecida, be of my mind, he will value it upon the same score as I did; that is, because it was yours.

In conclusion, After this contest Menecida did consent that Policrates should wear her Seal the rest of the day, so that he putting it on his Arme, seemed to be as pleasant and glorious as if he had got some great Conquest: Indeed, he was as glad as I was sad, for as the passage seemed unto my apprehension, it was never given unto Menecida, but under a private designe to be given unto Policrates. I imagined that Menecida did purposely put it off, and let it fall, and indeed I imagined all that could torment my mind: After they had taken all the delight that fishing could afford, and had divers times seen them draw their Nets, so loaded with fish that they broke, and gave liberty unto all those pretty prisoners, which they only took for the pleasure of taking them, and to look upon their silver Armour: and after the Ladies had tired themselves with taking many Dares, and other fishes, there was in every Galley a magnificent Collation prepared, and most harmonious Musick: afterwards, the Sun not being towards Evening any thing offensive unto the Ladies, the Tents were all taken away, and this illustrious Company enjoyed as pleasant a season as ever was. All the Ladies took off their hoods. The beauty appeared in full lustre, every one was entertaining themselves with those that were most agreeable unto their fancy, and I was the only man who was solitary, and held conversation with none but my self: I saw Policrates sit between Alcídamia and Menecida, speaking sometimes to one, and sometimes to another. Menecida, because the day grew old, and night came on, asked for her Seal: and as he seemed unwilling to restore, she pressed the more to have it, but still this Prince denied it, as seeming extream unwilling to part with it. Sir, (said she smiling, as afterwards I knew, for then I saw only by their action, and did not Page 78 understand their words) If any but the Prince Policrates should ask this Seal as a favour, he would be suspected a passion, little less gallant then love. To shew you, said he, that I am not very covetous, I will restore the Seal upon condition you will only give me the Ribon which is tied unto it; in saying so he began to untie it notwithstanding her resistance; and as she still denied it, saying, to excuse her self, that she should lose it if she had not the Ribon also, the Seal fell out of the hands of Policrates into the Sea, and he not able to catch it, for they leaned over a gilded Rail, which was by the sides of the Galley. Policrates was even desperate at the accident: Menecida very angry, and when the loss was divulged, every one shared in the Princes sorrows, for being the cause of such a loss unto Menecida: I only rejoiced, and was ravished that he could not enjoy such a favour as came from Alcídamia; for I did not understand that he intended to restore it when he let it fall: See, said he, the great misfortune of Policrates, since the first that befalls him is without a remedy: But the more he appeared troubled, the more did I also, because my jealousy was augmented by it. The Egyptian Embassadour to comfort him, wished that never greater misfortune might befall him: and as long as the day lasted, either at Sea, or in the Palace, after our return to Court, nothing but this accident was talked on.

The next morning, Theanor, the more to afflict me, did craftily tell me, that Policrates, to repair the loss of Menecida, had in the Evening sent two other Seals unto her, and Alcídamia, the fairest and richest in the world, beseeching her to keep the one, and give the other unto Menecida. This piece of Gallantry drove me into absolute despair; and though I understood at the same time by another besides Theanor, that Alcídamia did make very nice in accepting what the Prince had sent her, and that Policrates was glad to use the authority of the Princess his Sister to beg acceptance, yet was I not less jealous, for I considered that Alcídamia had a Seal which came from Policrates, and I imagined that the other which was given unto Menecida, was but a colour for giving the other, and as a kind of recompence for the good offices she had done him: Moreover this Ribon which remained in the hands of Policrates, and which he kept so carefully, did infinitely augment my pangs of jealousy, so that I enjoyed not a minutes rest: There happened the next morning another accident, which did extraordinarily trouble me, and which every one looked upon as one of the most miraculous chances, and as the greatest signe of good fortune that ever happened unto any one: for Policrates, some two dayes after this grand entertainment, having risen betimes in the morning, with intentions to go and hunt, and being in a marble walk in the midst of the Castle, ready to take horse, he saw two old fishermen approaching him with humble respect, and presented a fish unto him which they had taken, of a monstrous bigness, which two other fishers carried upon a bundle of Sea-reeds. This fish being an extraordinary fine one, and wonderfully large, Policrates looked upon it with much delight; and causing him who brought it to be well rewarded, he took horse, and went to hunt as he intended: but at his return, one of his officers coming unto him as he was entering into the Castle, presented unto him the same Seal, which Menecida and he let fall into the Sea, the last great fishing day, which they found in this miraculous fish which was presented unto him, who doubtless had swallowed it at the very same instant that it fell into the water. I was then close by Policrates, so that I could easily observe how pleasingly he was surprized at this prodigious accident, and to get that again which he thought to be for ever absolutely lost: And indeed, this piece of good fortune was so extraordinary, that though Policrates had not been at all in love, yet must it needs rejoyce him: and since Menecida was so much ravished to regain that into her possession which was so very dear unto her, Policrates also did testify his in such excess, that it made me more jealous then ever, imagining that whatsoever I saw him do, was always for Alcídamia: he gave unto that Officer which presented it unto him as much as enriched him for his life: he redoubled his liberality to the fisher-men who presented the fish: and making choice of me unluckily amongst the rest, he appointed me to carry this welcome news unto Alcídamia, and Menecida, until he could come himself to see them: Mean while, all the Court admired at this strange accident, and could not chuse but talk of it. After this, said the Egyptian Embassadour unto Policrates, you may trust Fortune, or defie her: since the fairest of fishes did swallow it, and afterwards suffered himself to be taken by such a Fisher as was so honest as to present you with it, and after all this to find an Officer so trusty and faithful, as to restore a jewel of that value, is a piece of as great good fortune as is imaginable, and ought to perswade you, that you shall be ever happy. If so (answered Policrates very civilly) you your self must rejoyce also, as at a thing which speaks the prosperity of the King your Master, since I my self can never be happy, unless he be so also. Mean while I went against my mind, to discharge my self of my Commission, Page 79 but it was after such a faint manner, as let Alcídamia and Menecida see very well that my mind was much perplexed: I found unto my greater grief, that Hiparchus, who had not been hunting, was with them, and that Timasias and Theanor both, whom we left at the Gates of the Town, was there also: I related my business then in such a manner, as was a fit subject for the raillery of Hiparchus: for seeing in what a melancholy tone I told this newes of joy and delight, he vented a hundred of his flashes, which were bitter unto me, and pleasant unto them, in so much as if Menecida had not handsomely turned the discourse, my melancholy would perhaps have appeared more then I would have it: after this, I must go and render an account unto Policrates of what the Ladies said unto me: but though they did both of them load me with a hundred civilities towards him, yet I passed them over in a slight manner, and told a short story, that Menecida was very glad there was any hopes to have her Seal soon again.

Policrates was then in his closet, and no body with him, but my self, and he asked with extream curiosity, what Menecida and Alcídamia had said unto me? and since I returned him no manner of pertinent answer, he came upon me with question upon question, and put say Soul into such a horrid torment, that I was diverse times ready to cast off all respect unto him: but the Prince observing the discomposure of my mind, did ask what it was which troubled me, since I answered only with a bow, he begun to muze, and afterwards looking earnestly upon me, Leontidas, said he unto me, you are either in love, or else I am the most mistaken man in the world: But if it be so, said he, I wish for your own quiet sake it be not with Alcídamia, for she is one of such an indifferent humour as will much trouble the tranquility of your mind in obtaining your desired end: When I heard Policrates speak in this manner, and perceived his desire to know my thoughts, but I was at such a non-plus, that I could not answer him: The Prince observing my disorder, smiled, and embracing me with abundance of sweetness, Leontidas, said he unto me, fear not to discover your imperfections unto me, for I am resolved to discover mine unto you, and the more to oblige you, I pray you know, that the same Policrates who every one conceives so happy, is oftentimes tormented with a secret which troubles the goodness of his fortunes. Sir, (said I then unto him, being extreamly transported) it seems to me, that Alcídamia is not very averse unto you: Alcídamia indeed, said he unto me, does sometimes qualifie the severity of Menecida, but yet for all that, all that she does in my behalf is to prevent her friend from treating me ill, but truly she is very favorable unto me. I confess, when I heard Policrates express himself thus, I thought at the first it was only to deceive me. Yet this Prince perceiving my mistrust of him, and guessing at a great part of my thoughts, he was too good as to desire me, that I would utter them unto him, and I was so bold as to obey him. And after I had in some sort acknowledged, that I had been deceived, Policrates then understanding my error, did dissipate it in such a manner, that there remained not any more suspicion in my Soul, and I perfectly knew, how all that Theanor had said unto me was false, which put me into such a collorique fume against him, that I was not master of my own resentment. I told not then Policrates all I knew, and I conceived it more noble to be revenged upon him my self, then to make use of the Authority of the Prince for it. Now did Policrates really love me, and to cure me of my jealousy, he made me that confident of his passion unto Menecida, and to oblige me the more, he offered me all his assistance to Alcídamia: and indeed he spoke so much in my advantage, when he went the next morning to carry Menecida her Seal, that the fair Alcídamia did look much more favorably upon me. In the mean time, going to look out Theanor, that I might acquaint him with my resentments, I understood how he was gone into the Country for some days: I heard also that Timasias was fain sick, and stirred not out of his chamber: So that I found my jealousy of Policrates vanished, and rid of two Rivals for a while, and finding also the favor of this Prince, I entred into a very great league of friendship with Alcídamia, and was for almost a week a most happy man. But alas, the beginning of my good fortune was the beginning of my greater Torment. For as long as I thought my self not at all loved by Alcídamia, my jealousy, though great then, yet was not comparable to what afterwards, since she favoured me so far as to tolerate my affection, and permit me some hopes of hers hereafter; for regarding her then as one in whom I had some right, I was therefore much more tormented in thoughts of the loss: I must now augment my train, thereby to have more spies to observe what she and all my Rivals did: when Theanor returns we must fight: I had also many ruffles with Timasias, and many suspicions of Hiparchus, and indeed I was at that pass as I wished Alcídamia might see no body. I followed her every where, or caused her to be followed: I was always melancholy, and musing, for though Alcídamia did out of her goodness unto me create much Page 80 hope in me, yet she did not leave off her complacential humour unto all people, but was so generally civil unto all, as made me absolutely despair, and persecuted me beyond imagination: and truly it was absolutely impossible for me, not to be perpetually giving her some marks of my suspicion, though I did never intend as much: if she had hereupon been so indulgent as to cure me, perhaps she might have done it: but on the contrary, my jealousy incensed her, and made her use all the means she could to add fire unto my jealousy, for she took every opportunity of conversing with one of my Rivals: she let slip no occasion of walking abroad, and recreating her self, and lived as best pleased her self, and as if I were not jealous of her: not that I could ever find she did any thing which was not fit, or what other Ladies of her quality did: but me thought she was bound to pity my weakness, to yield a little unto my capritious phantasm; and to restrain her self something more then she did: yet for all that, this inhumane Lady looked upon me as her persecutor, and treated me so cruelly, that I understood she railed against my suspicions and fears unto Policrates, and unto Hiparchus also; insomuch as all my jealousies revived even of the very Prince: So that with an angry mind, I went one day to visit her, when she was all alone, yet when I was with her, the one half of my fury vanished, and I spoke unto her with much respect. This discourse began at the first with things indifferent, though it was not my custom to do so when I was alone with her: But not knowing how to begin handsomely, for fear I should too much incense her, I stammered, and was wandered so imperitently from the purpose, that Alcídamia could not chuse but laugh: when I saw that, I grew red with choller, and no longer able to hide my thoughts, You are obliged unto me, said I unto her, for giving you so often a subject to divert the Prince Policrates, and to laugh with Hiparchus. They two are of such different dispositions (said she) that I cannot think one thing is able to divert them equally. It is much harder for me to comprehend (said I un|to her) how they can both be possibly in one heart: They easily may (answered she very sharp|ly) and many others besides, for certainly Leontidas, there is often in one heart, both love and harred, scorn and friendship, indifferency and aversion. I know it well (said I unto her,) and I know very well also which of all these, I ought most to pretend unto: Since doubtless you are not ignorant (replied she in a more malicious tone) of the price of those services which you render, it is easie for you to guess it: I guess it better, replied I, by the capritious humour of another, then by my self: But you may guess at it more exactly, replied she, by your own capritious humour, then by any thing else, if it were possible for you to know it: Call you that capritious, Madam (said I unto her) to adore you only of all the people in the World, to look upon you only, and to wish nothing upon Eirth but to be loved? I know very well, said she, that you look upon none but me, and perhaps if you looked upon me less, you would be looked upon more favorable: Why Madam, replied I, do you think it possible to love perfectly, and not endeavor, as much as may be, to see the person loved? I think, said she, that the way to make ones self to be loved, is to please, and not to be always busie in depriving the party who is loved of all things she delights in. But if the person who one loves, answered I, do love again, she will take no delight in persecuting him whom she thinks worthy of her affection; but would find much more pleasure in pitying his weakness, and desiring to cure them. For my part (said she) indeed I am not so full of goodness: for I know not how to pity those evi in any one, which they voluntarily cause in themselves; An Madam, said I unto her, how little do you know him of whom you speak, if you think that he does voluntarily cause his evils? No, no, deceive not your self I beseech you, jealousy is a tyrannical passion, as well as love, which begins in our hearts whether we will or no: which angments also in spite of all resistance, and in the end, do what we can, will ruine us. Since it is such an incurable disease, said she, it is in vain to go about the cure: and the best discretion is to hide it so that others sall not perceive it. I would I could, said I unto her, but how is it possible Madam to see you continually Invironed with persons who are agreeable unto you, and not to express some glimps of perplexity? What, said she, would you never have me look upon any but ugly persons? that I should be always in solitary and melancholy places? that I should hate musick and mirth? that I should never walk abroad? that conversation should displease me? and that I should dron* away all my life in solitude? I wish not so much Madam, said I unto her, but I confess I desire with all my heart, if it were possible, that the Prince Policrates, Theanor, Timas*as, and Hipar|chus, were none of them so much in your favor as Leontidas. Alcidamia blushed at this discourse, and after a while of paw*ing, she began to tell me, what rank all these persons held in her heart, and first for Policrates, she told me that she esteemed him as a great Prince, who was passionately in love with Meneclida her friend. That as for Theanor, she neither had any hatred nor friendship towards him: as for Timasias, she had a greater disposition to hate him, then to Page 81 love him; and as for Hiparchus, she ever loved his company, but never his person. When I heard Alcidamia say so, I was even ravished with joy; and would have returned her thanks, but she prevented me; and said, No no, Leontidas, make no such haste, I tell you not all this for your satisfaction, but my own: It is for my own particular honour, that I assure you all these persons whom I have named have no secret place in my heart; But it is for your tranquility, that I tell you ingeniously, because you shall not be deceived, that you have no more place in my heart then they have. Why Madam, said I unto her, will you never love Leontidas? No, not the least thought, replied she, as long as he continues jealous, and since I cannot think, but he will be always so, I cannot think, that I shall ever entertain any affection to him. But consider, cruel Lady, said I unto her, that this jealousy is only an effect of love. If you loved me then a little less, replied she, I should love you a little more; for indeed, Leontidas, I had rather marry a man that hates me, then one that loves me with any engredient of jealousy in his love: therefore desist from courting me any more, since all will be in vain. But, said I unto her, were I once assured, that I were the happy man you mean to make choice of, my jealousy would cease. No, said she, I will not expose my self unto such a danger: for there are many Lovers who are not jealous at all whilst they are servants, yet are so when they come to be Husbands. But I can never think that he who is jealous, when he has yet no right unto the person whom he loves, will never cease to be so when he has married her. Therefore Leontidas, you have put an unremoveable obstacle between your pretensions unto me, and your self. And how much soever I may esteem you, I shall tell you once again, that I shall never marry you. When I heard Alcidamia thus express her self, I would have protested unto her, that I would never be jealous any more; but in very speaking unto her, I do confess, that I found such certain symptoms in my self, as told me, that I was not yet in a condition to be absolutely cured of that Malady which tormented me: In the mean time, I could not move Alcidamia, to alter her resolution, nor yet any other answer from her: I made several attempts upon my self several days, not to appear jealous, but seemed to be pleasant, and agreeable to all Societies: I spoke unto Theanor, I saluted Timasias with more civility then formerly: I would sometimes jest and quibble with Hiparchus: but to tell you truly, I did all these so ill favour|edly, and in such a forced manner, that I made Alcidamia laugh more heartily, then if I had spoke the most pleasant things in the world. This put me into such an inward chafe, that I did silently blame her. What would you have me do, said she, you counterfeit it so scurvily, that I cannot for my life but laugh. This her carriage towards me, did extremely offend me, but yet she continued her constant course of sweetness, civility, and complacency unto every one, whilst I continued my accustomed vexation of mind, and was always restless and miserable: Not knowing then what course to take, but knowing well that Alcidamia was fully resolved upon what she told me, I went to consult with the Philosopher Lanthas, whom I was well acquainted with, and conjured him to prescribe me his best physick, to cure my jealousy; for knowing him to be a man of profound knowledg in every thing, and one that all his life had st|died the nature of passions, I had great hopes in his documents, and sapient advises to find a remedy: The evil whereof you complain (answered he) is not so easily cured as you imagine, not know I any but one remedy, yet it is most infallible to those that will observe it: Let me hear it quickly, I beseech you, said I unto him, for let it be as difficult as it will, I am fully re|solved to apply it. There is no way, replied he, but to leave off loving, and without this, those whose souls are tainted with that dangerous passion, can never be absolutely delivered from it. But, replied I, all in anger, you must teach me at the same time how to leave loving: By leaving the sight of her you love, answered he. Your remedies are very harsh, said I unto him. Your disease is great, replied he; and the maladies of the mind, as well as those of the body, when they are grown to extremities, they must have extream remedies. Is there no possibility, said I unto him, to cure jealousy some other way? No, not when it is violent, replied he, and stronger then the love which first gave life unto it; for truly this passion is so bere of reason, that it can never judg of any thing rightly: A man that is jealous in the excess, is like a remedy, unto which nature lends no help, and unto whom all remedies are useless. In other passions, reason causes the owner sometimes to receive the remedies prescribed; but a jealous man will find no help from any advice: for being accustomed to be often deceived, he can never discern the truth: so that after a long discourse, the result of all my philosophical advice was, That if I would cease being jealous, I must cease loving; and if I would cease loving, I must cease seeing the Party whom I love: Then did I quit her, and went to walk alone, and very busie I was with my self, to resolve what course to undertake: but I could not that day fix upon any thing, and I believe, if the merciless Alcidamia had not so infinitely augmented my Page 82 jealousy by her manner of proceeding with me, it would have been long before I had deter|mined with my self. But the great feast of Juna being now come, and all the Isle of Samos in publick jolity; she gave me such fresh causes of complaint, in all the Assemblies where ever I saw her; and she had so fully perswaded me, that so long as I was jealous, so long should I be hated; that in conclusion, I resolved, since I could not cease from being so, I would cease from loving if I could, and to depart from Samos: I was inventing an handsom presence for my departure, yet not telling the truth unto any but Policrates, of whom I was then less jealous, I quit his Isle, notwithstanding all his perswasions to the contrary, and I did quit it without bidding adieu unto any: But that I might go out compleatly unhappy, as I passed by Alc|damia's Lodging, I saw Timasias and Hiparchus enter, and I knew by Theanor's Servants who were at the door, that he was there before then: I had so strong a phancie of that joy, which my Rivals would resent in my absence, that I was in a mind not to depart, yet wrast|ling with my mind with all my power, I at the last imbarqued, and returned to Cyprus, a little before the Prince Philoxipes fell in love with the fair Policrita; since that, I have lived a most unquiet and unhappy life: for indeed, absence has done no good at all upon me, but I still continue more amorous and more jealous, and by consequence more unfortunate then ever Lover. Since my separation from Alc|damia, I am not only jealous of my Prince, my friend, my enemy, and another of an inferiour quality unto me, but I am jealous also of every one whom I do imagine sees her; and when you see me sometimes stand in dull dumpish st|ldy, and melancholy musing posture, then am I calling them all into my memory one after ano|ther, and imagining that Alc|damia is treating them better then she did me. Let not Thim|ocrates then pretend, that absence comes near the rigour of jealousy, since there is no compari|son between them.

The Remembrance of what is past, the hopes of what is to come, (as the Prince Artibies hath very well observed) does bring a thousand consolations unto an absent Lo|ver, that is beloved: But a jealous Lover cannot find any thing either in his remembrance of the time past, or in his hopes of the time to come, which can afford him any quietness of mind: An absent Lover, never looks for any things but such as are agreeable, and delightful, the hopes of which are sweet unto him, as the sight of his Mistress, her compa|ny, and many such advantages; whereas jealousy is so irregular from all rules of reason, that he does often wish not to see his Mistress. I know very well, that not to be loved, is a grand misery: yet not so great by far as his who imagins himself not only not loved, but imagins that the person whom he loves, does love an hundred thousand others better then himself: Nei|ther is the death of the party loved with all its terrors, so tormentive as jealousy. A Lover who laments the death of his Mistress, has this consolation at the least, that he is pitied by eve|ry one, it moves compassion in his most mortal enemies: whereas on the contrary, a jealous Lover moves not the least jot of pity from his dearest friends: those that are the most dis|creet amongst them, can do no more, then not to speak against him: but the ordinary sort do most commonly openly jeer, and mock at him for it: and yet though he see it in them all, he knows no remedy. Moreover, that kind of sorrow which is caused by death, hath some li|mits; there can come nothing new nor worse unto him who resents it: But a jealous Lover does every day endure an hundred thousand fresh and worse punishments then ever he could foresee: and does so invent them himself, that he is his own punisher. When death hath ra|vished that which is dearest unto one away, there is yet this advantage remaining, that all the passions of his soul, except that of love, do rest in peace, and suffers one to weep in a kind of tranquility: But there is perpetual trouble & confusion in that heart which is possessed with jealousy: Hatred disputes with love for the Empire; fear drives out all hopes; fear takes place of tender|ness; despair often follows; one repents an hundred times in a day of his own wishes: one desires death not only upon himself, but his Mistress also: one cannot see things as they are; for whereas according to the order of nature, the senses do commonly delude the imagination; Here on the contrary, the imagination deludes the senses, and afterwards does force the ears, and the eyes, to think, (if it may be properly said so) that they hear and see that which they do not: and yet for all this, the knowledg of these errors cannot cure the mind of those who know them; and jealousy indeed may more fir|ly be phrased Whichcraft, Inchantment, or Magick, rather then a bare passion. Pronounce Judgement then in my favour, Oh my most ingenious, and just Judge; and deny not your pity unto the most unfortunate Lover in the world.

Leontidas having finished his Discourse, Martesia desired Cyrus to pronounce Sentence upon these four famous Lovers: But he denying it with most sweet and obliging civility, and Page 83 also refusing to give her any counsel: she was forced to use her own ingenious apprehensions. After that she had then pawsed, and studied a while to recal into her memory, what she in|tended to utter, she pronounced her Sentence with a very handsome Grace, though not without a blush, in these terms.

The Judgment of MARTESIA.

I Know very well, it was my own curiosity to know the Adventures of these four illustrious Persons, which moved me unto so much injustice, as to accept of the quality of being their Judge: But I know also that all of you have so excellently expressed your selves, and your reasons, and so perfectly described your sufferings, that it is almost impossible I should be erroneous in my opinion; I declare then with audacity, that Thimocrates, though absent, yet since he is loved, is the least unfortunate of the four: That Philocles, though not loved, yet is he not the most unfortunate of all, since that which causeth his misery, may perhaps, hereafter, cause his cure: And as for Leontidas, I affirm that he is the least to be pitied, though I am perswaded he has endured more misery then all the rest. And to conclude, I declare, that the Prince Artibies in lamenting his dead Mistress, is most worthy of compassion, and him whom I most pity, though I am sensible of the miseries of all the rest, except the jealous Leontidas, for whom, I reserve much esteem, but little pity.

Martesia had no sooner pronounced Sentence, but Leontidas began to speak: Did I not tell you, replied he, that it is one of my misfortunes not to be pittied by any? However, replied Cyrus, I conceive that Martesia is most just in her Judgment. The respects which I owe her, said Thimocrates, prevents my complaints: I am not so reasonable as you are, said Philocles, for I confess that I do complain a little. For my part, said Artibies, I do much commend her, since truly the pity of this illustrious Lady, is the greatest consolation that I have received since my loss.

Since now it was very late, Cyrus did rise up after many applauses of Martesia. Aglatidas and Erenice did the same: and after Cyrus had discoursed a while in private with Martesia, concerning his Dear Princess, he went out, accompanied with all those illustrious, but unfortunate Lovers, and went unto Ciaxares, with a mind wholly possessed with his own passion, and with the Idea of Mandana in it, which no terene thought could remove out of his heart.

The End of the first Book.

ARTAMENES, OR CYRUS the GREAT. The Second Part. Book. II.

The thoughts of Cyrus were wholly employed concerning the Delivery of his Princess, and therefore he discoursed with Ciaxares, whom he found in his Closet, thinking upon nothing but preparations for the Armenia War. That which did most impede the Expedition in both their fancies, was the Town of Pteria, which yet being in the hands of Artaxes, there was no likelihood of the Armenian Progress before it was taken. Yet to engage themselves in a Siege, amidst their great impatience to deliver Mandana, was so harsh a thought, that they could hardly resolve upon it. But yet not withstanding, since they had good intelligence, that very small Forces were within it, being most of them dispersed since the King of Assyrias departure: and understanding also, that the two thousand men which Metrobates sent for the last time, were also dispersed by the way, and never returned back: When they heard that the Army of Ciaxares had entred Sinope, by Scalado, it was resolved upon, that Cyrus, with some Regiments should attempt to take it: But the next morning, intelligence was brought, that the Inhabitants of Pteria, hearing that Artamenes was delivered, and that he was Cyrus, consulted secretly amongst themselves, and resolved to return as soon as they could unto the obedience of their lawful Prince; and to prevent the punishment which they deserved by a generous repentance: so that having plotted the designe, they killed Artaxes, and all the Souldiers in the Garrison; that they had taken the Castle, and were absolute Masters of the Town, and sent the Keys thereof unto Cyrus by six of the Chief Inhabitants of the Town, beseeching him to present them unto the King. This news did extreemly rejoyce these two Princes, who did very graciously receive these repentant Rebels; as generously pardoning them, as they did generously execute their designe. Nothing was now thought upon, but an hasty March with the Army into Armenia: and indeed, after a general Muster of all their Regiments, it was resolved that the Vantguard should be drawn forth within six days, and should advance as far as the Frontiers, whether all the rest should presently follow. The mind of Cyrus was then high with hope; for seeing so great and gallant an Army, and so many Kings, Princes, and illustrious men engaged in his Quarrel, he had a good foundation for so much confidence, as to think the Victory almost certain: It was also to be thought that if the King of Armenia would not restore the Princess, nor acknowledg that she was within his Dominions, it was because he desired that they should offer to discharge him of that Tribute which he owed unto the Kings of Media: Yet Cyrus for all this was much troubled to imagine what was become of the King of Pont, of whom Megabises did not speak, and of whom he heard no speech at Page 85 Artaxates. But hoping to be long cleared of all his doubts and fears, by delivering Mandana, he was as gay, and pleasant as any absent lover could be, who was in hopes ere long to see his Mistress, and vanquish his enemies. Never was he more sweet and civil to all the Officers and soldiers then now: he was perpetually employed in obtaining something from Ciaxares for them, who having renewed in his heart all the old affection which he had heretofore towards him when he thought him to be only Artamenes, was pleased to consent unto what soever he required from him, now he was known to be Cyrus. Aglatidas, who was none of those whom Cyrus least esteemed, came unto him one morning, and importuned him to obtain for Otamus the Government of the Arisantes Province, which was now vacant by the death of him who formerly enjoyed it. For Otamus? (said Cyrus unto him with much wonder.) Yes, Sir, (said he) it is for Otamus that I beg this favor, or indeed to say better, it is for the fair Amestris; for be pleased to know, that I am informed by a Letter from Artaban, that there is a man, who is a mortal enemy unto Artambares, her father, labours to obtain it from Ciaxares, therefore Sir, I most humbly beseech you be pleased to prevent him, so that the incomparable Amestris, whom they say is extreemly melancholy and solitary, may not receive this addition unto her sorrows: for since all her estate is in that province, it would be a great discomfort unto her, to see the grand enemy of her family a Governour over her.

It is very right, answered Cyrus, but were it not more just if I should obtain it for your self, rather then for Otamus? since thereby the King would be better served, and the estate of Amestris no less protected. Your goodness is abundant Sir, replied Aglatidas, to offer such an honour unto me, Yet Sir if you will be pleased to oblige me, do not think of doing any thing for a man whose love surmounts his ambition, and who courts nothing but death to finish all the sorrows he endures, therefore since I cannot accept of this Government, I conjure you Sir, once more, to obtain it for Otamus: I shall do it, said Cyrus unto him, but it shall be upon condition that you let Amestris know, it is your self who has done her this good office. Aglatidas would not consent unto that; and Cyrus was forced to consent unto his desire without any conditions: Since Ciaxares was not able to deny any thing unto him to whom he was a debtor for all, Cyrus no sooner asked but obtained this Government, and the very same hour, sent unto Ecabtan with orders accordingly for it: Yet did Ciaxares wonder what reason Cyrus had for this request, knowing that Otamus was a stranger unto him, and though he did know, yet could he never love him. This made such a noise in the Court, that every one was inquisitive, by what motives Cyrus did it: and Megabises, who knew how the interest of Amestris was concerned in it, was he who first hit upon the business, and who imagined that Cyrus was moved unto it at the request of Aglatidas: so that every one did presently after know it, and admired his generosity: The same day, there arrived an Envoy or Messenger from the King of Assyria, who hearing by the publique voyce at the place where he was retired since his departure from Pteria, that the principal reason why they retained Cyrus a Prisoner, was because he was accused for suffering him to escape, and for holding intelligence with him, he resolved to pay that debt which was due to generosity, and to acquit and justify him, from that unjust accusation. Cyrus no sooner knew that this Messenger was arrived at Sinope, but he went immediately unto Ciaxares, saying he would not see him, but in his presence. Ciaxares told him very obligingly, that to remember his past errors was something injurious unto him: but yet for all that, Cyrus prevailed, and the King of Assena's Messenger was brought before Ciaxares. After he had presented his Letters of Credence, at that Ciaxares was willing to hear him; Sir, (said he unto him) I have orders from the King my master to tell you, for the justification of Artamenes, who in my coming hither I understand to be Cyrus, that it was not he who helped the King my Master to escape out of Prison, and that Cyrus never held any intelligence with him which was repugnant unto that service which he owes you; But since I find him at liberty, I conceive it impertinent to insist any longer, as my orders enjoined me, to clear his innocency therein. I had it in charge also to tell you, that if you would set him at liberty, as my commission was most humbly to desire you, then to declare unto you afterwards, that he intended to make no war any longer against you, nor against any else but those only that were protectors unto the ravisher of the Princess Mandana: That therefore he offers unto you all those forces which he is now leaving within that little part of his Dominion, which your powerfull Army has yet left him: He offers also his own person, if you will be pleased to promise him security from danger: and in conclusion assures you, that he will never attempt any thing against you. He commanded me also to make it known, if it were possible, unto the illustrious Artamenes, that he thought it to be Artaxes, who sent the Letter unto Metrobates, because it was from the hand of Artaxes he had received a copy, Page 86 which he would have made pass for an original: and to find it out, he had brought with him the writing which the King his Master had given him, as if it were the hand of Artamenes, which indeed was found to be the hand of Artaxes, who durst not reveale unto the King of Assyria, that plot which he had laid to ruine Cyrus. Ciaxares, comparing the relation of passages which Chrisantes had made unto him, the same day he was set at liberty, unto the relation of this Envoy, was much joyed at it: So that treating him very civilly, he told him, he should receive his answer in the morning; for he had no mind to give him his dispatch then, because he would honour Cyrus by taking his advice in the business. After then this Messenger was retired, and that they might talk with freedom, Cyrus did exactly relate unto Ciaxares what he had promised the King of Assyria, in the top of the Tower in Sinope, when the Prince Mazares was carrying away Mandana. And being now in no such conditions as needed any disguise, he ingeniously told him, that he had passed his word unto the King of Assyria, as that whensoever fortune should be so favorable unto him, as that he had delivered the Princess Mandana, and removed all those obstacles which did oppose his good fortune, he would never marry her, until he had fought with him. But why (said Ciaxares) did you make him that unjust promise? Because Sir (replied he) when the King of Assyria did unjustly desire me to set him at liberty, and I being faithful unto you, would not consent unto it, I then thought that this Prince might suspect, that I retained him for my own particular interest, as if I were glad to be eased of such a terrible enemy: So to let him see I had no thought in me so unworthy, I made that promise: And to speak sincerely unto you Sir, if I had not promised the same unto him then, I should do it now; nor can I ever live happy, unless I make the King of Assyria confess, that if Fortune favour me in any thing, she shall not do as one that is blind, who dispenceth all her favours without choice; and therefore I conjure you Sir by all the prevalence of my earnest prayers, to let me keep within the limits of our conditions, since for my part I shall never break them. Ciaxares at the first would not consent, but after he had considered the business every manner of way, he resolved to follow himself the conditions of Cyrus, conceiving it would confirm those conquests which he had already made, to have the conquered King of Assyria in his Army; for he knew very well, that those forces which the King of Assyria could bring with him, would not be considerable, not able to make any attempt against him. Then in the morning he told the messenger of that Prince, how since at the present the interests of Cyrus were his own, he should observe and perform all his promises; and that he might assure the King his Master, his person and his forces should be safe in his Army whensoever he would come into it, though the first taking away of Mandana might move him to treat him ill, and that Cyrus should punctually keep his word with him: That which principally induced Ciaxares to do thus was, because he thought he should be better able to prevent the combat of Cyrus, and the King of Assyria, when that Prince was in his Army, then when he was in his own, and his declared enemy. Also by this way he was put out of all fears, that the Princess Mandana should fall the second time into the King of Assyria's power, nor should he need to divide his forces, one part to make head against him, and the other to go into Armenia. He considered further also, that though ill fortune should needs contrive it so, that Cyrus must fight with this Prince, and be overcome, yet he should not be thereby engaged to give the Princess his daughter unto him, since Cyrus was engaged no further then his own interest, and not to cause her to marry him.

In the mean while, all things being in readiness for a march, Cyrus desired permission to command the Van-guard, and desired that half of the Persian Regiments might follow him: As Ciaxares could not deny him any thing, he obtained his desire, and resolved to depart only with twenty thousand men, that all the Volunteers should follow; that the King should also march presently after with the body of the Army, and that the Rear-guard should be commanded by the King of Hircania, the King of Phrygia to be with Ciaxares. Never was seen so much jollity as was amongst those Regiments which were chosen for this Van-guard, nor was ever more sensible sorrow, then was amongst those Officers and souldiers which were not first commanded out, as who should say they apprehended that Cyrus would conquer all without them, and that they should have nothing to do, nor any share in the victory when they came up. Whilst every one was preparing for departure of this illustrious Heroe, remembring his promise to the Inhabitants of Sinope, he beseeched Ciaxares to make good his word, and to imploy some of his good deeds in the repairing of that Town. Ciaxares was pleased it should be rebuilt out of the publique stock, and appointed Ariobantes, who stayed in Cappadocia to keep all in order there, to get Architects out of Greece, to repair the ruines of fire-consumed Sinope; commanding further, that as there was the Statue of that famous Milesia Page 87 called Autolicus, who was the first founder of the Town; so there should be another made for Cyrus, as the second founder, which was done accordingly. Mean while this renowned Prince went to bid adieu unto Martesia, who grieved for his departure; he desired him to restore the picture which she lent him, upon condition to restore it, when he first went unto the Armenian war; but he looking earnestly upon her, Cruel woman, said he unto her, how would you have me conquer, if you take that from me, which must render me invincible: You have brought home so many victories without this help, replied she, that I believe you have no need of it. Cyrus hearing her say so, thought that she would needs have him restore it, and there[fore] he grew extremely sad, his countenance changed, his eyes became melancholy, and all so disordered, that Martesia having pity upon him, said, Sir, I am contented to prolong the time, so you will promise to restore this picture of my Princess unto me, when you have delivered her: Cyrus returned thanks with all possible joy, and asking her whether he could serve her in any thing, she told him, how she had a design to be a little nearer Mandana, that she might the sooner see her, when he had set her at liberty, and that she designed to go with one of her cozens, who within this three daies would return unto the Frontiers of Armenia, where she dwelt, and therefore she desired him to give her a convoy thither. Feraulus, who was quick to hear this, did what he could to obtain that Commission, but Cyrus obligingly excused it, because he could not be so long without his only confident, unto whom he could freely discourse of his love, and told him, that it was unjust in him to desire his being so near Martesia, whilst he himself was so far from Mandana; and therefore he gave Ortaques orders to wait upon her, as a convoy in her voyage, with two hundred horse. Martesia beseeched him further, to give Orsanus leave to return unto the King and Queen of Sacas, conceiving it just, that since they did him the honor to trust their son the Prince Mazares with him, that he should go and give them a particular account of his loss. Cyrus remembering how much his dear Princess was obliged unto him, and how careful he had been of Martesia, and because he had been one of those who had helped to deliver her, would let him see, and told him himself, that he should find him very thankful: After that, rewarding him whether he would or no with a very rich recompence, he dismissed him, and then he bid adieu unto Martesia. He asked also the Prince Thrasibulus, whether he desired the restoration of some ships in lieu of those he had lost; but that generous Prince answered him, he should be ashamed to accept of them at this time, but he would first go unto the Armenian war, and there render himself worthy of that glorious protection, which he had promised him. Cyrus having now nothing to do at Sinope, went to take his leave of Cixares, who did embrace him with unparalleled kindness: Those Commanders which went not with him, came to bid him adieu, and testified fresh sorrows, that it was not their good hap to follow him. Cyrus had in his eyes that day such a kind of noble and sprightly fury, as presaged a happy victory; and to speak truth, his Physiognomy did speak him so great and happy, that whosoever saw him, could not imagine it possible he should be overcome. This Prince was of a very aspiring and advantageous tallness, and also most exactly made; his head was most admirable handsome; all the art which Medea used to their hair, was not comparable unto that becomingness which nature only used unto his; the colour, which was as lovely brown as every eye beheld, it was wreathed with a hundred thousand pleasing and delightful curls, negligently hanging down, and lying upon his shoulders; his complexion was most pure and clear, his sprightly eyes were black, full of sweetness and Majesty, his mouth was delicious and smiling, his nose something like an Eagles, the cymetry of his whole face was of a most admirable composure, his countenance most noble, and all his features so high and gallant, that certainly it may be truly said, never man upon earth was in every particular by themselves, and all parts together, better composed than Cyrus; so that whosoever saw him upon the day of his departure from Sinope, mounted upon as fine a horse as ever eye beheld, in his most magnificent and rich suit of Arms, and that day wearing the glorious Scarfe of Mandana over it, it was no wonder if all the people in Sinope did follow him out of the Town, with a million of benedictions and wishes of victory, and also with tears at his departure; he was followed by all the Officers and Volunteers, so that this great number of men of quality, all in rich habits, and admirably mounted, did make a most glorious shew; the Prince Thrasibulus, the Prince Artabius, Hidaspes, Gobrias, Gadates, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, Megabises, Adusius, Themocrates, Leontidas, Philocles, Feraulus, and a thousand others were in this illustrious number; yet in the midst of all this glorious tumult, and in spite of all the cares which Cyrus had upon himself, Mandana was continually in his heart and mind; and during all the long march, without neglecting any thing that did become the General of an Army, he failed not in the least circumstance, to do what did become a most faithful lover; but every hour that he could Page 88 steal from his necessary cares, he dedicated to the memory of Mandana, yet did it not at all prejudice his admirable and providential forecast, but he gave out such orders for the marches and quarters of his Army, that the places of his passages had no cause to complain against his souldiers. After they had marched several days, and at last came within a hundred furlongs of the river Licus, which parts the lesser Armenia from Cappadocia, some Scouts of the Army brought unto Cyrus (who was refreshing his men and horses in a Forrest) a man, whom they imagined to be a Spy, yet one who asked to speak with their General; but Cyrus was pleasantly surprized, to see it was Araspes, disguised in the habit of an Armenian Merchant, who was unknown unto the Cilicians, who took him; he embraced him then with joy, and drawing him aside; Well my dear Araspes, (said he unto him) have you been more happy in your expedition than Megabises was? and can you tell us more news of the Princess Mandana, and the King of Pont, then he did? I know Sir, answered he, as much almost as could be known, unless I had seen the Princess Mandana, or heard her named. But to relate what I have learned, I must tell you, how in the habit wherein you see me, and knowing the Armenian language very well, I have been taken for an Armenian, even in Artaxates it self, where the Court does now reside; there did I converse with divers persons, and understand that the King of Armenia does still give out, that the Princess Mandana is not in his Dominions; and that he hath published, the King of Medes does demand her, only as a pretence to make a new war upon him, because of the tribute which he would not pay him: The people also, as I understand, did a long time believe it so, but of late the people have altered their opinions, and every one does think, that the Princess Mandana is at this present in a Castle, not above fifty furlongs from Artaxates towards the Caldeans, and which is built upon the bank of a little river, which empties it self into Araxes at that place; that which begets this conceit is, because they hear there was two Ladies brought thither, about the same time that it was reported the Princess Mandana came thither; these two Ladies are kept in the Castle, guarded very carefully, and used with great respect: One who saw them, reports, that one of those Ladies is admirably fair, and very melancholy; I enquired as exactly as I could, without danger of discovery, of every particular concerning that Lady, and I find by all circumstances it must be the Princess, for they assured me she was very fair, yellow haired, of a good stature, and of a modest aspect: Besides all this, I my self observed, that the young Prince Phraartes, brother unto the Prince Tigranes, who now is sick in the high Armenia, and he comes thither often very privately, so that it is easily to be imagined, there is some person of great importance in that place. Moreover I must tell you, that going one day into this Castle with a Merchant of Artaxates, whose friendship I had purchased by some trivial presents, in hopes by his means to get entrance, under a colour of curiosity. I did at last get in as far as the first Court, and had certainly seen all the Castle, and all the Gardens, and by consequence the Princess; if by ill luck the Prince Phraartes had not at that time come in. They no sooner knew of his coming, but they endeavoured to conceal us, because they had received an express command to let none enter. As he came in, they caused us to go out in all hast, yet as I went through a passage in the Base Court, I saw that Prince in a Balcone courting a Lady, which seemed unto me to be the Princess Mandana, as I could guess so far off, and in a moments passing, and seeing only but one side of her head, nor being able to see nothing perfectly, but her stature, and the colour of her hair. This, Sir, is all I can tell you concerning the Princess, and all I could possible gather; for since that time they would not upon any term, permit me to come again into the Castle, nor can I hear any thing concerning the King of Pont: It is not to be doubted (said Cyrus) but that it was the Princess Mandana which you saw, the visits of the Prince Phraartes are insalable testimonies of it; but Araspes, added Cyrus, is this Prince as handsome as his brother Tigranes? I know not Sir (replied he smiling, for he was used always to be very free with Cyrus) for I never had the honor to see the Prince Tigranes, yet I know that Phraartes is not so handsome as the illustrious Artanones. Cyrus laughed at the discourse of Araspes, and embracing him again, I have done ill, I confess (said he unto him) to ask you such a question, and I deserve your railery for not asking first, whether the Castle be well fortified, whether the passage over that river be guarded, and whether you think, according to all appearance, the reducing it unto our power will cost us dear? But Araspes, love is such an imperious passion, that its interest will be first considered, and therefore you must excuse me. After this, Araspes told him, that the Castle stood in a Town so great, that it was but weak, that it was very irregular, in respect of its excessive length, that unless it had six thousand resolute men to guard it, it is not impossible to be taken: The difficulty of the business was, because it was within fifty furlongs of the Town of Artaxates, which is the greatest Town of both Armenia's, and all the forces which the King Page 89 of Armenia had, were quartered in the Suburbs of it. Moreover, since there are not many great towns in this Kingdom, because of the abundance of pasturage, which make all the country infinitely populous, and that so prodigiously full, as when the Inhabitants only do muster into Battalia, they make a terrible shew; therefore he beseeched him not to take it ill, if he should advise according to his opinion, not to attempt any thing, until all his Army was come up, and to content himself till then, with seizing upon a passage over the river, which was slenderly guarded, because that what intelligence soever the King of Armenia received, concerning the march of Cixares his Army, he could not believe that he would make war upon him in good earnest, but imagined always, that it was only to fright him unto the payment of that tribute which was demanded: Cyrus then gave Araspes thanks for the pains he had taken, and the danger he adventured in his behalf; and causing him to put off his Merchants habit, and to take a horse of his; he pursued his march, after he had held a Council of War concerning the assaulting of the passage over the river, only to honor the Officers which were with him, for in all Councils, his own opinion was the resolution of them all: He dispatched a messenger immediately to Cixares, to acquaint him with the intelligence of Araspes, and desire of vanquishing reviving in his heart, he hastened forward the march, and prepared to force the passage over the river presently, omitting nothing that a most prudent and courageous Captain could do, upon such an occasion; his design was presently executed, and easily affected: Those trenches which the Armenians kept, being forced within one quarter of an hour, he became master of the river, and in his enemies country, and with the loss of not above fifteen or twenty men; he cut in pieces all that made resistance, and entirely defeated them. When he came from Sinope, his intention was to stay at that place with the Army; but since his power was absolute, he altered his first resolution, and resolved to deliver Mandana, if it were possible, before the King came up, conceiving that the fewer men he had to participate in the danger, the more would the Princess be obliged unto him, and also the more glorious would the action be: That which did most prompt him unto this design, was news late come, that Cixares finding himself not very well, would defer his advance three daies longer; and in respect of that accident, his march would be the slower: but that which did most of all incite him unto this quick expedition, and dangerous attempt, was his consideration of the King of Assyria's coming, and it was odious unto him to think that his Rival should share with him in the glory of delivering his Princess; resolving then to stay no longer, he left two thousand men to keep that pass over the river, and went straight unto the great town of Artaxates, which was situated in a most fertile Plain upon the river Araxes, and near that place, where by the Councils of Hanibal, another King of Armenia did a long time after cause the new Artaxates to be built. This town had but few Advantages, yet were the walls so weak, and in many places so ruined, that all its strength did consist in the multitude of the Inhabitants, and truly it was so prodigiously vast, that no other heart, but that of Cyrus, durst ever have attempted it: Since he was come so near this huge town, (where the King of Armenia was staying until his Army, which already consisted of ten thousand men, was strong enough to come into the field) he would himself needs go, and discover the situation of the Town and Castle, which he desired to take; and after he had circumspectly viewed and observed all places round, the enemy never daring to appear but a far off, say what Chrisantes and his most faithful servants could unto him, he would hazard all to deliver his Princess. Then he caused twelve thousand men to march in the night unto that place, and he left six thousand at several places to secure his retreat, if need should be, and to guard the passage over Araxes; besides two thousand which he left to make good the passage over the river, which runs between Armenia and Cappadocia. After then he had drawn up his forces near a little wood, and drawn out those who were to make an assault upon the Town and Castle, although he had intelligence that all Artaxates was up in Arms, and all the Townsmen ready to come out against him, yet did not this great heart saint, but on the contrary, the greatness of the danger infusing new spirit into him, he made choice of a little rising ground, which was between the Town and the Castle; and after he had drawn six thousand men into Battalia, upon this hill, and had placed six terrible Engines, which shot great huge stones, to oppose any relief which the King of Armenia expected; he went with four thousand others to assault the town, in which they had placed three thousand souldiers, entrenched some few days before Cyrus came within sight of Artaxates.

This Assault was given in four several places at once, after that four Rams had battered the Barricadoes, and Walls: and that with so much fury, that the enemies were at the first affrighted: Any who had seen Cyrus bestir himself, would have said he was invulnerable, considering Page 90 how he exposed himself unto the clouds of his enemies arrows. The first Assault was commanded by the Prince Thrasibulus: The second by Hidaspes: The third by Aglutidas: as for Cyrus, he would reserve himself to fight within the Town, against any that durst relieve the Castle: The first Breach was on that side where Cyrus stood, and those which defended it, flying with all haste unto another Barricado, were there killed, and helped to enforce <...> others by their own defeat:

Mean while, both Thrasibulus, and Aglatidas, were happy in their attempts, and he Souldiers also, animated by the example of their valiant Commanders, plant[ed] Ladders against the walls, so that when the Inhabitants saw themselves assaulted on all sides, they fled to save their lives; some threw down their Arms, and submitted, others in a tumultuous disorder ran away; some to avoid the Sword of their enemy, finding the Bridg too narrow for such a throng, fell into the River, and were miserably drowned: some would have defended the Bridg, but the valour of Cyrus, who never sits down after a victory, did enforce them away, and pursued them: he killed all that resisted, and pardoned all that submitted; he who commanded the men at that pass, was a man of great heart, and was there killed because he would never ask Quarter: and of those three thousand which were placed in that quarter, there was very few which were not either wounded, or taken prisoners. The Prince Artibies, who would needs fight that day as a Voluntier, received two mortal wounds, which did most extreemly trouble Cyrus. Mean while, those within the Castle seeing themselves not able to hold out against such valiant Enemies, and the Princess which was in it, promising them great recompences, if they would render themselves unto this invincible Conquerour, they began to beat a parley, which did so infinitely rejoyce Cyrus in hopes to see his dear Mandana presently, that he was never in his life more sensible of any passion then at that time: yet did he much wonder, that the King of Pont, whom he knew to be so gallant and brave, did not appear: How comes it to pass, said he to himself, that I doe not see him upon such an occasion as this, with Arms in his hands? If he do well remember himself of some good offices which I have done him, why does he not restore unto me my Princess? If he will not restore her, why does he not come out and fight with me? Certainly, said he, he must be either dead, or else some odd policy which I cannot understand causes the King of Armenia to keep him prisoner in this Castle; but all these reflections did quickly vanish out of his mind: his almost certain hopes that he should immediately deliver Mandana, turned all into joy: He parlied then with the Captain of the Castle, he promised him all his desires, provided he would presently render him the Princess whom he there guarded: and the Captain obeying him, and trusting unto his word, which Cyrus did always keep even with his most mortall enemies, he set open the Gates, let all enter that would, and caused those few Arms which were in it to be laid down: As soon as Cyrus was in the first Court, Where is the Princess? (said he unto the Captain.) She is yonder Sir, (replied he, shewing him a walk) where indeed he saw two Ladies coming towards him: his imagination being wholly upon Mandana, he went in all haste unto these Ladies; but coming near, the first Lady lifting up her Cyprus, and presently stopping, as if she were surprized at the sight of Cyms, he saw one of the fairest objects, doubtless in the world, yet at this time most unsuitable unto his phancy; since he saw, she was not his Princess, he then turned towards the Captain, to accuse him, for so deceiving him: but the Lady addressing her self with a something disordered countenance, Sir, said she unto him, the King of Pont my Brother, was so gallantly treated by you, when he was your prisoner, that I must needs hope for the like favour from you, since you are too generous to deny protection unto one of the most unfortunate Princess upon earth: Cyrus was so troubled, that he had not delivered Mandana, and so surprized to hear that this Lady was Sister unto the King of Pont, that for a while he was not able to answer, yet clearing up his mind, You are not deceived Madam, (said he most cruelly unto her) when you believe I shall treat you with all the respect due unto me of your quality: for though the King your Brother, be him I aim at, and came to seek in Armenia, yet shall I render unto you all the services that are in my power: As this fair Princess was about to answer, Intelligence came unto Cyrus, that there was such a prodigious multitude of people coming out of Artaxates, that his Presence was requisite in the Army: Permit me then Madam (said he unto her, and taking her by the hand) that I wait upon you unto your Chamber, and there leave you Mistress of the Castle, till I have finished the victory. In saying so, he conducted her unto her lodging, where after a short complement, and leaving Chrisantes within, to see he wanted nothing, he went down into the Court, where he met some Souldiers and Captains bringing in the Prince Artibies wounded, that he might be there dressed with more conveniency: when Cyrus saw him in that condition, and observing how those which bore him were very weary and weak, and troubled in the carriage of him; yet Page 91 notwithstanding all the croud, and all the sorrows of his soul; this Prince did with his own hands help to carry him unto his Chamber and laid him upon a bed, commanding all possible care to be taken of him: After this, Cyrus took horse, and seeing he could not satisfie his love by the delivery of his Princess, he would however satisfie his glory, by doing the boldest act in the world, every step he made, he received intelligence upon intelligence concerning the Troops that were coming out of Artaxates, but how great soever they made the danger appear, yet he went to draw up his own forces, and resolved to fight them though they were an hundred thousand men, if they did begin the Assault: and indeed they were no less, for from the little valley under the Hill, where Cyrus stood, unto Artaxates, all the Countrey was covered with multitudes of enemies, who seemed as if they intended to fight: for the King of Armenia held a Councel of War about it without the walls of the Town, and advanced unto a little Village, which was close by the valley that separated the two Armies & there he made a halt; yet the Great Cyrus kept his station still, continually facing this innumerable multitude of enemies, who stood and durst not fall on: This great business was carried with so much good fortune, and prudence together, that it was six hours after the Castle was taken, before it was known to them of Artaxates.

In conclusion, after much consultation, the King of Armenian concluded that it was not expedient to fall upon such a Prince, as used to fight like a Lion, and overcome all that came near him. The Prince Phraartis who was pretty gallant, would have put it to the hazard, what ere came on it: but his advice being not followed, because an old experienced Captain maintained, That it was not wisdom with fresh new Troops of Townsmen, untrained in war, to assault Souldiers dyed in blood, and a General the Greatest in the world, especially he having the advantage of ground. Cyrus was well satisfied with the fight of his enemies, he faced them from morning until night, and would have presented them Battel if they durst have excepted it, though they were above twenty to one. The night came on apace, and covered the shame of the Inhabitants of Artaxates, in re-entering their Town, after they had only seen that Castle taken, which was so very considerable unto them, in respect of the River Araxes, which runs by it: yet was the soul of Cyrus far from satisfaction, and this great and bold act produced nothing but sorrow unto him; for his hopes were so high to deliver the Princess Mandana, that nothing else could answer them: as soon as he saw all the Armenian Troops were entered into their Town, and after he had placed good guards, he went to take his rest that night in the Castle which he took: After he had enquired concerning the state of the Prince Artibies, whom they said was very ill, and after he understood the Princess of Pont was retired; he went into his Chamber only with Feraulas: Well Feraulas, (said he unto him extreemly melancholy) what do you now think of my fortune? Do you not confess me to be the most unhappy Prince upon Earth? I think Sir, replied Feraulas, that it is the part of the conquered to complain, and of the Conquerours to rejoyce; No, no, Feraulas, said he: It is not glory and honour, which is the predominant aim of my heart: and though I had defeated this huge multitude of enemies, which I only looked upon, I should have been still as melancholy as I am: neither Conquests, nor reputation, nor honour, is the mark I now aim at: It is only Mandana, I look after, and since I find her not, I think my self as unfortunate as if I had been vanquished. Araspes lyed not, (said he) when he told me he had seen a Lady of quality in the Castle; that she was fair, yellow-haired, and of a good stature; but alas, this Princess as fair as she is, yields me no satisfaction by her sight. I conceive Sir, said Feraulas, that it is considerable, to have got the Sister of the King of Pont into your hands, a Lady of whom I have heard a good report, when I was in the Bythinian war: so that in all probability, it will keep that Prince in some fears. Ah Feraulas, answered he, and sighed, how dear soever the Princess of Pont is to him, Mandana is much more: he will easily dispense with a Sister for a Mistress: If he should have my brother; if I had one, or my father in his power, it would make me to do any thing to release them, but never upon such conditions as to quit Mandana: Also knowing me so well as he does, he will not fear mine ill entertainment of his Sister, although he do not restore Mandana, he knows too well that it is not my Genius to do a base, unjust, and cruel Act: and so since he conceives no danger, he will keep Mandana still.

But Sir, said Feraulas, are you fully assured that this Lady is the Princess of Pont? Yes, replied he, for now I call to memory a Picture which the wife of Arsamones caused the Princess her daughter to shew me, to the end she might discover whether or no I was Spitridates, I do very well see that it is she, for that picture resembles her extreemly: But, replied Feraulus, if it be she, I wonder she does not take you for Spitridates, as the Bythinean Princess did? Page 92 because doubtless, replied Cyrus, the King her brother has formerly acquainted her with out extreem resemblance. But however Feraulas, such things as these, we must not discourse of: Let Mandana, only Mandana be the only object of my thoughts, and the subject of our discourse: did I but know where she was, my Soul would be at some rest: for though she were in Artaxates, I would without staying for Ciaxares, attempt her delivery. Doubtless you might, replied Feraulas, for after this which we have seen; if you do not enforce it, it may well be said, the reason is because you would not; and the inhabitants owe you thanks, for all those miseries which you will not do them, when it is in your power: After they had thus discoursed a good while, Cyrus did lye down upon the bed, more to rest himself then to sleep; but he had not leasure to do that, for one came to tell him; that the Prince Artibies was at the last gasp, and desired to see him: He did rise immediately, and went unto him: Walso he found him at the very point of death, but in so free a mind, and quiet so us, that Cyrus was surprized at him: I am desperately forty, (said he unto him, coming heer him) that I should be partly a cause of your deplorable condition: No, (most generously did this dying Prince answer) rather rejoyce with me, who since the death of Leontina, looked for nothing from the wars but ruine: I could never in any place have died with more honor, then neer you; nor shall I desire life, but shall die with more joy then I can express, if you will promise me to cause my ashes to be inclosed within the Tomb of Leontina: In pronouncing this name, which was so dear unto him, he expired without the least motion, by reason of his great loss of blood: yet had he this satisfaction before he died, to hear Cyrus promise what he desired, for he weakly held out his hands, and cast his eyes towards him, by way of thanks: That which was most admirable in this sad accident was, that death did not fright out of his countenance those pleasing signs of desire to dye, which he ever more since the death of his Mistress. The heart of Cyrus was exceedingly tendered at the loss of this young Prince, who doubtless did own all the accomplished qualities that might merit his esteem and friendship: he testified his sorrow by most apparent signes: and though his Tomb was covered with the spoils of vanquished enemies, and hung about with Trophes of broken Arms, yet was it further honoured, in that his ashes were wa[t]red with the tears of the greatest Prince in the world: In the mean while, day did begin to break, and intelligence was brought that there was so great a Tumult within Artaxates, and such an universal amazement, that the King of Armenia was gone out of it with his whole Court, and a great part of his Forces, retreating unto certain inaccessible Mountains, where he had some Castles very well fortified, he understood also that the King had carryed the Queen his wife, and the Princesses his daughters with him: and he imagined that perhaps Mandana might be there also: his desire was to go after them immediately: but he was confidently told that before he could be in readiness to see forward, the King of Armenia would be got within his Sanctuary, where he had nothing to fear but fami*. Yet since Cyrus would not trust unto what was told him, he took horse, after he had commanded an Egyptian Chyrurgion which was in the Cyprian Brigado, to imbalm the Corps of the Prince Artibies, after such an excellent manner as was used in his Country, and which would keep the Corps a long while is corruptable: he gave orders also to present a complimentary excuse unto the Princess of Pont, that he could not see her until his return, and these orders being given, he went with two hundred horse only; to be shewed these Mountains, and indeed he perceived it impossible to arrive thither in any time: he then resolved to go and possess himself of some advantageous place betwixt those Mountains and the Town to prevent any communication between them: But no sooner did tho* which were appointed for that design under Hidaspes begin to march, but the Inhabitants of Artaxates multiplying their fears, had held a tumultuous councill, and conceived it more safe for themselves, to submit unto such a Conqueror as; Cyrus; then any longer to reast such an <◇> Prince: They sent then Deputies unto him, to beg <◇◇>, and that in such submission terms as if his whole Army had been at their Gates: As he was the sweetest prince upon Earth unto all such as resisted him not, so he desired no more from them, but a bare oath of Fidelity: he did not conceive it expedient, with so few Forces as he had, to engage himself within that Town, but contented himself, to posses himself of both the ends of Artaxes, and some Castles which were indifferent strong, in divers Entran[c]es into Artaxates, to the end he might thereby take all relief away from the King of Armenia, and all ma <◇◇> communication between the town, and the mountains* where he was: <◇> continued his design of sending Hidaspas with twelve hundred men only to the foot of the mountains, <...> by to prevent the country from carrying in of provisions; after all which he resolved to wait until Ciaxares came up, before he would make any other; attempts; and <◇> he had given our all expedient and necessary orders, he returned unto the Castle <◇> Page 93 whence he came, with much impatience to discourse with the Princess of Pont, imagining, that perhaps she could tell where the King her brother was, and by consequence where the Princess Mandana was.

Having then rested himself a while, and put himself into a fit and handsom garb to appear before her, he sent to ask whether he might be permitted the honor to see her: As she did no less desire it then he, though for different reasons, so she sent word back, that she should be very glad to entertain his visit; so that going immediately unto her, he was received with all possible civility, and he rendered her all the submission and reverence, as if she were in Heraclea. After the first complemental ceremonies were performed; Sir, said she unto him, if fortune had been as favourable unto the King my brother, as you were unto him in procuring his release, I would not have lost those Kingdoms which he once possessed: I know not Madam (replied Cyrus) whether the King of Pont has not been a greater gamer by the loss of his Kingdoms, then he would have been in keeping them: But I am most certain, that I prefer that favour which fortune has bestowed upon him since he lost them, before all he had before she deprived him of them; and I wish unto the Gods with all my heart, that he were reinvested, and set upon those Thrones again which he has right unto, upon condition he would restore that unto which he has no right at all. This discourse is so obscure unto me, (said the Princess of Pont) that I am not able to return a pertinent answer; for indeed I know very well, that the King my brother has lost the Kingdom of Pont, and Bythinia also; that he was forced to depart from the last town that was left him, and to fly away in a Ship to seek security for his person from you; but I do not know how Fortune which deprived him of this Throne, has made him a gainer since: But I understood since, that he was not with you, and I was told, the last (without any certainty) that he was here in Armenia, whether I came to seek him, yet cannot find him. How Madam, said Cyrus, is not the King of Pont, and the Princess Mandana in Armenia? I do not believe, answered she, that the King my brother is here; and though he were, indeed I cannot imagine how the Princess Mandana should come hither. Cyrus seeing with what free ingenuity this Princess spoke unto him, told her all, how the King of Pont had saved the Princess Mandana from shipwreck; how he left his ship, and took boat up the river Halis to come into Armenia; so that Madam, said he, I do not see it possible but he must be here, and I wonder you should not know it: I have had so little liberty, said she, since I came into Armenia, that it is not impossible but he may be here, and yet I not know it: But Sir, how can it be, that he, of whom you speak, who has divers times spoken unto me concerning you, as the man, whom of all the world he most esteems, though he knows not your quality, should any way disoblige you? He, I say, whom you have so much obliged, he unto whom you gave both life and liberty, and he who had an intention to preserve you, at a time when you were in danger: He never had any intention to destroy me, replied Cyrus, but he has most cruelly wronged me: Ah Sir, said she, he did not describe Artamenes unto me, to be so unjust, as that he should think it to be a wrong, which was done without design; nor can I think him changed, since he was Cyrus; he is not changed at all, replied he, for he loves the Princess Mandana now, as he loved her then, although the King of Pont did not know it then, so that Madam, you may easily judge, he does not at all oblige me in carrying away the Princess, and retaining her against her will. I should not speak thus unto you Madam, said he, if the affection I bear unto her were not now known over all Asia, and if I were not forced to justify myself to the opinion of so excellent a Lady as you; Sir, said she unto him, I can say nothing to it, yet for your consolation let me tell you, that the King my brother owes such a profound reverence unto the Princess Mandana, that you need not fear any ill treatment of her; and if I knew where he were, I would beg of you permission to go and try whether I could move him to restore her unto her father. Cyrus returned thanks unto this Princess with much affection, and she discourse on both sides was so very obliging, that Cyrus did wonder to find a disposition so ready to do him any good office in the Sister of his Rival. It is very true, she was so handsome, and so amiable, that it was impossible but one must needs esteem her infinitely, and be in terms of friendship, though not in love with her. Moreover, since she found in Cyrus the resemblance of a person, who was most dear unto her, she expressed more obliging civility towards him, then she perceived in her self, so that for three or four dayes Cyrus did visit her every spare hour, wherein he did not visit some guard or other, and a great friendship grew betwixt them; for after Cyrus had satisfied the curiosity of this Princess, by making a short relation of his fortunes unto her; and since he assured her, that if the King her brother would restore the Princess Mandana, he would help him to recover his lost Kingdoms; she thought the condition good, and she herself also believed, that as soon as the King of Pont should know, Page 94 that Artamenes is Cyrus, and that Cyrus did love, and was loved by Mandana, he would change his design: So that conceiving she ought not to look upon this Prince, as the King her brothers enemy, she regarded him, as both her, and his protector, and as a Prince, who perhaps would become a Mediator between the King of Pont, and the new King of Bythinia; so that she enjoyed pleasure and satisfaction in the sight and conversation of Cyrus: This Prince was for some certain days a little troubled to observe, that this Princess never saw him, but she changed colour, and sighed often when she looked upon him: But remembering the picture which was shewed him in Bythinia, he concluded, that Spitridates, whom he resembled, was not only in love, but it must needs be, that he was loved also: and since he had great hopes in the negotiation of this Princess, with the King her brother, when it was known where he was, and since he knew that there was nothing so engaging, as to be a confidant unto one who is in love, and he knew how to carry the matter so handsomly without too much pressing, so that I moved her ingeniously to acquaint him with the misfortunes of her life, to the end some expedient remedies against them might be applied, and that he might find out means to prevent her misfortunes, as she would his, if it were possible. One morning when Cyrus heard that Ciaxares would come up within three days, and that the King of Armenia had not any victuals to hold out long, his mind being in more tranquility, by reason of his hopes to be satisfied from the King of Armenia himself, where he sought for was, he went unto the Princess of Pont, to put her in mind of her promise; but though she was very willing to give him satisfaction, yet had she no mind that her adventures should come out of her own mouth, but that one which was with her, who was well acquainted with every circumstance, even to the least of her thoughts, might make a relation of them. Cyrus consented unto the motion, and for the present retired, but presently after dinner he returned unto her chamber, where he found her who was to relate the misfortunes of the Princess of Pont, who was herself gone into her Closet with some Armenian women which waited upon her: This Lady who was to make the relation, was called Hesionida, one of very good quality, originally from Bythinia, whose mother was Governess unto the Princess, and who indeed was a kind of Governess herself unto her; for since she was six or seven years elder then Araminta, her mother, who was very old and sickly, committed the charge unto her, so that she was exactly knowing in all the passages of that Court; and since she had a most charming wit, and was very sweet and complaisant in all just things, she made the Princess of Pont, even adore her. Cyrus, who knew the quality of Hesionida, by the information of one of the Princess men, did treat her very civilly, and full as respective complements returned as given: Then did they sit down, and thus did Hesionida begin.

The History of the Princess ARIMINTA, and SPITRIDATES.

The order which I have received from the Princess, to make an exact relation unto you of her misfortunes, requires, Sir, that you arm your self with abundance of patience, for they are so numerous, that they cannot be comprehended in a short story: and necessity compels me to let you understand, not only those which relate only to the Princess herself, but those also which concern her father; the usurpation of the Kingdom of Bythinia is the real cause of all those miseries she endures: You Sir, who has won so many battles thereabouts, do know, that a river only divides the Kingdom of Pont, and the Kingdom of Bythinia, so that it is not at all strange, that an ambitious King of Pont should stretch his limits over it: But I believe, that the course he took will appear so unjust unto you, that you will hardly endure so much as the relation of it. Be pleased to know, Sir, that the Grand-father of the Princess Ariminta, was a very violent Prince, one that was most jealous of his authority, and as adventurous as any man in the world, all his life was wholly taken up in wars with his Neighbours, sometimes against the King of Phrygia, other whiles against the King of Cappadocia and Galatia, and sometimes against the King of Paphlagonia; but in all these wars he was continually assisted by the King of Bythinia, which then reigned, who was father unto Arsames, who now is upon the reconquest, yet notwithstanding he bore a spleen in his heart against him, because he once opposed a new war, which he would needs undertake against Cappadocia, without any ground or reason for it; for since Bythinia was between the Kingdom of Pont and Galatia, he could not make any attempts upon it, unless that Prince gave him a passage through his Dominions, which he refused to do. After this, he always looked upon Bythinia, as a great Obstacle unto his ambitious designs: But Sir, it befits me, to pass this over very slightly; for since I am originally a Bythian, the love of my Country may perhaps make me speak more then is fit, considering the Page 95 respect which I am obliged to render unto those Kings, from whom the Princess whom I serve is descended; yet must I not make that crime a secret, which is publicly known unto so many Kingdoms, since it is the very foundation of all I shall tell you. Be pleased to understand then in few words, that the King of Pont, desiring to confer with the King of Bythinia, about some important affairs, which he said concerned them both, both these Kings drew towards their Frontiers, and since the river Sangar is the limits unto both of those Kingdoms, they made choice of a most pleasant Island, wherein there was a very fair house, fit for this interview, which was made ready with all possible magnificence: But yet since this Isle belonged unto the King of Pont, he therefore was at all the expences of these feasts, which lasted three days in all imaginable prodigality and splendor: The last of these three days the King of Bythinia was seized upon with so sudden and violent a sickness, that the Physicians did give him over, and it was impossible that he should be transported out of this Isle, where the King of Pont stayed with him, expressing so many testimonies of real sorrow, that all the world were deceived in him, and especially the King of Bythinia more then any else. This Prince then, having only one son, about six years of age, and having buried the Queen his wife, seeing himself in this extremity, and thinking to prevent the King of Pont, whom he knew to be of an ambitious humour, from usurping Bythinia, he would declare him Governour over the Prince his son; so that being in this deplorable condition, unto which all the Kingdom believed he was brought, by a poison which the King of Pont had given him, he assembled all the Grandees of Bythinia, which waited upon him, to this interview, and declared unto them, how he intended the King of Pont, during the minority of his son, should have the Government of his Dominions, and disposal of all things, with this proviso yet, to confer the offices of Government only unto the Bythinians. The King of Pont made a shew, as if he were unwilling to accept of this offer; but at the last, this unfortunate Prince pressing him more urgently unto it, he promised him to preserve the Crown of Bythinia, as his own; and he spoke with so much seeming generosity, that he caused him to die a satisfied, though a violent death. Though all the Grandees of Bythinia did seem to approve of this resolution, not daring to desire their dying King, yet after he was dead, reports of poison making great noise, they opposed against it, and made use of the guards unto the late King to secure the person of their young Prince, who was within fifty furlongs of that place, in a Castle where the Kings of Bythinia used to bring up their children, until such times as they were fit to be taken out of the hands of women: But the King of Pont foreseeing such a design, caused all the Garrisons of all the towns along the river, secretly to redouble their guards, so that in drawing them out, he quickly made up a little Army, with which he seized upon the person of the young Prince, and made himself master of Bythinia, procuring the favour of some Grandees in the Kingdom by golden arguments. After this, he returned into Heraclea, where he educated the young Prince Arsames; at the first, he caused all honors due unto a King of Bythinia to be rendered unto him, to the end he might the handsomer deceive the Bythinians, and allure them to receive his orders: But afterwards, when he had well established himself, he published a Declaration, by which he would make it appear, that the late King of Bythinia did acknowledge his Kingdom had been formerly usurped from the Kings of Pont; and by which he said, that the late King desired his son should be only a subject unto him, who now reigned: In short Sir, Force, not Justice was his Law, and Arsames was now created only as a Prince, not a King, and was indeed no more then a Slave which is loaded with heavy chains of gold, he wore them with an unexampled patience and dissimulation: Those who use to dive deep into the reason of things, could not comprehend why the King of Pont should put the father to death, yet spare the son: but whether it was out of fear, to force the Bythinians unto a war against him, or that he was restrained from it by a predominate power of the Gods, which would not suffer him, yet he did it not: Arsames then lived as a subject, and married a Bythian Princess, which was permitted, because she was not rich; but in recompence thereof, she was at that time admirable fair, and at this time as virtuous as fair; then you know Sir her virtues and condition as well as I do, since you were with her, when you were taken for the Prince Spitridates; he permitted also a sister unto the King, whom he had imprisoned, to marry the Prince Gadates, yet it was because Nitocris Queen of Assyria, did procure it. Mean while the King of Pont, who had only one son died, and Arsames changed Masters, though not condition; for indeed Sir, this new King of Pont and Bythinia, father of the Princess Araminta, although he was not so criminal as the King his father; yet finding himself in possession of two Crowns, he kept them, and never would hearken unto any restitution, so that Arsames was forced to dissemble still, and seem to be contented with his fortune, because he had no power to make it better: for the King Page 96 of Pont was then in amity with all his Neighbours, and Arsames had neither any troops, nor money to raise them. Mean while Sir, the King of Pont had two sons, and one daughter, and the Prince Arsamones had one daughter, and two sons, the elder of which is Spitridates, who so much resembles you: As the Queen of Pont died very young, so the Princess Araminta was but five years old when she lost her mother: and as my mother had the honor of that great Queens love, she moved the King her husband, to confer the Government of the Princess Araminta upon her: But to shew you the piety and virtue of this Princess, I need only tell you, that she appointed my mother to cherish as much as she could, a love and friendship between her children, and the children of the Prince Arsamones, wishing heartily, that he might hereafter become so generous, as to restore the Kingdom of Bythia unto the right heir. You may be pleased to conceive Sir, that she did most willingly obey so just a command; and truly there was no great difficulty to beget a love amongst them, since they were all so amiable; and it must needs be acknowledged, that never was a more jolly sight, than this little Court of young Princes and Princesses: But amongst the rest, the amity between Spitridates eldest son of Arsamones, and the Princess Araminta, was extraordinary; for the first of these two Sir, you need only to remember your own infancy, to imagine him, since truly there is a most wonderful resemblance betwixt you and him; and as for the Princess of Pont, you need only to look upon her, and judge, that she was fair from her cradle: The sister of Spitridates, named Aristeia, is also, as you know, very fair; and the Prince Sinnesis, elder brother unto Arilandus, who is now King of Pont, was of a good stature, and handsome, as well as his brother, whom you do know; and the youngest son of Arsamones, called Euriclides, as also a very handsome Prince, of these Sir, did the Court of Pont consist: so that since peace on all sides seemed now to be solidly established, there was no thoughts but upon the education of these young Princesses and Princes, and to contrive all the pleasant recreations their ages were capable of: The King of Pont himself, out of policy, did command my mother to do the same, which the Queen his wife had appointed her to do out of virtue; for he conceived, that if his eldest son should marry a daughter of Prince Arsamones, that would more confirm the possession of the Kingdom of Bythia in his house. The state of things standing thus, all the recreations of these young children were together; their walks, their huntings, their balls, their musiques, caused them continually to be together; and I dare affirm, that their education was such, as made them cease, being children, much sooner than their age permitted them; and though they lived together with all equal civility, yet their inclinations began to make some difference, and I perceived that Spitridates did much more respect the princess Araminta, than the prince Euriclides his brother: I observed also at the same time, that the prince Sinnesis was more indulgent towards the princess Aristeia, than he who is now the King of Pont: And since my mother had acquainted me with the Kings intentions, and also with the Queens, to the end I might be serviceable that way, I was even ravished to see so happy a beginning in the design, and I believe also, that the prince Arsamones, and the princess Arbianna his wife did like it well. I perceived then that love did kindle in these two young hearts, and I saw them love one another, and knew it not themselves; for Sinnesis and Spitridates did render a thousand petty services unto those princesses which they adored, not knowing they were in love, more than the princesses whom they loved. But the princess Ariminta being in her fourteenth year, and the prince Spitridates his sixteenth, they began to be sensible of their passions: The joy which he was wont to have when he saw the princess became more moderate, and though she used her accustomed civility towards him, yet was he not so well satisfied, as before; his heart moulded such desires, as that he did not know what he himself desired, but not knowing very well what he wanted to compleat his good fortune, he became very melancholy: As the princess Araminta did very much esteem him, and as he pleased her eye better than any she saw in the Court, so she was the first which perceived it, and asked me whether or no I knew from whence this alteration in the humour of the prince Spitridates did arise; and when I answered her, that I knew not, she told me, that it much troubled her, and that she would ask him the reason herself. Madam, said I unto her, and smiled, it is not always fit to be so inquisitive; how do you know, whether the prince Spitridates would have the cause of his melancholy known? And why should he hide it (answered she unto me) from one that would pity him, if I could not help him? He would hide it perhaps (said I unto her, and laughed) because he does not know the cause himself. Ah Hesionida, said she unto me, Spitridates is too full of reason to be troubled without a cause, and if I thought that were all, I would quickly cure him. As I was ready as answer, the princess Aristeia came in, and a little after her the valiant Pharmaces, who had the honor to be the last man that fought with you in the combat of two hundred; and also at the Page 97 same time, the coward Artanus came in, who accompanied Spitridates thither. After their conversation had continued a pretty while, the prince Sinnesis made a motion unto his sister the princess to go and walk, she was so complacient as to consent. This prince was then sixteen years old, and the princess Aristeia fifteen; and I believe he had already expressed some slight marks of his passion unto her, which she knew of, but neither much accepted, nor rejected them. When they were in the garden, the prince Sinnesis, after she had talked a while with the princess his sister, presented his hand unto the princess Aristeia, and Spitridates took the princess Araminta by the hand, and so they walked; so that Pharmaces and Artanus seeing that their aims were prevented already by Spitridates, went away in a jealous fit. Mean while, the small experience of this young Lady causing me to fear that she would too urgently ask Spitridates the thoughts of his heart, I followed presently after, and handsomly turned the discourse another way: for since my mother, as I told you before, was both sickly and aged, and since I was six or seven years elder than the princess, I was a kind of an under-governess, the King appointing it so, and the princess was glad of it, because she did me the honor to love me. But Sir, to return unto my discourse, the princess Arbianna being come into the garden, intending to speak with me concerning some important business, I was constrained to leave the prince and princess, and by consequence to leave them at liberty to discourse together, for the prince Sinnesis did not at all molest them, being busied enough in his Courtship with the princess Aristeia: Since we walked ten or twelve paces behind them, I could not hear their words, but only guess by their manner of actions. But in the end, I saw the princess Araminta come suddenly towards us, saying she was weary with walking, and would rest herself, so that leaving Spitridates, she sat down upon seats of grass. I observed all the passage very exactly, and saw Spitridates blush in quitting the princess, and she also blushed, though she did hide it with her Hood: All the rest of the day she seemed much disquieted, though she did strive to hide it with all her care: Upon her return unto her chamber, she went into her Closet, and called none of her women with her, as she was accustomed: I went in unto her, and found her leaning against the window in a serious deep study. Madam, said I unto her, and laughed, since you did not think it unhandson to ask the prince Spitridates what was the cause of his melancholy, I hope you will not think it impertinent in me, if I ask you, what's the cause of your musing at this time. At the first she would have perswaded me, that she mused no more than ordinarily, yet seeing she could not; But Hesionida, said she unto me, did you not tell me it was not good to be too inquisitive? Yes Madam, replied I unto her, but I am not the princess Araminta, nor are you the prince Spitridates, so that without any fear of offending, I have reason to ask what it is which troubles you, since my only end is to help it, if it be in my power. Truly Hesionida, (said she unto me) there is nothing in my mind which vexes me. Truly Madam, replied I, there is something which does trouble you, and if you will not do me the honor to tell it unto me, I shall think that the prince Spitridates has discovered unto you the cause of his melancholy, and that it has infected you: The Gods preserve me, said she unto me hastily: You know then Madam what it is, said I unto her.

The Princess blushing seeing she could not deny it, and coming nearer me with the greatest ingenuity and sweetness in the world; It is true, said she unto me, I do know it; and if you did but know how angry and ashamed I was, doubtless you would extremely pity me. But Hesionida, said she, why did you not desire me more earnestly than you did, not to ask Spitridates, the cause of his melancholy? for I do imagine that you knew it, or at least suspected something. I confess unto you, that the Non-plus of this young Princess, and the anger which I saw in her eyes moved me almost to laugh at her, yet I did restrain it, lest I should have too much incensed her: And after I had intreated her to tell me, what their conference was, and she many times excusing, but at the last consenting unto my desire, told me: You were no sooner entered into discourse with the Princess Arbianna, said she unto me, but being extremely impatient to know what it was which troubled Spitridates, I entered into discourse with him. You are so changed, said she, of late, that all your friends do wonder it, nor can they imagine the cause of your melancholy: I do not think they do, answered he unto her, nor is there any in the world unto whom I will impart it. How, replied she unto him, Is it such a displeasure as you would not have any know it? then it seems you would not have any pity you, or comfort you: I wish the first, replied he unto her, but I dare not wish the second. How can they do either, replied she, when they are ignorant of your sufferings? Did you not tell me, answered he, that all my friends do wonder, and are sorry for my melancholy? and if so, can they not pity me, unless they know the cause of my sorrows? No, not I, answered she, for perhaps you esteem your self unfortunate in some things, for which I would not pity you at Page 98 all. What may those things be, replied he, and sighed, for which the Princess Araminta has no compassion? If you should envy at the honour of another, said she, and that trouble you, I would not all pity you for it. But suppose I were in love, answered he, would you pity me then? No, answered she, but on the contrary, I would esteem you much more for it, since every one ought to be in love with honour and glory; But indeed Spitridates, said she, since it is not your mind I should know what it is which torments you, I shall not pity you, but shall believe you think me not discreet enough to keep a secret. Ah Madam, replied he, I do not fear that you would publish that which I should tell you. What do you fear then, (answered she, with such a pretty simplicity, as made him almost desperate.) I fear, answered he, that you would hate me. And why should I hate you, answered she, for trusting me with a Secret? Perhaps you would hate me, answered he, if you should know that Spitridates is not unfortunate in any thing, but in that he loves the fair Princess of Ponts more than he ought: He had no sooner pronounced these words, but immediately I saw (said she) my dear Hesionida, a thousand things which I did not see before, and I was so confounded at my simplicity and innocency, that I durst not look upon him, yet after I had reassumed my confidence, You have reason, (said she, being both angry, and ashamed) to think that the Princess of Pont will hate Spitridates, if he should love her too much, and as your friend I advice you to keep your Secret so close, that none may ever know it. I will obey you, Madam, said he, you your self shall be the only one in the world, who shall ever know it, or to whom I shall ever reveal it. I no sooner heard him say so, But I was so much ashamed that I came unto you, said she, and returned no answer: After that the Princess had ended her relation with many signs of shame, and anger in her eyes, she asked me, what she should do? And I advised her, to avoid any private conference with Spitridates, as handsomly as she could, without any incivility to him: and to behave herself towards him as to a Prince whom perhaps she might one day marry, and perhaps not: and to carry the matter so with him, that he may esteem you much; and to obtain this esteem, you must be neither too indulgent, nor too scornful unto him: and that since she was very young, I desired her, not to keep any thing which Spitridates should say unto her, or she answer him, as a Secret from me, because it was very dangerous to trust ones self with a business so nice as this was, especially in an age so young as hers. This young and wise Princess did promise what I desired, and indeed, did most exactly keep her word, and do whatsoever I desired her.

As Spitridates was one of the most wise and discreet young Princes in the world, he did for a while content himself, that he had discovered his passion unto the Princess Araminta, without any further persecution, fearing she should treat him ill. Inasmuch as seeing him live in such a moderate and discreet reservedness, I did imagine that this young Princess perhaps knew not yet the difference between a bare piece of Gallantry, and Courtship, and a real declaration of love, since there is used, for ought I can hear, the same language, both for the one and the other, and that there is nothing which makes the difference between them, but the tone of the voice, and the manner of pronouncing words: so that I did believe this was all his meaning in it, and I would have made the Princess believe as much, who out of modesty did give credit unto what I told her, though that belief had no ground in the bottom of her heart. Mean while the Prince Sinnesis, who was of a more forward spirit than Spitridates, and who, as things then stood, had not so great a respect unto the Princess Aristeia, as Spitridates had unto Araminta, did openly discourse of his passion; yet do what he could, he could never obtain one favourable look from that Lady: she carried her self indeed very civilly unto him, yet it was, as being the Son of the King of Pont, and as Brother unto the Princess Araminta, with whom she held a great intimacy, not at all as being her Lover. All the Court were puzzled to find out the cause of this her cold aversion to him, for they all knew, that if Aristeia did not marry the Prince Sinnesis, she should never be Queen: for my part I ever thought, that her reason why she treated him in that manner, was because of the uncertainty in his designe, and that as soon as the King should speak unto Arsamones concerning it, she would then alter her course with him: Mean while, Sir, the Princess Araminta, did darken all the beauties in the Court, and in all Heraclea, with the splendor of her beauty: and since there was none but only Aristeia, which did not seem ugly in her presence, she conquered a thousand hearts, and without any design on hers, did captivate a thousand Slaves. Amongst the rest, the valiant Pharmaces, and the Coward Artanus were so captivated, that they could not conceal their passions from all the Court, though fain they would have kept them secret; Not but that they were both of them of the prime quality in all the Kingdom: yet durst they not look so high: but love is of its own nature a mysterious secrecy: and moreover the gallant Air of this young Princess made them afraid Page 99 to discover themselves: They were most assiduous in waiting upon her, yet so full of respect, that she could find no fault with their proceedings, since at this time, Artanus was very young, his cowardize was not yet discovered, and since he had a good wit, and not unhandson, he was well enough esteemed on, and received into company as a man of his quality should be. As for Pharmaces, Sir, I need not speak of his Gallantry, since the last act of his life speaks better for him than I can. But let me tell you, that he was one of those real Heroes, which use to look with fury in the face of their enemies, and with pleasing favour in his ordinary conversation: he was both wise and modest; and though he spoke but little, yet had he a pleasant wit, because whatsoever he said was so just, and premeditated, that it was agreeable to all hearers: he was also much esteemed Princes, and Princesses; and amongst the rest, he who now is King of Pont, (but then only Prince Ariandes) loved him extremely. Thus Sir, (you see the state of things, the Princess Araminta was courted by Spitridates, Pharnaces, and Artanus: the Prince Sinnesis loved the Princess Aristeia, and also loved Spitridates very well: and the Prince Argandes, not being in love with any, no more then the Prince Euricides, contracted a most intimate friendship with Pharmaces. In all publick feasts, at Horse-races, Balls, Walkings, all these Lovers appeared according to their particular designs; and the Court of Pont for a while, was one of the most gallant and pleasant Court in all Asia: Since Phrygia, and Lidia were near, Musicians out of both those Kingdoms were procured, which much augmented their delights, and since Heraclia is certainly one of the goodliest Towns, that ever the Grecians built, and the Countrey about it most pleasant, not only because of the Sea, which lies on one side, but also because of a great and delightful River, which runs under the walls: and it may well be said, that all innocent diversions and pleasures in the world, did reign in the Pontean Court: For the King, as I already told you, did out of policy desire that Sinnesis should marry the daughter of Arsamones, and that Spitridates should marry the Princess Araminta, and was much pleased with the Gallantry, and Courtship of these young Lovers, who all this while let no opportunity slip, to please their Princesses. But above all the rest, Spitridates was most officious: all his actions were plausible, every word he spoke had a charming spel in it: and his very silence was sometimes so eloquent and agreeable, that I confess, I looked upon this young Prince, as one most worthy to marry the Princess Araminta: so that without any thing opposing his passion, all my care, was that the Princess did not receive him too favourably: But that did little trouble me, for although she did very much esteem him, and had also a good inclination towards him, yet was she so naturally modest, and preferred her honour before all things else, that she perplexed him as much as if she had a strong aversion to him: so that when he would discourse of his love unto her, she would most sharply forbid him, and plunge him into a deeper melancholy: when I perceived the alteration in Spitridates; Madam, (said I unto her one morning when she was alone) do you remember the day when you asked me whether I knew the cause of the Prince Spitridates his melancholy? and will you not now take it ill, that if in my turn I ask you what it is which thus disquiets you at this time? Hesionida (said she unto me) If you will absolutely know it, you shall; but you would do me a greater pleasure, if you would save me the labour of relating the follies of that Prince. Truly Madam, said I unto her, I do so much esteem Spitridates, that I am much troubled at his sorrows, and this is the reason that I desire to know the cause of them. Then did I urge so much that I moved her to acknowledge how Spitridates had spoken unto her concerning his passion, and how she had sharply forbid him to do any more, and that she believed he would not be so bold as to disobey her. But (said I unto her, to pump her mind, after I had commended her for what she had done, so she had done it without any scorn of that Prince.) If Spitridates, should be exactly obedient, and never any testimonies of esteem come from him, would you then thank him for it? Do you think, said she, and blusht, that I command things which I would have done? But Madam, said I unto her before you make any fresh questions, I beseech you answer a little more directly unto mine, and tell me truly, whether if the Prince Spitridates should speak unto you no more, wait upon you no more, neither unto the Temple, nor into the Walks: if he should never care for pleasing you, or rendering you a thousand services every day: if he should look upon you with cold indifferent eye, or perhaps slight you, what would you then think? would not all these displease you? But replied she, and laughed. I did not forbid him speaking, nor command him from those things which civility requires: Then I understand you, Madam, said I unto her, and smiled, you would have Spitridates love you, and not tell you of it. No, replied she, you do not rightly interpret my words. I do expound them as I ought to do, said I unto her, nor is it forbidden you to suffer a Prince, who in all appearances must be your Husband to love you. But Madam, I beseech you remember, that you carry your self so unto him, Page 100 that if ever that happiness befall him, you may never repent your self of any word, either too bitter, or too sweet unto him; and it is after this rule which I conjure you to direct your self in your carriage towards Spitridates: for I am certain, that if you punctually observe what I say, you shall never speak any thing unto him, which may cause repentance: Thus much she did promise me, and so our conference ended. All this while, Spitridates was not the only singular Lover of the Princess: for since Artanus was as bold with his tongue, as he was timorous in combate, after he had carried himself a while in a respective manner, he did at last unbind himself unto his natural inclination, which was always insolent, if his hare-like courage had not a little restrained him: but since in this war, there was no great danger of life, he was as bold as a Lion: for upon a day when Spitridates was with the Princess, and when Artanus came in, and the Prince received a message from Sinnesis to come unto him, that they might go and hunt together: so that Artanus remaining alone with the Princess Araminta, after some common discourse, she asked him why he went not unto the Chase with the Prince his Brother? and he answered her, that this recreation was not predominate over his passion: Though you do not go out with any love to the sport, replied she, yet you may go out of love to the Company. So I should, replied he, if you would go also: I am much obliged unto you, answered the Princess, but there is no reason you should have no more complacency towards my Brother the Prince; not that I can much blame you, for not affecting a pleasure which ought to be used only as a diversion, and not as a profession of life; for I think it most proper to preserve the health of the body by the exercise, and not to polish the minds of them that follow it in excess, and do nothing else: It is very true, replied Artanus, and I am of your mind: and I conceive it fitter for great Kings to hunt after their enemies, and to take Kingdoms: and for fair Princesses (said he with extream boldness) to take hearts: but I would not have them do, as they use in hunting, where they take all they meet with: I wish they would take by choice, and not by chance. If so, replied the Princess, there would perhaps be many taken which are free. You may Madam, if you please, (replied he most insolently) satisfy me in many things at once concerning this subject: for you may tell me what would the Destiny be, of the Prince Spitridates, of Pharmaces, and of Artanus, if this kind of hunting were in use; he pronounced the last of these names so low that the Princess did not well understand it; yet half hearing, and seeing by the disorders in his face, that she was not mistaken, she answered him very sharply after this manner: If the destiny of those three persons whom you name depended upon me, two of them should most assuredly be happy. And what of the third? (said he.) As for the third, said she, he should doubtless have what he deserves; & that is, a good share of the aversion, and disesteem of the Princess Araminta. I am very glad then, answered he, that this kind of hunting is not in fashion: And I am very sorry, said she, that you have so ill invented it. But however Madam said he, and roughly interrupted her) you know not how to make your self eternally adored by him, who the best of any man in the world knows your worth: He whom you speak of, replied the Princess, would do better to acknowledge the respect he owes me: and to teach him I forbid you to speak any more unto me: then did I enter into the Chamber, and Artanus went out; and I saw so many signes of anger in the Princess, that I wondered, but she did presently satisfy me, and related the impudence of Artanus unto me, with as much anger as a person of honour could have, against one that had affronted her: I cheered her up as much as I could possible, and confirmed her doubtless in her designe to let Artanus know, that he knew not his duty. But that she might not be ignorant in any of her Conquests, the unfortunate Pharmaces brought in the Princess Aristeia unto her, where the conversation was as it used to be, very indifferent and pleasant; and ere they were awate, they fell into discourse concerning Lovers, Passion, Gallantry, and Declaration of love: and as the Princess Araminta was yet angry in her mind, at the passage of Artanus: For my part, said she, I cannot conceive any thing more inconsiderate, then for any man to tell her that loves him not, how he is deeply in love with her: and if any one should this way fail in their respects unto me, it should not be an easie matter for him that committed it, to repair his fault. Then Madam, (replied Pharmaces, and sighed whether he would or no) it seems it would please you best that he should love you long before he tell you: He must not tell me at all, replied the Princess, at the least, if he will be certain, I shall not hate him. How should any know your humour, replied he? An hundred ways, said the Princess Aristeia: But Pharmaces, added she is their any of your friends that desires to know it? Yes Madam, said he, and if the Princess Araminta (then he blusht, and looked upon her) had not told me what she has done, the fairest princess upon earth had been importuned: And the most faithful Lover in the world had been entertained. Perhaps, said the Princess, that fair one whom you speak of, is not of my humour. Page 101 Pardon me, Madam, replied he, for it I should name her, you would say she were. The Princess perceiving by several passages what Pharmaces desired she should know, since he carried the business more discreetly then Artanus, she was not angry at him; but yet continued all that day in a very fertile humour.

In the Evening, at the return from hunting, the Prince Sinnesis, who by the rigour of the Princess Aristeia, was almost desperate, came to see Araminta, and conferring in private with her; Sister, said he, Will you have no pity upon me? Are you not so compassionate as to do me a good office unto the inexorable Aristeia? Did I entertain any thought of her which was not innocent, I should never desire your assistance? But loving her with such pure affection as I do, and knowing that the King will consent I should marry her, I think I may without any offence unto you, conjure you to employ all your ingenuity, to make me acceptable unto her. I conceive your choice, and desires so just and reasonable, (replied the Princess) that I cannot condemn them, and if to speak in your favour unto the Princess Aristeia, will give you satisfaction, I shall with all joy and willingness please you, though in my opinion, that which you call rigour in her, is only an effect of her modesty: and because perhaps she does not think, that you do really intend to marry her; but looks only upon your passion as a piece of Courtship and Gallantry. Pardon me, dear Sister, said he unto her, for this Princess does rightly understand my intentions, and her coldness does proceed from some other hidden cause which I cannot understand. I shall use all my best endeavours, replied the princess, to discover it: and will to morrow go unto her, before she be ready, that I may with more freedom talk with her. There is another way, answered he, to prosper my designe, more easie, and more prevalent, then that. Then let me hear it, replied the princess: Since you cannot guess it, replied he, or at least will not, I fear you will not undertake it: Do you think, Sir, answered she, and laughed, that one can guess at thoughts? and can you suspect my willingness to serve you? Since you do assure me that my fears were causeless, said he, then dear Sister, let not your coldness unto the prince Spitridates cause the princess Aristeia to be revenged upon me; but be pliant unto him, if you would have her be so unto me: The princess blusht at the discourse of Sinnesis & not knowing whether he spoke sincerely, or only to discover her thoughts: In truth, said she, you have so surprized me, that I almost know not how to answer you: for I am so little perswaded of Spitridates his sufferings, that if your miserie be not greater then his, I cannot conceive there needs any such extraordinary remedy as that you propose. No, no, Sister, said he unto her, you do not think as you say, nor ought you to think so: for Spitridates loves you even to the very height of adoration: and I made him confess it unto me whether he would or no, when we were hunting together. Spitridates (replied she and was much ashamed) would not have chosen a better confidant: I do acknowledg it (replied the prince Sinnesis, and could not be interrupted) for if you will really oblige me, you must treat him better then hitherto you have done. But Sir, said she, since there is so great an intimacy between you and Spitridates, there is no need that I should meddle in the business, you may do it well enough without me. Cruel woman, said he unto her, why do you say so? Do you not know that there is more powerful eloquence in one of your looks to perswade Spitridates, then in all my best Rhetorick? In short, unless you have a mind absolutely to lose me, you must entertain the love of that prince, who deserves you better then any other, and who doubtless is adorned with all those admirable qualities, which may invite you, and the King my fathers choice of him: But, said he, and smiled, If I be not much mistaken in the Rules of physiognomy, I see that Spitridates, maugre all your severity and wisdom, is not much hated. And then not giving her any time to answer, he called that Princess unto him who was talking with me at the other end of the Chamber. The Princess was so much astonished that she knew not what to do, or say: Certainly Sir, said she unto him, you have lost your reason in hunting, and I do believe you will not approve to morrow of what you do to day: Mean while the Prince Spitridates obeying his call, came unto him. I have been as good as my word said Sinnesis unto him; and I have done that service for you which I desire you will do for me: Sir, replied Spitridates, what you desired from me was so small in comparison of the glorious office which you offered me, that I blush for shame. It is my part to blush for shame, said the Princess, to see unto what a strange adventure the Prince my Brother hath exposed me. Whatsoever it be, said Sinnesis unto her, and taking her by the hand, It concerns the life both of Spitridates, and Sinnesis: and I do here declare unto you, in the presence of the Gods who hear me, that if you use Spitridates ill, I shall become your utter enemy. After this without giving her any time to reply, speaking aloud that all they which waited upon him might hear; I will leave you Spitridates said he unto him, to speak the rest your self, and went out immediately: Leaving the Princess so non-plust, that Page 102 she knew not what to resolve upon, for she knew well enough the violent passion of Sinnesis unto Aristeia, and his imperious humour. But though she did very much esteem of Spitridates, yet was she angry to see that she could not avoid his discoursing of his passion to her: So in this perplexity of mind, she was along while silent, and before Spitridates durst open his mouth: Yet since he feared she would accuse him of some indiscretion, in acquainting the prince her brother with his love to her, I did at last begin the discourse.

I do not know Madam, said he unto her, whether I shall be so unhappy, as to be suspected of rashness and imprudence; but when you shall understand how the Prince, after he was pleased to acquaint me with the honor he intended unto my sister, was also pleased to tell me, that he knew of my passion unto you, and that he would be ready to do me any good office: When you understand I say, that at the first I desired him not to meddle, and did not confess unto him my affection unto you, till he had urged me above a hundred times, then I hope you will conceive it very difficult for a man, who adores you as I do, to refuse such a prevalent assistance, having such need of it as I had: For heavens know Madam, I could never find by any of your actions, any reasonable ground to build the least hope upon. After that Spitridates had done speaking in his own justification, the Princess lifting up her eyes, which she continually held down as long as he spoke: I am glad said she unto him, that the business is as you tell me; and that I see this accident is grounded only upon the imagination of the Prince Sinnesis, who to induce you to do him a good office, would persuade you to love, to love me better than you do. But Spitridates, let not this at all engage you, and I do protest unto you, that I think nothing but what I thought before my brother spoke unto me; therefore I pray, let you and I rest upon the same terms we did, and endeavour only to persuade the fair Aristeia, whom I should be infinitely joyed to see, matched according to her merit. An Madam (cried out the Prince Spitridates) do not so cruelly torture me, nor render all the promises which the Prince Sinnesis hath made me, so ineffectual. What hath he promised, replied she? He hath put me in hopes, answered he, that you will give a favourable ear unto me: If he continue until to-morrow in the same mind, replied she, then I shall consider what I have to do; in the mean while, I advise you to retire your self, with a resolution to do my brother all the good offices you can unto the fair Aristeia, without any other interest or design concerning me. In saying so, she rose up, and went away, so that pitridates was constrained to leave her, without any returning answer. As soon as this Prince was gone, she called me; but though she seemed to muse upon the matter, yet seemed she not very melancholy; and to tell you truly, I believe, that since she did esteem Spitridates very much, she was not at all angry with her self, after she had well considered it upon, that she had expressed some marks of affection unto him, as without any wrong unto her modesty she might well do, since her brother had spoken so unto her I confess also, that when the Princess had acquainted me with the passage, I was ravished with joy, to see so happy a beginning of that design, which my mother was to transact by the last will of the Queen of Pont; for as she was even dying, she commanded her to low as many seeds of friendship and love between these young Princesses, as possibly she could. Mean while, the Prince Spitridates, as soon as he was gone from her, went unto Aristeas chamber, with intent to do the like good office unto the Prince Sinnesis, which he had received from him, and thinking he had brought the best news in the world unto <◇> young and fair Princess. Sister, said he unto her, and speaking low, lest any of her women should hear, you ought to entertain me with more than ordinary ceremony, for I bring you such a Crown, as is not unworthy of you. If such a thing as that were in your disposition; (answered she, and laughed as well as he) I believe you would be so ambitious as so keep it for your self, and not offer it unto me. Do you not know, said he unto her, and sighed, that one violent passion drives out another; and that since I am so deeply in love with the Princess Araminta, I have no other ambition but to please her. In short, Sister, said he, the Prince Sinnesis would marry you; and I have Commission to tell you as much, and to move you to entertain him, as he deserves: I am very sorry brother, replied she, that you have undertaken any such Commission; for indeed the Prince Arsamonos hath absolutely forbidden me to give any hopes of it unto the Prince Sinnesis, and therefore I dare not entertain the least thought of it. But certainly, said Spitridates, he does not believe his design is real, asiscisq Pardon me answered she, for I did ingeniously tell him that it was: And did he not acquaint your with his reasons, replied Spitridates? No, replied Aristeia, though the Princess my mother did press him unto it very importunately, as I understand by one of her women who heard her. Then came one <◇> and said that the Prince Atsamones was coming into the chamber, and indeed so he did presently after. As soon as he entered, he caused all to withdraw, except Page 103 the Prince his son, and the Princess his daughter, who were both of them a little surprized. After he had a while silently looked upon them; I know Spitridates, said he unto him, that you are yet so young, that your green experience has need of some advice; and though you were born with high and noble inclinations, yet may you be capable of some imbecilities which may be dishonorable, and perhaps destructive unto such as do not arm themselves against them: I would have you know, both you and your Sister, unto whom I have already spoken, that it is not my mind ever to have any alliance with the usurpers of my fathers Kingdom; I was born unto that Throne which they unjustly enjoy; and doubtless I am able to resent many things, which your young innocent years are not capable of, especially being born unfortunate. But since I believe you both to be generous, and worthy to be descended from the ancient Kings of Bythnia, your Predecessors and mine, I conjure you Spitridates, stoutly to guard your heart against the charms of the Princess Araminta, which have already a little engaged you; and I command you Aristeia to keep you from the Prince Sinnesis; for it would be as dishonorable in you to sit upon the Throne by such an unworthy way, as it would be in Spitridates to renounce it, as he would, if he should too deeply engage himself in the affection of the Princess Araminta: Those who have lost Crowns, ought to be possessed with no passions, but only desire to get them again, and to ruin those that usurp them; therefore since I cannot un|worthily degenerate, I would contract no alliance with those, whom I ought, and will ruin upon the first occasion which shall present it self. Dissimulation is excusable in weak oppressed people, but yet not so far as any such alliance; and if hereafter I shall arrive to such a condition, as to pull my enemies out of that Throne which they usurp, I would not destroy my own children with them; live then with them in all appearing civility, but engage no further, unless you will be unworthy of your selves, and my affection. I know very well, that to speak thus unto persons of your age, seems to be imprudent: but I know also, that since you are descended from so many Kings, you must needs be generous, and have souls sensible of ambition; and therefore I do not doubt, but you will honor what I say unto you, and willingly obey me. As soon as Arsamonos had ended his speech unto them, he went away, not receiving any other answer from either Spitridates or Aristeia, but their humble reverence: For this Prince had caused all his children to respect him so much, that they durst hardly look upon him when he was gone: Spitridates did so deeply grieve at it, that the Princess Aristeia, who was no less sad then he, was moved to cheer him up: Brother, said she unto him, since you have both more wit, and more generosity than I have, I hope you will not so desperately resent this accident: and the excessive sorrow which I see in your eyes makes me take so much liberty, as to beseech you not to be too much overcome by it. He, my dear Sister, said he unto her, what an advantageous thing is your insensibility to the prince Sinnesis unto you? It is much more easie for you to endure that Arsamonos shall hinder you of a Crown, then it is for me to be hindered of the princess Araminta, not but that I have ambition enough in me, but it is because love is predominate in my soul; and because it is much more easie for me to let the usurpers of the Kingdom of Bythnia live in peace, then for me to live without the Princess whom I love. There are other Crowns in the Universe, which Fortune and my Sword may give me, yet there is but one, only one Princess Araminta in all the world: Yes, my dear sister, she is the only one in all the world I can adore; without her, all things else are nothing to me; without her, I make no difference between slavery and a Kingdom; yet for ought I can judge by the orders of the Prince Arsamonos, he intends I should nourish in my heart a design to poy|nard the King of Pont, the father of Araminta, to kill the Princes her brothers, and whensoever occasion presents itself, to bury her in the ruins of her house: He, no, no, I will never sit upon a Throne by such bloody conditions; I do know very well that the Grand-father of Araminta was an usurper; I know also, that the King her father possesseth the Kingdom which belongs to me; but withall I know, that since Araminta has usurped the Empire of my heart, she hath rendered the possession of the Kingdom of Bythnia legitimate unto these of her house. I pretend nothing unto it, dear sister, since I cannot come unto it but by the loss of my Princess, who doubtless would never look upon me but with horror, if I should wash my hands in the blood of her father and brothers: The Gods do know it is not out of any feeble fear, that my ambition submit unto my love; and I am so well satisfied with an inward testimony of my courage, that I do not care what men think of me. But you, my dear sister, whose soul is so sensible of this tender passion, certainly you are more ambitious than I am; Can you be contented to lose two Crowns? Do not I conjure you? Harken unto the Prince Sinnesis, and not unto the prince Arsamonos, for which way is it possible he can bring his design about? he has been five and twenty years about it, and yet can find no hope; he has educated me as a Page 104 subject, and he would now hinder you from being a Queen, though he have no power to make me a King; For where are his Allies? where are his Armies? or where is any retreat for his security? he can have no design in it, but by way of conspiracy against the persons of the Princes; but by his favour, he shall execute it without me; or to say better, he shall perish without me, since what he would attempt is an impossibility. Resolve then, my dear sister, to entertain the affection of the Prince Sinnesis, for indeed, if once you be Queen of Pont and Bythnia, the prince Arsamonos would not, what ere he say, subvert that Throne upon which you sit; he has permitted you to dissemble, and me also; Let us dissemble then, said he, but let it be with him: The Gods do know, I would never do any thing contrary to that duty which I owe unto him, wherein my love is not interested; but when it concerns Araminta, I cannot obey him. Yet brother (said Aristeia unto him) you run a great hazard in disobeying him: I shall run a greater in not disobeying, replied he: And what sister, do you intend to yield a blind obedience? I am of that Sex, answered she, which permits me not to do otherwise: Can you treat the prince Sinnesis unkindly, (said he unto her) who offers you two Crowns? he who hath spoken in my behalf unto the Princess Araminta? he who may perhaps give her unto me? he who has given you all his affections, and does infinitely adore you? I will not treat him unkindly, said she, but I will not marry him, unless my father consent unto it: Would you then have me die? answered he: Would you then have me dishonor my self? (replied she.) I would have you sit upon a Throne, and save my life, and make me happy, answered this grieved prince. The Gods do know, said the princess Aristeia, that I would undertake the greatest difficulties for you; but to marry without the consent of Arsamonos, is a thing which I neither ought, nor can do; for I believe, that neither the King of Pont, nor the prince Sinnesis would offer it, if they knew that Arsamonos would not consent: So that, said she, since prudence tells us we must not bring things to that pass, as that the princes should know my father is against our alliance with them, since they would then easily suspect his reason; therefore all the whole business had better reflect upon me, and that I pass for a phantastical Girl, that has a simple secret accession to the prince Sinnesis. You are very prudent, Sister, replied Spitridates, and it seems your reason is at liberty: But since it is so, consider well I beseech you, into what a desperate condition you bring me, if you deny me this favour, at the least to testify unto the prince Sinnesis, that I have solicited you with all my power, and also that I have not spoken all in vain: permit me to hope awhile, and in the mean time the prince Arsamonos may chance to change his design. In conclusion, Sir, Spitridates was so importunate with the princess Aristeia, that she consented unto this last favour, and then he retired incon|ceivably disquieted: As he had a great soul himself, so he imagined some great design that his father should have in denying a Crown unto the princess his daughter, in hopes hereafter to re|conquer one for him. But for all that, love rooted all such thoughts out of his soul, and he resolved rather to be always a subject, then to lose his hope of reigning hereafter in the heart of the princess Araminta. In the mean time, the prince Aryandes, who was no lover of Spitridates; though he shewed fair, ever since a Horse-race, where Spitridates won the match, and where he conceived Spitridates did not carry himself as he ought unto him; Perceiving that the prince Sinnesis did patronize him in his love to Araminta, he took upon him to patronize Pharnaces, and indeed spoke very advantageously for him; but he went another way to work then Sinnesis did, and told her, that he had no other interest in his consideration, but her own; that for his part, he could not find it fit she should ever marry Spitridates, who was of a family, which in all sound policy the Kings of Pont should keep under the hatches as much as they could; and since so, he conceived that Pharnaces was the fittest man she could cast her eyes upon. The princess thanked him most civilly for his advice, and answered him, that she was resolved to poyze her self with all quality unto all, and with meddling in the business of her marriage, with one or other, she would submit that business of her life unto the conduct of the King her father. In the mean time the princess Araminta, to make good her word unto Sinnesis, went unto the princess Aristeia, who carried the matter according as she promised Spitridates; so that Sinnesis finding a little more sweetness from her than ordinary, gave most hearty thanks unto the prince, and was so officious in his behalf unto the princess his Sister, that indeed he moved her to use Spitridates with much more freedom and sweetness. The prince Sinnesis also did me the honor to speak unto me, and desired me to prompt the princess his Sister unto more kindness unto that prince. Now was Spitridates in all appearance the happiest man in the world; for he was highly assisted by the brother of his princess, he had the freedom to express < > passion without offence unto her, and had so much delight, as to observe by divers circumstances, that he stood upon no ill terms in her heart: Yet I oftentimes would read Page 105 to find some signs of melancholy in his eyes, and to hear him sigh often: But since I heard say, that love was an odd kind of phantastical passion, I regarded it, as one of those ordinary effects which proceeds from such folly, as is in the souls of the wisest persons, and made no other account of it: But the princess was not a little busied, for Sinnesis had always something or other to say unto her, either concerning Aristeia or Spitridates: Aryandes also conferred with her very often against Spitridates, and for Pharnaces: Spitridates was always speaking as much as he could for himself; and Pharnaces, though he durst not speak for him|self unto her, yet was entertaining her with discourse upon indifferent things, as much as possible he could, to the end he might prevent others from speaking; only Artanus absented him|self for certain dayes, because he durst not look upon her; but afterwards, coming in the company of the princess two or three times, and being infinitely respective unto her, she thought he had repented of his boldness, and resolved to forget his crime, which for all that was not the most pardonable which might be committed amongst fair and young persons; she suffered him then to visit her, but yet treated him very coldly. Thus being the state of things, there fell out to be some stirrings upon the borders of Phrygia, so that an Army must be raised, which the prince Sinnesis must command, and Spitridates must be his Lieutenant General, which did extremely anger the prince Aryandes, who was to stay with the King, because he would have had Pharnaces to be Lieutenant General. I will not insist upon relations of all the adieus which all those illustrious persons did take; I shall only tell you, that this separation contracted a strong leave of amity between Spitridates, and the princess Araminta; and that Sinnesis also departed with much satisfaction, because Aristeia, out of her complacency unto her brother, did not treat him ill when he took his leave. I shall not insist neither upon any relation of this war, which lasted but six moneths, and they concluded by a happy peace. But give me leave to tell you, that Spitridates did so gallantly behave himself, as the fame of his valour did deaf all others, though both Sinnesis and Pharnaces did also very many miracles in that war; but indeed they cried up none but him, both in Court and Army: You may easily imagine then, that when he returned thus loaden with honor, he was well entertained by the princess. I forgot to tell you, that Artanus was not in this war, not but that he spoke of it as high as the bravest; and provided the most sumptuous equipage that could be procured: I remember nothing was so much talked on, as the magnificence of his Tents, and the richness of his Arms, and the bravery of every thing; yet when he was to depart, just at that very hour he fell sick, and went not, though all his equipage was gone before; yet none did at that time suspect any thing of the cowardly cause, for he was so discontented at it, in speaking un|to those who came to bid him adieu, that he moved them to pity, not accuse him: Yet he recovered within a few daies after & carried it so handsomly, that never speaking of his passion to the princess, nor doing any thing which might give her just cause of complaint, he gave some cause to think, that it was his love only unto her which kept him from the Army; and indeed his design did so well take, that every one did believe it so: Yet when these princes returned, he seemed for certain dayes so much ashamed, that he had much ado to shew himself: All the Court made it their railly, and talked of his magnificent equipage, which was never used; but brought back unto Heraclea, which would have drawn any other but him|self into more quarrels then one or two; but he carried it so for a while, that his humour was not absolutely discovered, until he had five or six quarrels came upon him, but he fought none of them. Since this peace was very advantageous unto this State, the Court continued a long time very joyful. Never was the princess Araminta so fair, nor the princess Aristeia so amiable; and by consequence, never was the prince Sinnesis, Spitridates, Pharnaces, and Artanus, more amorous. The King of Pont, who did not alter his design, took a resolution to execute it, and to make up the marriage between the prince Sinnesis, and the princess Aristeia; and between the prince Spitridates, and the princess Araminta: Notwithstanding, he did believe, that considering the state of things, Arsamones might accept of these intentions with joy; yet since he was prudent, and knew the humour of that prince to be something imperious, he would therefore try his resentments of it before any further proceedings: And he was pleased to cast his eyes upon me for that employment, knowing that the princess Arbiana did me the honor to love me: He commanded me then, whilst he took a journey for seven or eight dayes, to impart the design unto her, to the end she might prepare the mind of her husband to accept of this honor, as he ought to do: You may imagine Sir, that I accepted of this Commission with much joy; and indeed the pleasure of it was so great, that my heart could not contain it: But I made it known unto the prince Sinnesis, unto the princess Araminta, and to Spitridates also: Yet was I much surprized, not to find so much joy in that prince as I expected; and without any interpretation of his resentment, he seemed as if he would have hindred me Page 106 from speaking unto his Mother: yet since the order which I had received was urgent, I left him in Araminta's Chamber, and having a Coach ready, I went unto the Princess Arbiana, whom I had the good fortune to find alone in her Chamber. But though I was surprized at the melancholy of Spitridates, I confess I was amazed to observe it in the mind of Arbiana: since I loved her very well, and she me also: I beseeched her to explain her self a little more clearly then she had done: Though she knew that being originally a Bythinian as I was, the interests of her house were dear unto me: yet for all that she would not open her self unto me further then coldly telling me, that she would speak unto the Prince her Husband, and that she would give me an account of his answer before the Kings return, who was gone unto a Town in Pont, called Cabira, leaving the Princes, and the Princess his daughter behind him. I afterwards came to know, that I was no sooner gone from Arbiana, but she went unto Arsamones, to tell him, that she desired this double alliance with him, and that he must prepare himself to return an answer before the Kings return. So I shall, (said he, without any further explaining him|self;) in the mean time speak to me no more about it, for I know very well what I have to do, Arbiana would have conjured him to tell her a little more plainly what she was to expect; but he intreated her to press him no further, and to believe that he had very advantageous thoughts in his heart for his children. As Arsamones was of a very violent humour, she was forced to submit, and to retire into her Chamber without any deeper penetration into his thoughts: as she went out of the Chamber, she met Spitridates, who after she had carried him into her own, did conjure her with so much tenderness to be favourable unto him, that this wise Princess was much moved unto compassion, and promised to use her best endeavours for his satisfaction; and also since she saw no appearance of any possibility for Arsamones to get into the Throne of his fathers, she wished with all her heart that these two marriages were consummated. In the mean time, I was four or five days without any vexation, but at the incertainty of Arsamones his answer: not that I feared it would be absolutely ill, but the melancholy of Spitridates, and the pensiveness of Arbiana, joyned unto some sadness which I saw in the eyes of Aristeia, made me fear there was something in the wind which I could not understand. As for Spitridates, he was unconceivably troubled, and notwithstanding all his endavours to hide it, the Princess did perceive it, yet he was so ingenious as to make her think, that the hopes of any great good carries with it always some kind of unquiet melancholy. The Prince Sinnesis on the contrary, was in high content: for although he saw very well that the Princess Aristeia was not very pleasant, yet he took a real sadness for a piece of modesty, and suted his discourse accordingly. As for the Prince Argandes, Pharnaces, and Artanus, since they knew not the secrets of things, each of them studied how to promote their particular designs, and never thought upon any ones else. The fifth day after the Kings departure, being come, three or four only remaining before his return: I remember that the Princess Aristeia had a long conference with the Princess Araminta, and not knowing well any reason why they redoubled their amity and affection one to another; the Princess Araminta gave a little picture which she had unto Aristeia, the same which she shewed you in Bythnia, to discover whether you were Spitridates or no, as afterwards she sent word unto the Princess: And in exchange Aristeia gave a jewel unto Araminta, which she wears at this day, and is the prettiest thing in the world.

After that Aristeia had left the Princess, Spitridates came to see her: & since he found her full of those pleasing conceits, which those two fair ones had infused one into another; she treated him better then ever she did in all her life before: for she was then so full of obliging sincerity, as that he plainly discovered in her heart, that real esteem which she had of his vertue; and since this Prince had certainly as much sprightly wit, as ever any had; and never any knew better how to love then he; so he expressed himself unto her so feelingly, so respectively, and passionately, that he did sufficiently win upon the soul of the Princess Araminta. This conference was long, though it seemed short, by reason it was pleasing, and it was very late when Spitridates went from the Princess: He went afterwards to sup with the Prince Sinnesis, and he came not unto his own Chamber until almost midnight. He was no sooner in his Chamber, but one came to tell him that the Prince Arsamones sent for him. In obedience unto his Com|mands, he went unto his Chamber, and in the way he observed the officers of the House extraordinary busie: yet his imagination was so taken up with the princess Araminta, that he less regarded it. When he was entred into the Chamber of Arsamones, he found there the princess Arbiana, the young prince Euriclides his Brother, and the princess Aristeia: but the sight did much augment his fears, when he found melancholy in the faces of those two princesses. When he was come unto his father, Spitridates, said Arsamones unto him, we should be Page 107 weary of our fetters, and the time is now come, when we will shake them off; therefore take the princess your Mother by the hand, and follow me without any contradiction or murmur: for it concerns the Grandure of my house, my own glory, and yours, and more then that, my life: Since I do owe mine unto you, replied Spitridates most sadly, I have no will to disobey you: But, Sir, dare I ask what your designe is? You shall know it presently, replied Arsamones roughly: mean while do as I bid you without resistance, since I am in power to make my self obeyed: Spitridates hearing his father speak in this manner, and seeing that indeed he might be compelled unto it, he gave his hand unto the wise Arbiana, who in a low voice conjured him to make no stir, and protested unto him that she was ignorant of the designe. Then after orders was given for all things, this prince, followed by his children, and such as he had made choice of to follow him, went down a pair of back stairs into the Garden, and out of the Garden, to one of the gates of the Town, which looked towards the Sea, and whose port|er was bribed: there he found a Shallop, into which he caused all of them to enter, and him|self the last; after he had thrust in Spitridates with his own hands, who at that instant staid at the side, as if he would consider whether he should enter or no; although he held the princess his Mother by the hand: all was no sooner in, but Arsamones commanded to row away in all haste, until they came unto the Cape of an Island called Acherusiades: Since he had paid the water-men very liberally, they made away so fast, that in less then an hour he arrived at the Creek, where they say Hercules landed, when he fought with that terrible Monster; the defeat of which got him so great a reputation in that Country: You may very well judg Sir, in what a pitiful condition Spitridates was then in, who though he did not know his fathers design, yet was he sure it was contrary to his love: After arrival at the place before na|med, out of the Shallop they went, and entred into a Bythinian ship, which waited there, and was guarded by three others, which the Calcedonians had sent unto Arsamones. None of the watermen of the Shallop daring to return unto Heraclea, left it upon the River unto the wind and waves, and followed this prince who promised to take care of their fortunes: No sooner was the ambitious Arsamones in the ship, after he had given order to make towards Bythnia, he and Euriclides entred into the Cabin, where the princess Arbiana was with Aristeia, and Spitridates. When he was entred, Well, (said he unto them, with an aspect which spoke both fury and joy) though I am not yet a King, yet am I no longer a Slave: and he that would conquer a Crown, must first break off those chains which hinders him. Come Spitridates (said he unto him) let us go unto a Throne; and to make the way more pleasant and easie unto you, I will tell you, that I will not oppose your marriage with the princess Araminta: but on the contrary, I intend to put you presently in the head of an Army, to the end you may go and conquer her, and not take her from the hands of my most deadly enemies: when you are the Son of a King, and in expectance to be King your self, you will be more worthy of her vertue and beauty then you are, and doubtless you would extremely injure her to have her marry the son of a Slave, and a Slave him|self. I have been twenty years in contri|ving this designe, which I now begin to execute: the City of Calcedonia is for me, as well as that of Chrisopolis, and I hope within a few dayes the King of Pont will be brought unto such terms, as to send his Ambassadors unto my Court to demand Aristeia, for the prince his Son: But whatsoever falls, I render thanks unto the Gods, that I shall die free, though I cannot live a King. Spitridates, as much taken up as he was with his passion, could not chuse but see some|thing that was great and Heroick in his fathers design: But how ambitious soever his soul was, love was ever the Master of it, and he could not conceive that any hopes of being a King could comfort him for the loss of his Princess: also he answered Arsamones after such a manner as was not pleasing unto him; so that he was constrained, to be silent, and as much as he could shut up all his melancholy in his soul: You may well imagine Sir, what his thoughts were, during this voyage, they were such and so sad, that when he related them afterwards unto me, he almost wept. The thought not only to quit his Princess, but to ruine her, to declare war against her, and to appear her enemy after he was upon the point of marrying her, was a thing so horrid, as that he thought divers times to throw himself into the Sea: and if the Princess Aristeia had not been, he had desperately done it: Ambition was too feeble to overcome the love that was rooted in his soul. No, no, (said he in him|self) thou glittering and imperious passion, thou shalt never chase my Princess out of my heart; she shall be Sovereign, and reign there, in spite of thee, and thy plotting power: my desires of a Throne come infinitely short of my desires to enjoy her.

But alas, what will this divine princess think of me? can she ever believe that I knew of the design of Arsamones? No, no, flatter not my self, for notwithstanding all the testimonies Page 108 of my love that ever I gave her, she will believe that I prefer the Crown of Bythinia before her: The prince Sinnesis, in lieu of being my assistant towards her, will become my mortal enemy; he will accuse me for carrying away Aristeia, and will speak as much against me now, as he spoke for me before: I fear Araminta, the generous Araminta, will hate me now, as much as she loved me before; and indeed she has reason: For why, will she say to her self, did he discover his love unto me, when he was transacting as my declared enemy? But yet for all this, my dearest princess, I am only unfortunate, not criminal: Ambition was stirring in my heart, I must confess, but love only did absolutely enjoy it: So not knowing what he either ought, would, or could do, the miserable Spitridates abandoned himself wholly unto sorrow, and every minute of his sad life sighed out a remembrance of his dear princess. In the mean time Sir, give me leave to tell you, how great was our wonder in the morning, when the departure of Arsamones was known; indeed it was so great, that I cannot remember, but tremble. The princess was yet asleep, when the prince Sinnesis came to her chamber, where contrary to his custom, he waked her; which no sooner done, Sister, (said he unto her) Arsamones has carried away Aristeia from me, and Spitridates from you; he is gone in the night with all his household, and imbarqued secretly, not being discovered by any, but by this inscription, which is posted up at every corner in the Town, as this which I have here brought you; in saying so, he gave her the note, which contained these words:

The Prince Arsamones tells the King of Pont, that to marry the Prince his son, and the Princess his daughter, unto the children of a Slave, would be to make an alliance unworthy of himself; therefore to transact both justly and generously, he must restore the Kingdom of Bythinia unto him, before he treat of any alliance, otherwise he declares war against him, as an usurper of his Dominion, and as his mortal enemy.

You may well imagine Sir, how this surprized the princess; yet being wise, she vented her resentments of it before the Prince her brother, but inquired of him, with much reservedness, all that he knew concerning the business; yet he, who was of a violent temper, uttered all that either love, choler, surly, and despair could prompt him unto; sometimes his rage roved at Arsamones; then presently after, he suspected Spitridates, as accessory to the design, and confounding the innocent and culpable together; or to say better, not being able to discern them, he railed against Arsamones, against Spitridates, against Arbiana, against Euricildes, and against Aristeia also. During all this turbulent passage, the Princess spoke not a word; she had a desire to ask him, whether he had sent unto the King, to advertise him of the accident, whether he had caused Arsamones to be pursued, and what order he had taken in the business; but not knowing what she herself should advise them unto, she suffered her sorrows silently, without complaint; yet was her curiosity satisfied presently after, without any further enquiry; for the prince himself told her, that he had sent unto the King, and commanded two ships to follow Arsamones, in which Pharnaces was imbarqued. This news made the princess blush, because she knew, that if they were overtaken, there would be a combat, since Pharnaces was there; yet dissembling the matter as well as she could, she told the prince Sinnesis, that according to her apprehension, it was Arsamones only who had any hand in the design. Afterwards this prince being so passionately disordered, that he neither knew, why he should leave the princess, nor whether he should go, but he went out of her Chamber, and left her at liberty to lament. Well Hesionida (said she unto me, when I came to her bed-side) what do you think of Spitridates? or what ought I to think of him? Madam, said I unto her, I have so strong an inclination to interpret all things unto the advantage of that prince, that I am apt to believe if he did all he could to prevent this design: If so, said the Princess sighing, he is very unfortunate; but if not, I am sure he is very culpable; for if he had any secret design to transact with his father in his just pretensions unto Bythinia, why did he testify any particular affection unto me? or why should he engage my heart to esteem him above all the world? If he had any such privy design, said I unto her, he pretended unto you, the more to delude the Court, and hide his design the better. But Madam, I cannot believe it; and although the melancholy which of late I observed in his mind, did much amaze me, yet I am fully perswaded, that he really loves you: If so, replied she, then why does he go away? How can he ever hope I should continue my affection to him, if he intend to make war against my father? Believe me Hesionida (added she, tears falling from her fair eyes whether she would or no) though I would gladly find out some good ground to justify Spitridates, yet I cannot: Perhaps he thought it no unworthy act, to delude the daughter of that Prince, who Page 109 kept a Kingdom from him, and to get into a Throne again, it was excuseable, if he used a hundred thousand false oaths, and as many lying protestations. But no, Spitridates, said she, you deceive your self, Heroique virtue is more difficult to practise then you imagine; not is it permitted to commit crimes, though it be to gain Crowns by it. Be not so hasty Madam (said I unto her) to condemn too rashly, who ever seemed to be virtuous. Ah Hesionida (said she unto me) did you but know all he said unto me the last night, you would tremble, that he thus abandons me to day, and that he should declare war against my father; for he must needs know, that the Kingdom of Bythinia will never be restored him without a war; and he must needs imagine, that if he fight against the King of Pont, unto whom I owe my life, I shall myself fight, and drive him out of my heart. But yet since she had not sufficient ground either to condemn him, or justify him, she knew not how to regulate her own desires; she could well have wished that Pharnaces might meet with him, and bring him back unto Heraclea; yet not knowing how he should then be treated, she did sometimes make prayers for his flight, and desired that he might either not be taken, or else that he might vanquish Pharnaces: for truly, would she say unto me, whether Spitridates be innocent or culpable, I wish with all my heart, he may not fall again into the hands of the King my father. Then did she entreat me to enquire whether Spitridates had carried all his Train with him, and I found, that every one of his servants stayed behind, and not one of them went with him, and that the Prince Sinnesis, and the Prince Aryandes, had caused them all to be arrested, who all of them did say, that they were altogether ignorant in the design of Arsamones; and also did affirm, that my Master was ignorant of it as well as they, because he sent for some of them to get him to bed, when Arsamones sent for him: Though this was a strong conjecture to justify him in the opinion of the princess, yet the two Princes Sinnesis and Aryandes were so prejudicated in their imaginations, that they absolutely assured her, that Spitridates did know of the design; so that though she did not believe them, yet her soul stood upon uncertainties, betwixt what they told her, and what she wished to be true. In the mean while, the King returned unto Heraclea, but so incensed against Arsamones, as never man was more: And when he considered, that this Prince transacted thus, at such a time when he would have set his daughters upon the Throne, and have given his own daughter unto his son; he could not then find out any excuse for him, and never considered that he detained his Kingdom from him, but was as much incensed against him, as if he were a rebellious subject. Then did Pharnaces return without meeting with him, bringing this intelligence with him, from some Merchants ships which he met withall: That he was gone unto Bythinia, where he was in danger of a shipwrack, as he was entering into the Port; but having escaped this danger, he was received as King by the Inhabitants of Chalcedonia, and also by them of Chrisopolis, who had seized upon all the Garrisons the King of Pont had there. I confess Sir, that upon this accident, the love of my Country did much work upon my heart, and my hopes once again to see a King of Bythinia, did much joy me; for since this was towards the end of Autumn, I thought that during winter, things might perhaps be well composed, and that the Princess Araminta might marry Spitridates, and be one day Queen of that Country from whence I had my original: So that joyning the interest of my Native Country, unto the interest of my Mistress, I did endeavour all I could, to perswade her unto some hopes of it; but she allways told me, that certainly the King her father would never consent to part with a Kingdom, unless force did compell him unto it: And indeed, though the season of year was not fit to begin a war, yet Commissions were granted to raise new Regiments, to be added unto those which remained of the Phrygian war. During this time, Pharnaces and Artanus were so joyed at the absence of Spitridates, and were so assiduous about the Princess, that she was extremely importuned, principally by Artanus, who divers times began again to be insolent: As for Pharnaces, he was so discreet and wise, that he gave her no cause of offence, or if he did, it was at such a time, when the Princess thought solitude the greatest consolation: Whensoever she walked, it was as privately as possible; and the better to hide the malady of her mind, she oftentimes feigned to be sick, and would see no body. Upon a day, when none did see her, there came such news from Bythinia, as did much surprize all the Court, which was, that Arsamones had imprisoned Spitridates, and kept him very close in a Chalcedonian Castle: Such news as this, upon any other adventure, would have extremely grieved the Princess, but now it did most sensibly joy her, because she looked upon the prison of Spitridates, as a convincing testimony of his innocency, which did compleatly justify him in her opinion. Moreover, since she did not fear, that Arsamones would ever attempt any thing against his life, because he was his son, she Page 104 fancied great consolation in thinking, that as long as the war lasted, he could not fight, either against the King her father, or against her brothers; so that if peace should hereafter be concluded, she could not blame him for any thing: Sometimes she would grieve for the sorrows which he endured: But for all that, as things stood, she did not desire he should be at liberty. Did I not ever say, Madam (said I unto her) that Spitridates was never culpable? Yes Hesionida, replied she, and I am very sorry I should suspect him of any such injustice. Mean while, the Princess would go in the morning unto the Temple that was so famous in Heraclea, (and which was dedicated unto the Goddess Adrastea, or otherwise called, Fatal Destiny) with intentions to invoke the Goddess to be propitious unto Spitridates, and to compose all differences between the King her father, and Arsamones. But here Sir you may admire at the power of Fortune, for we met (in this Temple of fatality) with a stranger newly arrived at Heraclea, and who seeing the Princess go into the Temple, went in also: I heard him ask, which of all these Ladies that waited upon the Princess, was called Hesionida, and I told him, I was she; If so, replied he, do me the honor that I may speak a word in private with you. I conjure you (said he, and spoke low) by the name of Spitridates. When I heard a name so dear unto me, though very dangerous to be named, as things stood in Heraclea, I bad him retire, and go out of the Temple, and stay at the gate, until I sent for him by a Slave, which I shewed unto him, that he might know him: Then going out of the Temple, I called this slave unto me, whom I knew to be witty and faithful, and shewed him that stranger, appointing him to bring him through the Pallace garden, by a back-door, and to conduct him into my chamber by a back stair, which was over against it. I would not acquaint the Princess with any thing, until I knew exactly what the man had to say unto me; so that after I had waited upon her unto her chamber, I went in all haste unto my own, where I presently saw him, whom I expected, coming in. I commanded the slave to stay in the outer chamber, that he might carry him back, whom he brought, after I had conferred with him; and carrying him into my Closet, I beseech you, said I unto him, what have you to say unto me concerning Spitridates? Madam, said he unto me, I have orders to conjure you to help me unto the speech of the Princess Araminta; and to assure you for your particular, that you are the Lady whom of all the world he most honors, and whom he stands in most need of. After I had received this complement from Spitridates, and observed by the fashion of this stranger, that he was one of a good wit, and some quality, I desired him to have a little patience, whilst I acquainted the Princess, and obtained audience for him: She was so surprized, that it was long before she could resolve what to do: But since none was with her, I importuned her much, that notwithstanding her repugnancy to see him, she consented. She sent me first to know, whether he had any Letters; and when he answered, that he had, she desired they might be given unto me, but he would not by any means, so that she was forced to go unto him, saying, as she passed through the Chamber where her women were, that she must go to speak with a man, who desired her favour to the King, about some important business: But afterwards she commanded to bring the man into her Closet, where I remained with her: Madam (said he unto her, after a low reverence) I beseech your pardon, that I did not deliver the Letter unto Hesionida, when she did from you desire it: For since the Prince Spitridates did not know, whether you would do him so much honor, as to return an answer, he expressly commanded me to be present when you read it, if it were possible, hoping thereby Madam, to understand, at the least, some part of your thoughts. The Princess was so surprized, that she knew not well how to answer him; but taking the Letter, Since my thoughts are allways such as they ought to be, replied she, I care not much if my countenance discover them, and therefore without any difficulty I shall satisfy Spitridates so far, as to read his Letter before you: In saying so, she broke open the Seal, and read these words:

SPITRIDATES unto the Princess ARAMINTA.

I Am so unfortunate, that how innocent soever I am, I cannot chuse but fear you suspect me to be fuller of ambition then love: and farther, that you have condemned me, before you understand me. He who shall present my Letter unto you, hath orders to relate the pure truth; to the end, that knowing it, you may do me no injustice: The prison wherein I am shall be most sweet, if it will but justify me in your opinion, but most intolerable, if you accuse me, since it will not let me tell you my self, that I would quit all the Crowns in the Un|verse for the glory of one favourable look from you. Do not suspect, I beseech you, that I Page 111 have any desire▪ to conquer them, upon conditions of losing you; but on the contrary, believe, that I shall ever prefer the glorious quality of your slave, before the being King of all Asia.

SPITRIDATES.

After the Princess had read this Letter, and sighed whether she would or no, she desired him who brought it to acquit himself of his Commission: so that he related all that I have told you; that is to say, in what manner Arsamones had sent for Spitridates; how he spoke unto him in his Chamber; how he embarked, and what he said, when he was in the Ship which waited for him: then he told her, that their Sea voyage was very prosperous until they came to Chalcedonia: but in arriving there, the Pilot mistaking his aim, the Ship was dashed by the violence of the waves against the point of a Rock, close by the mouth of the Port: that the Ship split, and Spitridates being at the Poop, fell into the Sea, just at the same time when another of the Ships of Arsamones was split a little lower: Moreover he told her, how all the water-side being full of people, there was some Merchants of Persipolis, who were extream compassionate at this accident, and desired to save Spitridates: That there was two, who threw themselves into the Sea in hopes to assist him, but both of them were drowned: and that the violence of the waves had wafted him far off: so that none could discover where he was: He further related, that when Spitridates first fell, he recollected his spirits, and because he could swim very well, he made many attempts to land, but the waves dashed so much against the Rocks in that place, as it was impossible for him to land, so that he was carried by those billows a long way off, which were so high, that those Merchants which did interest themselves in his loss, did lose the sight of him, and thought him shipwrackt. Yet the waves being not so rough where Spitridates was, with much ado he landed in a place where an old Fisher-man was drying his Nets upon the banks, about four or five furlongs from Chalcedonia: That since he was exceeding weary, he did lie himself down upon the banks to rest himself: That this old fisher-man, pitying to see a man so lovely and handsome, and well habited, in so lamentable a condition, offered to carry him unto a little house close by: That Spitridates accepted of his offer, and that not knowing any reason why, he intreated that charitable fisher-man to tell it unto none that he was with him: But Sir, when this messenger from Spitridates related unto the Princess the unquiet and restless mind of Spitridates in that place, I do confess that he made me extreamly pity him: and indeed, it may be easily imagined, that seeing himself now master of himself, and that he could either return unto Heraclea, or else go unto Chalcedonia, that his soul was in a pitiful and wavering condition. If I return unto Heraclea (said he) then doubtless I shall satisfy my love, and my Princess, but then I shall dishonour my self in the eyes of all Asia; for then I shall fight against my own father, and for him who retains that Kingdom from him which I must enjoy; yet if I go unto Chalcedonia, can I ever have a heart to take up Arms against the father, and brothers of my Princess Araminta? and shall I leave that most illustrious Lady in an opinion that I have deceived her? that I have betrayed her? and that I expressed affection unto her only as a Cloak to cover my designe of getting into the Throne of Bythinia? Ha, no no, I can never consent unto it. But then, said he, what shall I do? I know not, answered he to himself: But I think, Death is the only course I can take, to put me into such a condition as that I shall do nothing, either against my honour, or against my love, or against mine own inclination: yet I must resolve upon one way, I must either go unto Heraclea, or Chalcedonia: If to the first, then I lose my honour, but satisfy my love: if to the last, then I shall satisfy my ambition, but ruine my self in the opinion of my Princess, which I prefer before all things, even my very life.

In conclusion, this Messenger told us, that after a most violent agitation of mind, love was the most predominate in his heart; yet desiring to take a middle way between these two extreame, and considering that as the season of the year was the War could not begin this three months; he therefore designed to disguise himself, and return secretly unto Heraclea, without seeing either the King, or Princes, but to endeavour by my means to see the Princess, and to justify himself unto her: to promise her never to fight in person against the King, her Father, and to beg leave from her to go and defend his own: That not doubting but the Princess would consent unto his desires, and knowing her to be just and generous, he resolved to return afterwards unto Chalcedonia, to the end he might endeavour a pacification, and so to satisfy, if it were possible, both his honour, and his love. That to execute this his designe, he got this old fisher to go unto the Town, and with some money which he had about him to Page 112 buy such necessities as might make an handsom disguise for his intended voyage; and to enquire whether any accident happened unto the King: That this man having bought such things as he had need of, he told him, that the King and Queen of Bythinia, the Prince Earicles, and the Princess, there had escaped from shipwrack, but were extreamly grieved out of fears that their eldest Son was perished: and that all the Sea-side was full of men, whom the King had sent to seek the Prince living or dead: that they were enquiring news of him within an hundred paces of that place, and that he answered, he knew o▪ none: afterwards Spitridates fearing to be found out, presently disguised himself, giving unto, the fisher-man a very rich jewel which he had about him: and as soon as it was night, he got upon a Horse, which the fisher furnished him withall: so after he had commanded that his clothes should beSpan'id, and shewed unto none, at the least not until a long while after his departure, he took his journey: I had forgot o tell you, that he left a little Note with the fisher, with orders to go within eight days after unto some Officer of Arsamones house, and give him that Note; saying, that he found it by chance: the words of the Note were these:

Assure the King my Father, that Spitridates is not dead, and since he is not capable of doing any thing against his honour, he will return unto him, before he shall have any need of his courage. After Spitridates was gone, the poor fisher-man, consulting with his wise concerning their happy encounter, and searching out for a fi▪ place to hide those rich clothes which Spitridates left, by ill fortune, twelve or fifteen of those men which Arsamones had sent out to search a|bout the Sea-side, being hungry and cold, came into this house, and entred so suddenly, that those good people was forced to throw the Princes clothes hastily under their Nets: one of these men saw something shine, and moved him to so much curiosity as to look what it was: but he no sooner saw those clothes by the help of a candle, but he knew them, for he was a servant unto Arsamones: then supposing that this fisher-man had perhaps found him half dead upon the Sea shore, and had killed him our-right for his clo-thes, they began to threaten him, to confess the truth, and to tell them what he had done with the corps of Spitridates: This poor honest fisher-man seeing himself unjustly accused, and fear forcing it out, told them the whole passage, shewing them the Note which Spitridates had left with him. So that now making no question but that he was alive, and easily imagining that he was gone towards Heraclea; they sent one in all haste to inform Arsamones of their adventure, and to carry the Note which Spitridates had left: since they conceived that they should do a great piece of service in bringing his S-n back unto him; they made all the haste they could unto a bridge, where of necessity he must pass: and that which did the more facilitate their design in finding, was, that they forced this fisher to d•••ibe the clothes and horse which Spitridates had. When they overtook him, they first addressed themselves very respectfully, but yet so, as they resolved not to let him escape; for they compassed him round about. This Prince who was but ill mounted, saw it was impossible for him to avoid being taken, used no resistance, but prayers and promises: After|wards, seeing that way would not work with them, because they expected high rewards from Arsamones; he began to threaten them, and began indeed to force them: yet finding all his attempts in vain against so many, he yielded, and was carried unto Chalcedonia, where Arsamones looked upon him with as many signes of an incen•d father, as a violent Prince could possibly express: he told him, that there was no reason he should pretend unto the Crown of Bylthinia, because he was unworthy of it. But to shew him, that he would keep it without him, he would put him into such a place, as should cool him, since he could not extinguish that dishonourable passion which was so hot in his soul, and so opposite unto his honour. Spitridates would have excused the matter, but since he could not force his tongue to tell so loud a lye unto the King, as that he would not love Araminta any longer, he imprisoned him in one of the Towers in the Castle, not permitting any to visit him, but the Princess Aristeia, and that was not obtained without much difficulty, and only twice in a week; Afterwards this Messenger from Spitridates told the Princess, that he having the honour to wait upon the Princess Aristeia, in three or four of her visits, and they having a good confidence in him, made choice of him, to come hither, and render an account unto her of that Princes life, since his departure from Heraclea: assuring her, that the Princess Aristeia continued so firm in her affection to|wards her, that nothing can change it. The Princess Araminta did very attentively hearken unto this relation; and since she was fully satisfied and reconciled unto the Prince Spitridates, she seemed to be most sensibly moved at those miseries which he endured in consideration of Page 113 her. I believe she would not have writ back unto him, unless I had extreamly pressed her unto it: and in conclusion, consented unto my desires: writing this Letter in the presence of him who was to carry it.

The Princess ARAMINTA, unto SPITRIDATES.

I Wish you could be innocent, and happy both: yet since the malignity of my Fate will have it so, that you must not be justified in my opinion without your sufferings; I do confess with a blush, that I had rather you were unfortunate, and not culpable, then culpable, and not un|fortunate: But yet I resent your Prison as I ought to do, and I do not know whether my sor|rows can keep within those just limits which reason should prescribe them. Since I require nothing from you which shall be against your honour: do not expect any thing from me con|trary to mine. If the Destinies have ordained that we must be always unfortunate, yet let us make all the world confess that we deserve to be more happy.

ARAMINTA.

After the Princess had shewed me that Letter, she sealed it, and gave it unto him that was to carry it: she writ another also unto the Princess Aristeia, and after much civility unto this faith|ful Agent of Spitridates, she dismissed him: and the slave which brought him, conducted him out of the Town where he should lodg: you may imagine what conference the Princess and I had upon this adventure, and how often we read this Letter of Spitridates: His prison did not strike only on the heart of the Princess Araminta, but in the heart of the Prince Sinnesis also: who now did not any longer think him accessory to the designe of Arsamones, neither did he suspect that the Princess Aristeia had deceived him: so that love re-assuming the same seat in his soul as formerly, he changed his manner of negotiating. He often came to his Sister the princess; and since it was important unto her, that the prince Sinnesis, should always love Spitridates, she therefore confirmed him in that opinion: So that his passion more strongly re|viving, he left off exasperating the mind of the King his Father, as before he did, but would divers times appease it, yet the King of Pont easily suspecting the cause, was extraordinarily more angry at him: Some certain days after, the King of Pont had intelligence, that Ciaxares (who as you know, was then only King of Cappadocia, and Galatia) would assist Arsamones under hand; so that seeing the business more dangerous then he at first fore-saw; he desired to compose the business betimes. He then sent unto Ciaxares to demand aid, seeming as if he were ignorant of his siding with Arsamones secretly; He who was sent unto him, negoti|ated the matter so handsomly, that he took Ciaxares off from declaring openly for Arsamones, but yet not being willing neither to declare for the King of Pont, he proposed to be a Media|tor between the two princes, which did extreamly grieve Arsamones, who was hereby disabled from sustaining a War: for since the prince of Paphlagonia and the prince of the Cal|dusians, had not treated with him but upon such conditions as the King of Cappadocia should declare, they also drew back from the Enterprise. Moreover the Inhabitants of Chalcedonia, and them of Chrisopolis, had been so much impoverished under the Dominion of the Kings of Pont, that they were not able to sustain the Charges of the War: so that Arsamones seeing upon what a weak foundation his designe did stand, resolved to entertain some propositions of peace: But since he would not trust unto the word of an enemy, because the King his Father before him, had been thereby deceived: he declared unto him whom Ciaxares sent, unless the King of Pont would give Hostages as he himselfe offered to give. Ciaxares knowing that the King of Pont had no greater a mind to trust Arsamones, then Arsamones had to trust the King of Pont, proposed that both parties should give Hostages, which should remain with him, and it was accepted on by both parties: so that the King of Pont sent the prince Ariandes unto the Court of Ciaxares, and Arsamones sent the prince Euricles. This Treaty continued six entire months: at the end of which a peace was concluded: and the Sentence was, That Arsamones should not assume the Title of King; that he should render up Chalcedonia unto the King of Pont: That he should enjoy the Town of Chrisopolis, and all the Countrey about it, holding it as a Vassal unto that prince: and that he should not be obliged either to dwell, or go unto Heraclea, nor send the princes his children thither.

Before this Treaty, the prince Sinnesis endeavoured all possible ways to move his Father to conclude the marriage which he designed, but he would never hearken unto it, which did so extremely trouble the prince Sinnesis, and grieved him so much that he was hardly knowable.

Page 114 All this while was Spitridates in prison, and that much more close then before; for since the return of him, who brought the Princess Araminta's Letter, whom Arsamones suspected, the Princess Aristeia was not allowed to see him. Pharmaces, whose patron was not now at Heraclea, did not so often speak unto the Princess; nor could Artanus with all his insolence and wit, find many occasions of conference with her. Pharmaces, though seeing that Artanus had more address unto her then he had, was very angry at his misfortune, though Artanus was no very terrible Rival unto him, yet he did divers times put affronts upon him: At the first this coward carried it so cunningly, as if he wanted no courage; yet these last injuries of Pharmaces, did much against his mind (the Gods do know) constrain him to draw his sword; but he did as much dishonor himself in fighting, as if he had not fought at all, and the aversion which the Princess had towards him, was so justly grounded, that none wondered she should treat him with so much coldness. Mean while, the news of the conclusion of peace being come unto Heraclea, and the Prince Sinnesis knowing that he must not marry the Princess Aristeia, was so extremely grieved at it, that he fell into a Fever, which upon the fourth day was at the height. The King his father hearing how very ill he was, and not being ignorant of the cause, such an excessive sorrow, mixed with anger seized upon him, that he died suddenly: Seven dayes after, the Prince Sinnesis quitted his Crown and his life, desiring the Princess his Sister, alwayes to love Spitridates, and protect Aristea. You may easily imagine in what a deplorable condition Araminta was, who without all doubt did infinitely honor her father, and loved her brother, the Prince Sinnesis, who though he was by nature somewhat violent, yet was he very amiable: Besides, he loved her very well, and had a great affection unto Spitridates; so that in losing him, she lost a brother, a friend, and a protector of her lover: She strangely resented this loss, and was so full of sorrow, that for three daies together she could not eat: Pharmaces did not grieve so much, for the Prince Aryandes ever loving him so well, and being now King, he hoped that he would more easily move Araminta to be favourable unto him: As for Artanus, since he lost nothing but what Pharmaces found, this sad accident made no great alteration in his mind. I was not in such a condition as to comfort the Princess, for my mother died at the same time, who out of her love to her own Country, and her earnest desire, that the intentions of the Queen her Mistress should be accomplished, commanded me to be absolutely serviceable as much as I could unto all the house of Arsamones, and especially unto Spitridates, as that I was more engaged unto it, then before, and I could the more easily obey her in it, because they appointed no other Governour unto the Princess. Mean while, the new King of Pont, who now reigns, or to say better, who must never reign, was upon his way in returning unto Heraclea, (where they had rendred all due honors unto the two dead Princes) and it was in his journey, that he heard of the death of the King his father, and of the Prince Sinnesis his brother: Then did we understand, that the treaty of peace was performed, that Arsamones was gone out of Chalcadonia, and going to Chrisopolis, and by consequence Spitridates changed his prison. Fifteen or twenty dayes did thus pass over, whilst the Inhabitants of Heraclea prepared all possible magnificence to receive their new King: But orders came from him, which did forbid all ceremony, having no desire to mix so much sorrow with the joy. The Princess being extremely melancholy, and doing nothing but pray unto the Gods, did lament and mourn in secret as oft as she could. I moved her one evening against her mind, to walk in the garden of the Pallace, and so take the Air, for I perceived so great an alteration in her complexion, as I feared she would fall sick: When we were in the garden, she made choice of a dark and narrow walk, which being railed in on both sides, amongst many great trees which covered it, and made it the most melancholy, and therefore the most agreeable walk in the world; for there was two fountains at the two ends, & one in the midst, which murmured so much, as did incite a soul unto musing: The Princess making choice of this gloomy place to walk in, would have no company with her but me, of whom she had no such fears as young persons commonly use to have of those which oversee their actions, for my years were not so many above hers, as to cause any aversion in her towards me, and I gave advice alwayes, rather with respect and submission, then with any domineering pride, so that we lived together in much sincerity, and much obliging confidence. After we had repeated many misfortunes, and bestowed many a tear upon the memory of Sinnesis, she assumed some thoughts upon the unfortunate Spitridates. Is not that Prince unfortunate, said she unto me, to lose a Kingdom, in losing that person, for whose sake he was resolved to have lost it? Certainly the King my brother, though that Arsamones should permit him, yet would never consent unto his good fortune, as well because he loves him not, as because he loves Pharmaces; so that I see my self exposed unto very great persecution: Yet, said she, did but Spitridates know Page 115 the justice that I render unto his merit, and how exactly I do obey the Prince Sinnesis, my brother, I should have some consolation, in that it would be a consolation unto him: But alas, it is not the pleasure of my fate I should have so much happiness, and I have nothing to do, but to prepare my self for all imaginable misery. Madam, said I unto her, never excessively grieve at misfortunes which are to come, because perhaps they may never come; and can you be obliged to follow the will of the King your brother, rather then the will of the late King your father? If I were only his Sister, replied she, I believe I should not; but since I am his Subject, as well as Sister, I think I am obliged to obey him, as I was the late King my father. After much such like discourse as this, observing that night drew on, (for it being the Spring time, the dayes were not very long) I perswaded her to retire: yet since the Moon shined, she followed not my counsel, but would sit down at one end of the walk, neer the Fountain, within a quarter of an hour after, I saw a man coming towards us, whom I supposed to be some of the Princesses servants coming to tell her something, but I was much surprized, when this man, whom I could not know in that dark place, came neerer us. Madam (said he unto the Princess, bowing unto her, with much reverence) will you be pleased to suffer the unfortunate Spitridates to come and mingle his tears with yours, and help to lament your misfortunes, by grieving for his own? You may imagine Sir, how much the Princess and I were surprized, when we heard a voice which we could not but know, it was so great, that the Princess cried out so loud, that some of her women came into the walk, thinking she had called; but I stepping readily towards them, said, that she did not call them, and that this was a man who had a suit unto the new King, and came to beg the favour of the Princess unto him. After this, coming neer the Princess, I heard Spitridates (since she answered him with nothing but tears) continue speaking unto her. I am even desperate Madam, said he unto her, that I should renew your sorrows, and to find that my presence in lieu of pleasing you, should grieve you: I desire your pardon, said the unto him, for receiving you so very ill: But Spitridates, my weakness has so just a cause for it, that you may excuse me: The Prince Sinnesis my brother did so tenderly love you, that I cannot look upon you without a revival of my sorrows, and so many several things comes into my mind at once, that it is not strange if my reason be a little disordered; for truly, the remembrance of what is past, the fear of what's to come, and surpriz'd to see one so neer me, whom I thought in prison, are lawful causes of this disorder in my soul: I was in hope Madam (said Spitridates) that this last mentioned cause would rather have rejoiced then grieved you; So it does, answered she, but not so much as it would, if the Prince my brother were yet living: Yet tell me, I conjure you, how the choler of Arsamones is appeased: It is not appeased at all Madam, replied he, and doubtless I have more incensed it by this my flight from him, which now I have made: Was it not by his consent, said she unto him, that you are come out of prison? No, replied he, the Princess Aristea is she unto whom I am obliged for my liberty; for after I was brought from Chalcadonia into Chrisopolis, she observed that the place they put me in was not inaccessible, as that was wherein I was before; so that as soon as I was brought thither, and before my father discovered the weakness of the place, she corrupted three of my guards, who out of a window, which was not barred with iron, they helped me to escape, and carried me disguised into a house of the Town, where I remained three dayes: Afterwards, when we heard the news of the King your fathers death, which as you know preceded the death of the Prince Sinnesis, my Sister advised me to come unto that Prince, whom she then supposed to be King, and out of her goodness to me, she gave me a great part of her Jewels for the accommodation of my journey: In my way hither, I heard of yours and my second loss; but though I did conceive it was not safe for me to come hither, since the Prince Aryandes was to be King; yet I could not deprive my self of so much happiness, as to come and throw my self at your feet Madam, and to ask you what should be the fate of my life. Would to the Gods (replied the Princess, and sighed) that it were in my power to make you happy; but yet Spitridates, fortune is more powerful then I am, and I am afraid she will not consent unto it: So that you will consent unto it: So that you will consent unto it, I cannot think she is able to hinder my happiness: I wish that all you say were true, replied she, but my reason does not shew me how it can be. However Spitridates, though I cannot deny but that I receive my consolation to lament it with you, yet I cannot chuse but tremble to see you at Heraclea, for the King my brother is to arrive here within these few dayes, and if he come to know that you are here disguised, what will he think of it? Alas Madam, said he, do you think to drive me from you, by telling me the King will come so soon, and that perhaps he may know I am here? Ah Madam, torment me not so cruelly, I have a very secure lodging; and since I have nothing to do at Heraclea, but to see you, I Page 116 shall not easily be discovered: Yet however, answered she, I may hazard both my reputation, and your life, by permitting interviews, which how innocent soever they be, may be interpreted criminal. It is not late, replied she, and therefore it will not be thought strange, that a sad melancholy Mourner should walk so long; therefore Spitridates (said she, in rising up) we must leave you: However Madam, answered this Prince, I beseech you do me the honor to promise me another opportunity of speaking with you; I cannot consent unto your desire, replied she, but Hesinoida shall see you in any place: That indeed Madam, is a great favour, answered he; yet truly it cannot satisfy the passion which my soul has to you; and to discourse with you in freedom, does so much import the welfare of my life, that I do declare Madam, I will never go out of Heraclea, if you do not grant my respective passion that favour which I ask: I do not beg it Madam for any merits of my own, but in the name of the Prince Sinnesis, who has so often pleaded in my favour. This conjunction is very prevalent, replied she, yet all that I can promise you is, to use my best endeavour that I may see you once again: I shall be every day about this hour in this walk, replied he, where I may safely receive your orders, for the Gardner is most absolutely my faithful friend, having a long time served the Prince my father, & it was he who came to advertise me of your being here. I cannot consent that you expose your self every day to the view, answered she, but tell Hesinoida where you lodge, and she shall advertise you of my will. After this, the Princess left him, and Spitridates having told me where he lodged, it happened to be with one of my acquaintance, and whom I durst trust with any thing: Since the time that the Princess returned to her lodging, she appeared more studious and melancholy, then before she had seen Spitridates; and indeed she grieved extremely, when she considered that this Prince would extremely incense the King of Pont, as he had already Arsamones by his escape; so that to avoid this misfortune, she saw a necessity of moving Spitridates to depart presently, though she knew not in what quarter of the world he could find a Sanctuary, yet the misery had no other remedy; for she knew well enough the King of Pont did not love Spitridates, but affecting Pharmaces, as he did, he would sollicite her to marry him: She knew also, that this Prince did never approve of the late King his fathers policy, in desiring this double alliance with Arsamones; but on the contrary, he would often say, that the best way to establish the Kingdom of Bythynia, was to ruine all the pretenders unto it, and not to exalt and magnifie them, so that on every side, she could find nothing but misfortune unto Spitridates. It was in vain to tell her, that the Gods when they pleased could change the hearts of Kings; for what confidence soe'ver she had in them, she could not hope for that in which she saw so little appearance. The next morning news came, that the King would not have the day on which he intended to come to the Town precisely known, but that at the longest, it would not be above four or five days: The Princess seeing then so short a time to resolve, and that to defer the seeing of Spitridates until he was come to Town would be extremely dangerous, she appointed me to speak unto him, and if I could, to perswade him unto a departure without her seeing him, but that was not possible to be done: But to tell you the truth, I did not very obstinately oppose his design, because I did believe it would be in vain, and because I conceived this Prince had reason for his desire; perhaps also the love I bore my Country did induce me; but whatsoever it was, I told the Princess what Spitridates told me, which was, that absolutely he would either see her again, or die. The Princess perceiving his obstinacy, and seeing that the longer she stayed, the more danger there was, both unto Spitridates, and her self, resolved to permit a conference: We were long in consulting, whether it should be in the Garden, or in her Chamber; at last, the result was, it should be in the Garden, because since the Kings death, so much respect was rendred unto the Princess, as that none took so much liberty in that place, as before they used: Also because, if by any misfortune the business should come to be discovered, it might there be taken for a surprize upon the princess, then for an interview which she premeditatedly consented unto, as it might, if he should come into her chamber. I advertised this unfortunate Prince then, to be in the Garden that evening, and in the same walk, in which before he met the princess, who was in twenty minds to go back with her word; one who saw her, would have said, she was going to commit some crime which she abhorred; and if I had not even violently forced her, I think she had not gone: But thither she went, without any with her but her women, who according to their custom, followed her no further then that solitary walk, unless she called them, so that I was there alone with her: Since we went thither betimes, because the walk should not seem extraordinary, Spitridates was not yet come, for he was to stay until it was night, not but that he was well enough disguised, and his lodging so near the Garden door, that he might Page 117 come thither without danger: yet I did so strictly charge him to make it late before he came, that he did obey me, and make it dark: and since the Moon did shine, it was not strange that the Princess should walk so late, especially since she used to do so before. I cannot relate the thankful acknowledgments which Spitridates rendered unto her for this favour; all his words were so full of passion and respect, that all my expressions are too weak to manifest unto you the joy this Prince resented. The Princess for a quarter of an hour together did lend him a willing ear without returning any answer; but afterwards she fetched a profound sigh, and said unto him, Spitridates indeed has some reason to invite me to this conference, but he has much more reason to lament and complain against Fortune for engaging his affection unto one, who can make him nothing but unfortunate. Fortune Madam, replied he, has no share in that affection which I bear unto you: It is only your own beauty, your virtue, my own inclination and reason which prompts me unto it: and I am fully perswaded, that if it be but your pleasure to doom it so, all the malignity of foolish fortune, who often persecutes the innocent, and protects the vicious, cannot render me unhappy. Yes, yes, Divine Princess, If the unhappy Spitridates can but find any place in your heart, and that your goodness will always reserve it for him, he defies any misfortune that can come: all the disgraces of his family shall vanish out of his memory; his own particular dishonours shall not trouble him; the pleasing thoughts only of being in the fair Araminta's heart, shall charm all his sorrows, and root them out of his mind. I understand Madam, since I came hither, that the Prince Sinnesis upon his deathbed, and before many people, did mediate in my behalf, and desire you to look favourably upon me. This is it Madam, which makes me thus bold, and moves me to desire you, not to deny this favour unto that prince, who never denied you any thing: Therefore, I beseech you Madam, let not the King who now is, and who loves not me, hinder me from loving you, or you me. But yet I am his Sister, and Subject, replied the Princess, interrupting him. You are also both Sister and Subject unto the Prince Sinnesis, though he be dead, replied he, and the King who now reigns, having his Crown immediately from him, ought not in justice to obstruct the performance of his last Will: since indeed he was his King, as he is now yours. Ah Spitridates, cried she, the Will and Commands of a dead King, are never so well obeyed as the Commandements of a living King: a Reign of seven days, and in all that time death raining over him, will by the Successour be esteemed as nothing: Yet if it be esteemed by you, answered Spitridates, it is enough. Yes, replied she, and sighed, you may be confident, that the last words of the prince Sinnesis, confirming in my heart those thoughts which your virtue had inspired me withall, I shall as long as I live be the same I am at present: But alas, Spitridates, it will not make you any thing more happy, but my self much more unfortunate; for indeed, I do foresee, that perhaps this will be the last time, that ever I shall speak unto you: The last time, Madam? said he, and interrupted her; then must this be the last of my life: and I beseech you Madam, unless you desire I should immediately die, do not deprive me of some better hopes. I pray you, hope then if you can, said she unto him, and enjoy that comfort which I cannot find for my self. Doubtless the reason is, said this sad Prince, because you will not try all ways to make me happy. Perhaps, replied she, I shall not try all ways; but I will promise you to do all I ought, though perhaps not all I can, to procure your satisfaction; but as the case stands, which way should I contribute unto it? I dare not tell you Madam, answered Spitridates, that since you do not apprehend it your self, it is a great sign, you have not any mind to do any thing for me. I would do any thing, replied she, which is not against the rules of virtue, and prudence. Can you not then assure me, said he, that all the power of the King shall not move you to marry Pharnaces? And if it be not too much to ask, cannot you permit me some hopes that if any advantageous alteration in my fortune chance to fall out, it shall inseparably reflect upon you? I am very sensible Madam, that since I am without either Crown, or Kingdom, it is too much rashness to speak thus. Yet, since the reason of my unhappy condition, is only because I am not upon the Bythinian Throne, which the King your Brother unjustly detains from me, I conceive, that the Princess Araminta ought not to despise me. It is very true, said she unto him, and I shall much more esteem you because you merit Crowns, then I shall do them that wear them without desert. But for all that Spitridates, although I should promise you not to marry Pharnaces, as perhaps without any crime I may, yet I fear that you would not be nearer any happiness: for you may very well imagine that I shall never marry you, against the King's mind: since it is a decency which all of my quality ought to observe. But suppose I should marry you, what should we do afterwards? you are out of all favour with the prince Arsamones for the love of me: Here is no safety for you by staying in this Court: Neighbour Princes will not entertain you who are son to an unfortunate and Page 118 weak prince, lest it should incense a young King to declare War against them; therefore Spitridates, though you should not hearken to all rules of reason and prudence, yet, me thinks, your affection unto me, should dissuade you from any such design, since unquestionably you will never carry a Princess disguised and wandering throughout all Asia: No Spitridates, no, I know you would not, I am sure you love Araminta in a more noble and uninterested way; yet do not think, that my unwillingness to follow your fortunes, how harsh soever, is any obstacle at all: I do protest, that it does not at all affright me, but it is my shame, that I should have any such resolution, which most deters me; Love, Spitridates, is a most innocent passion. I confess, provided that all the effects be innocent also, and never deviate from the rules of reason; and therefore to justify my indulgence towards you, I must not do any thing which is unreasonable: Tell me then Madam, I beseech you, what you would have me do, professing, that since you do not forbid me to love you, nor to despair of love from you, I shall most exactly obey you. Alas I am not able to advise you, replied she, yet the best course which I can think upon, is to travel as a stranger in some unknown Country, until such time as the Princess Arbiana, and the Princess Aristeia, have made your peace with Arsamones. This advice you give me Madam, answered Spitridates, is a good expedient to bring me to the subjection of the King your brother, as the Prince my father is already; but I cannot conceive it a good course to procure me the enjoyment of the Princess Araminta, since Arsamones possessing only an unfortunate share of the whole Kingdom of Bythnia, which is his due, the King of Pont will never consent unto any alliance with poor Arsamones, more then Arsamones would with him: And therefore Madam, since the affection which you are pleased to honor me withall, will not go a little higher then the limits of ordinary prudence, I must resolve upon my death. I see the prayers of the dying King your brother are not prevalent, since they cannot obtain that favour from that Princess, who is the sweetest in the world to them that do not adore her, but the most rigorous unto him, who of all men upon earth does most reverence her. But Spitridates (said he) whom do you complain of? Of you Madam, replied he, who would persuade me that you love me, and yet deny me any remedy for a love-sick soul; but if you did indeed love me, you would make me an absolute promise never to marry Pharnaces; and that if the Gods would permit—As Spitridates was going on with his discourse, Artanus came to tell the Princess, that the King was coming to her chamber: By good luck I heard his voice beyond the rail of the walk, so that we caused Spitridates to retreat in all haste; yet for all that Artanus did see one with us when he came first into the walk; but as soon as he had told the Princess, she gave her hand unto him, to the end she might draw him out of the garden. We were no sooner come unto her chamber, but the King came also, and Artanus having a handsome pretence to leave her, went in all haste unto the garden again, to see what that man who he saw before was: As ill luck was, Spitridates was not yet gone out, for he found the door next his lodging shut: Artanus spying him, did then follow him, and finding him one that shunned him, did conclude him to be the same who was with the Princess, he then imagined that perhaps it might be Pharnaces; but Spitridates being forced to leave the close walk, though he was disguised, yet by the light of the Moon he knew him by his gesture and walk, or at the least suspected him to be Spitridates, and so much the rather, because he heard that day by some Bythinians which were come unto Heraclea, that this Prince was escaped out of that prison where Arsamones kept him; so that his suspicion filled his heart fuller of curiosity: He followed him out of the garden into the streets, and to the house where he lodged: This confirmed him in his opinion, for he knew those who dwell there were friends unto Spitridates. I leave you to imagine how this passage grieved Artanus, yet upon second thoughts he resented it not so sadly, but resolved by it to oblige the King, and ruine his Rival, by affirming, That assuredly Spitridates had some conspiracy against the State in agitation, but he would not reflect upon the princess, because he imagined it would too much incense her, nor would the State relish it. He was much vexed that Pharnaces did not share in his sorrows, to see Spitridates in such favour with the princess, as that for the love of her she permitted him to be disguised in Heraclea; but he resolved to reflect the business wholly upon him, and went into the King immediately, beseeching the honor of some privacy with him, concerning some very important business. The King then went out of the princess chamber into his own, where Artanus told all the story: The King no sooner heard that Spitridates was in Heraclea disguised, but he apprehended some conspiracy plotting against him; so that without loss of any longer time, he secretly commanded the Captain of his Guard, to go unto the house which Artanus saw Spitridates enter, and to secure his person: the King was obeyed; Spitridates not able to defend himself, Page 119 is taken by the Guards, and imprisoned in a Tower, where Delinquents of high quality used to be secured: You may imagine how extremely was the princess surprized, to hear within an hour after that Spitridates was arrested; at the first she apprehended, that the King would think he was disguised for her; yet hearing nothing but conspiracies against the State talked on, though she thought her self safe enough in relation to her reputation, yet she feared the life of Spitridates was not so safe; you may imagine then how sadly she sighed away that night. But to disguise the matter, I told all her women that the princess was not well, and therefore would go to bed, and I would stay with her to comfort her; but yet it was more then I could do, for she did look upon the matter so full of danger unto Spitridates, that it troubled her extremely, and him no less then her: Since they said nothing when they took him, he knew not whether this interview was discovered, or whether he was taken only, as being found disguised in Heraclea; but yet the next morning his doubts were all cleared, for the King sent to examine him, what he came thither for? what his business was? and who were his Confederates in his conspiracy? Spitridates not hearing them speak one word concerning the princess, was exceedingly joyed, and answered, That after he escaped out of the prince his fathers prison, and hearing in Chrisopolis, that the prince Sinnesis was King, he came unto Heraclea, in hopes to find a Sanctuary under the shelter of his favour; that when he came hither, and heard his reign lasted but seven dayes, he was much surprized, and so grieved at it, that he had not so much freedom of spirit, as at the first to resolve what course he should take; that in conclusion, he resolved to address himself unto the King which now reigned, and to desire of him the same protection which he hoped for from the late King his brother, but that he had not time to execute his design, because he was taken within an hour after his first arrival. Those who examined him, said, That there was no necessity of disguising himself, in coming to demand protection from the Prince Sinnesis, who loved him; unto which he answered, That he disguised himself only to get into Heraclea, out of Bythnia, and to make his voyage more secure, then if he had travelled with a train equipage and habit suitable to his quality. Although these his answers were very reasonable, yet did they not satisfy the King, but he still believed, that there was some hid design in it: And though he was not ignorant of Spitridates his affection unto the Princess Araminta, yet he knew her virtue so well, that she would never have any consent in this disguisement, but he believed, that ambition was the only end of this adventure; Pharnaces and Artanus did much confirm him in that belief: The first of these believing ambition to be his design, because he wished it; and the other seeming to believe it, that he might the sooner ruine Spitridates: Yet since he desired that jealousy might torment Pharnaces as well as himself, he acquainted him, that Love was the greatest cause of this Princes disguisement: He imagined also, that he might perhaps by this way ruine Pharnaces in the opinion of the Princess Araminta, conceiving that Pharnaces to ruine his Rival, would infuse this new suspicion into the King, which when the Princess should know, she would be extremely incensed against him; and indeed at the first, the design did take as Artanus did desire it: for Pharnaces was much more troubled, to hear that Spitridates had seen the Princess, then he was to think he had designs against the State: Jealousie, as generous as he was, did rouze up his heart to insult over an unfortunate man, and moved him to tell it unto the King in all aggravating circumstances: When the Princess heard of it, she was infinitely angry with him; so that Artanus found out a way thereby to ruine both his Rivals at once, and make them as unfortunate as himself; for his own share, he deserved it, so did not the rest, especially Spitridates, who was far from deserving such disastrous destinies: But yet there is all spying inquiries used, to find out, whether this Prince had held intelligence with any; those with whom he lodged, are all arrested, and examined, but do what they could, nothing was to be gotten out of them, or any else, which did either justify or condemn him; that which much contributed unto his misfortune was, That the King of Pont was so melancholy and sad, as none could hardly know him, so much had it altered him; at first, every one did think the death of his father and brother was the cause, but presently after it was known, that his love unto the Princess Mandana was the real cause of his distemper; for whilst he was as a hostage with Ciaxares, (as you already know) he became more desperately in love with her, then ever any, so that his soul being deeply perplexed with the absence of her he loved, it was more apt to be incensed against, and less able to know the innocency of Spitridates; yet being without all doubt a very gallant man, he behaved himself very well towards the Princess his Sister; and though Pharnaces had told him of the meeting betwixt Spitridates and her, yet did he not speak any thing sharply unto her, but on the contrary, coming one day to visit her, after he had first, without Page 120 any choller, said as much unto her as any wise and discreet Prince could do upon the like occasion, to discover her thoughts; he afterwards told her, that he had perhaps incurred her displeasure in causing Spitridates to be arrested, since he understood she had a great esteem of him, both by the Command of the late King his Father, and also the late King, his Brother: yet he was necessarily forced unto it by reasons of State for the good of his people. Moreover he told her that he did not at all suspect her as any confederate with Spitridates in his conspiracy, who questionless would deceive her, and make her believe that his love to her was only the cause of his disguise, though indeed it was his ambition. Sir, said she unto him, If the affection which Spitridates expresseth unto me, had not the authority of the late King my Father, and of the Prince Sinnesis my Brother, I should not speak unto you as I do intend. But since it has them both for his patronage; I beseech you Sir, to believe that this Prince had never any designe to get a Crown by depriving you of it: for had he been that way disposed, he had not been so long a prisoner unto his father. And without any scruple, I do ingeniously confess that I have seen him, and that it was by my invitation he came to Heraclea: Moreover I am most certain, that he came hither without any intentions of conspiring either against your Person, or State. If I should have the least suspicion of any such thing, in lieu of defending, I should accuse him, and move you to punish him. Sister, said the King, I do not so much endeavour the justification of Spitridates, as I do the preservation of your honour. And since I know you generous and full of reason, I cannot believe you will love Spitridates more than the honour of that family from which you are descended; therefore you must not think it strange, if this Prince being criminal, be not treated with so much indulgence as perhaps another Prince might be; for indeed, he is of that family which must be kept under; therefore Sister, the least I can do is to keep Spitridates in prison perpetually: Did I conceive him innocent, all the policy in the world should never induce me to this rigour: but since he seems to be culpable, I must secure him: yet to make you satisfaction for the loss of this Prince, who doubtless was owner of excellent parts, I conjure you to marry Pharnaces: O Sir, said she unto him, I beseech you speak not unto me of any marriage, so soon after the Funerals of the King my Father; nor force me to disobey those Commands which the late King my Brother, when he was dying, did impose upon me. What Commands did he impose? (replied he.) He commanded me, (said she, and blusht) to be constant unto that opinion, which he by his Will when he dyed appointed me to have of Spitridates: When he said so, replied the King, he did not foresee that Spitridates would be a Delinquent to the State. Oh Sir, said she, Spitridates is most innocent, and by your slighting of the last Will of the Prince Sinnesis, do not constrain me to disobey you also in your commands of marrying Pharnaces? though he be a man of much worth, yet one whom I never loved, but esteemed very much; and therefore shall never behave my self but with indifferency towards him: The Princess thought that the King would have returned a sharp reply, unto such an ingenious declaration: But the passion which was in his own soul, doubtless teaching him how to excuse in another that weakness which he found in himself, he left her without one angry word: yet desiring her still to marry Pharnaces, and telling her, that she should change her opinion with the Times. The Love of Mandana taking up the whole soul of this Prince, made him never think upon Spitridates: his thoughts for some certain days were wholly employed in sending unto Cixares, to demand the Princess Mandana in marriage, and giving all necessary orders for the magnificence of the Embassadour. In the mean while, the Princess foreseeing that Spitridates would never get out of prison, unless either by force or policy she resolved to set him free: and she was the sooner induced to it, because he who commanded that Tower where Spitridates was imprisoned, was one who was much obliged unto me; for during the late Kings reign, I saved the life of one of his children, who was sentenced to die for some grand crime, and I obtained his pardon: Then was <◇> employed to negotiate in this important business, which in fifteen days I transacted so happily that I moved this man, by the memory of my past benefit, present gratitude, and future hopes, to contrive a way how Spitridates might escape, and he not suspected: This Tower did stand in the very Sea, in the top of which there was a walk: this man in the name of the prisoner asked leave for him to walk there one hour or two every day: so that bridling two of the Guards which accompanied him, he tyed unto the top of this Tarrass, a Ladder of ropes, as if Spitridates had escaped that way; and none perceiving him, this Captain of the Tower did shut this Prince and the two suborned Guards in a very private place of the Castle: counterfeiting after this, to be much troubled: he asked where Spitridates was, and was answered, that he was in the Tarrass: Thither he went with many souldiers, and not finding him, he found the Ladder which he himself had placed there: he shewed it unto them Page 121 which followed him, he chafed, and said, that certainly their companions had betrayed him, and that doubtless he was gone in a little boat, since a great Ship could not approach; he began to fume and fret, and threaten all them that were present, and to accuse them as well as those who were escaped: and being in all appearance transported with fury, he went to acquaint the King, he told them, that Spitridates might certainly be overtaken, if he were immediately sent after, and that he conceived he could not yet get into Heraclea, and therefore if they sent out many Shallops they would infallibly meet with this prisoner, and all his complices; to be short, he carried it so handsomly, that the King himself was deluded; and appointed not only many Barks to be sent out at Sea, but also that there should be strict Guards kept at the Gates of the Town, left Spitridates should get in disguised, not conceiving that he durst put to open Sea in a small Boat; and upon search there was not any considerable Ship wanting in the Port. Moreover, Pharnaces and Artanus knowing that his passion to the Princess was the cause of all this, perswaded the King, that certainly he would get into Heraclea in the habit of a fisher, or some such disguise, and therefore what pains did not they take to apprehend him? they found the Guards at the gates; they set Centuries in the streets: they searched all suspected houses; and omitted nothing that might make their wish for discovery. The King had some light suspicions, that the Princess had some hand in this escape, and told her as much. But since he had no proofs, and was ignorant of any obligations between me, and the Captain of that Tower, for it was by the Prince Sinnesis, that I had obtained pardon for his son, all these surmises and suspicions did quickly vanish. All this while, Spitridates was in the prison where they never searched, and where he must remain a while before he durst attempt a coming out. When Spitridates was informed by this Captain, that it was by my negotiation he was in prison, but not a prisoner; he supposed that the Princess did also know of it; so that he desired so much favour as to see me before he departed, which, without acquainting the Princess, I consented unto it, conceiving my self obliged to do so much for the son of the right King of Bythia: but after I had given him some hopes of his desire, the difficulty was how to execute it; yet since the Captain of the Towers wife was of the intelligence, I resolved to go thither with one woman only, and to enter by a little back dore, which was towards the walls of the Town. It is impossible, Sir, for me to relate all the testimonies of grateful acknowledgments, which Spitridates did give unto Araminta, and me. But Hesionida, said he unto me, have you not set me at liberty, with intentions to exile me for ever? Is it not only an exchange of this punishment for one more cruel? Sir, replied I unto him, it is fortune, not the Princess, which banisheth you; but since fortune is a very unconstant Lady, there is some hopes that since she has changed so often unto your disadvantage, she will at length change in your favour. I wish she may, replied he, although I cannot hope it: However Hesionida, it would be the height of cruelty, for me to depart, and not bid adieu unto my Princess, or know her last will, and pleasure. I can easily acquaint you with her intentions, said I unto him, since she has done me the honour to trust me with her most secret thoughts: but as for seeing her, it is not permitted so much as to think upon it: Leave it unto the Gods, Sir, who perhaps will be more propitious unto you during your exile, then you imagine: But Hesionida, said he unto me, and sighed, may a miserable and absent Prince ever hope that the Divine Araminta will ever preserve her affection entirely to him? Yes Sir, replied I, you may, and without any fear of being deceived: for since your unhappiness is but an effect of your love to her, she would be very unjust, if she should not always resent your misfortunes: Go therefore Sir, and seek out some Sanctuary, until some change be found in the hearts of the two Kings of Pontus, and of Bythia. The princess does very well know, that if you had any thoughts of remounting the Throne, you might have done it: and she conceives her self most sensibly obliged unto you for preferring her before a Crown: so that it is impossible she should ever forget it.

In conclusion, Sir, I made him resolve upon his departure: and since he had many jewels which the Princess Aristeia gave him at his departure from Chrisopolis, he would not receive any of those which I offered him from the Princess; for I knew her intentions was to furnish him: he therefore desired me to deliver a Letter unto her; which he writ in my presence, and which, if my memory faile not, was in these Terms.

SPITRIDATES unto the Princess ARAMINTA.

I Go Madam, since it is your pleasure, be I go the most miserable man alive; I neither know whither I shall go, nor when I shall return, no, nor whether you wish I should ever return, and yet I am bid to live and hope; but I can neither do the one nor the other, unless you command it by two lines under your hand: Therefore my divine Princess, I do beg it in the name of that illustrious Prince, who now is dead, but who yet shall live eternally in the memory of SPITRIDATES.

After this Prince had given me his Letter, and a hundred things in charge to tell the Princess, I went unto her, and related all the passages of our meeting; at the first she lamented the fate, but upon second thoughts was not sorry for it; and I was so importunate with her, that I moved her to return this answer unto that distressed Prince.

ARAMINTA unto SPITRIDATES.

MAY you live as long as it shall be the pleasure of the Gods to permit; and hope, that as long as Araminta lives, she will pray for you; and since you desire it, she bids you live, and hope.

ARAMINTA.

The Captain of that Tower coming to take this Letter, he assured me that Spitridates would depart that night following, with those two of the guard, who helped him to escape, and whom he took to serve him. Moreover he told me, that Spitridates desired he might sometimes write u to him, to the end he might acquaint me with his fortune, and return my answers back unto him: So when night came, we were certain this Prince would depart, and the Princess was so troubled at it, that I wonder something extraordinary was not discovered in her mind; but the next morning we were informed, that Spitridates was very safely gone out of Heraclea, by the same way, which it was conceived, he escaped before, the Captain providing a ship for him in the night: Though the Princess had reason rather to be glad that he was gone, then that he should continue mued up in a prison, yet her soul was extremely sad, when she imagined that perhaps she should never see him again: But this long and tedious absence must be endured and in the interim there fell out many remarkable accidents; for as it is well known unto you Sir, Cixares refused to give Mandana unto the King of Pontus, which made him the sooner forget Spitridates, and his anger was so high, that a war against Cixares must be declared, under a specious pretence of right unto the Towns of Anisa, and Cerasea: You Sir are better acquainted with all the passages of that business then I can relate, and obtained more honor then my memory can contain; I shall only relate what is requisite to instruct you in the story of this Princess: As soon then as the King of Pontus heard, that Cixares had rejected him, he prepared for war, thinking that perhaps it might move him to give the princess Mandana unto him; he sent for aid from the King of Phrygia, who promised to imbrace his interest, according to the last treaty between the late King of Pontus and him, and that he would come himself in person to command his forces. Since the King of Pontus stood in need of all aid, he invited the prince Arsamones, and Eulriclides his second son to serve in his Army, and Arsamones durst not deny him: We understood also at the same time, that this prince hearing how Spitridates came disguised unto Heraclea, was so incensed at it, that he did protest if ever he got him within his power, he would not treat him as a son, but as a rebellious subject, and a Delinquent unto the State; who had broke out of prison; so that Spitridates, who was gone into Paphlagonia, and writ unto me as well as the princess, to know whether he might come safely unto the King her brother when he was in the head of his Army, she did forbid him, because Arsamones was to be there, and because the princess Aristeia had acquainted her with the real resentments of Arsamones. But whilst all preparations of war were in hand, Pharnaces and Artanus neglected no addresses unto the princess Araminta, and sprused up themselves every way to invite her love, but all their cares and courtship was in vain; for as there is nothing which fastens the knot of amity more then misfortunes does, amongst persons truly generous, so Spitridates being unfortunate, by reason of his love unto the princess, was deeper rooted Page 123 in her heart then before; and she knowing that Artanus was the occasion of his last imprisonment, and that Pharnaces did acquaint the King with their meeting, she was therefore so in|censed against them, that she could not endure the sight of them; yet after that the Phrygian Regiments were drawn up to the general Rendez-vous, and joyned with the Pontean forces, the King made ready to depart, and though Artanus had no great fancy unto any matters of war, yet he durst not do as he did before, but made himself ready as others did to go; and since the King did not all favour his design upon the princess, he took his leave of her only in publ|ike, but Pharnaces did not so; for the King of Pont going to bid her adieu, he carried Pharnaces with him, and left him there in private with her; I chanced to be then in the prin|cess chamber, and I do confess, I saw so deep a melancholy in the face of Pharnaces, that considering his merit, I did much pity him, and wished for his sake, that he were able to de|sist his love from the princess, since it was not in her power to render him happy; since the King was gone, and this like to be his last visit, she was not so severe towards him as somerly, but suffered him to speak unto her: Madam, said he unto her, I come to receive my do-m from you, before I go unto the wars, and ask you whether I must fight, as one that would vanquish, or as one that must die, whether I must preserve my life, or absolutely lose it, for upon your will only, absolutely depends my destiny: Yes Madam, if you permit me any hopes, perhaps I shall live, vanquish, and return; but if you intend to tell me, that I must not have any share in any hope, then I beseech you bid me this last adieu without any bitterness, since the Gods certainly will not preserve what you desire to destroy, nor draw me out of those dangers unto which I will expose my self, pronounce my sentence then Madam, and let it be with sincerity, though you will not with satisfaction: Remember I beseech you, that he whom you desire to make happy cannot be so, and therefore you have less reason to treat me ill: If the prince Spitridates could ever enjoy your affection, I do protest before the Gods which hear me, I would rather die without complaint, then interrupt your felicity; but since that For|tune has put an unremoveable obstacle unto his happiness, why may not you make me happy? and why divine Princess will you oppose against my glory? I do not ask so much, as that you should love me, I only beg you would not hate me, and to be more pliant unto the Kings de|sires. I wish to the Gods Pharnaces, replied the princess, that your happiness did depend upon me, as you believe it does: But to manifest unto you that the cause of complaint against you, has not extinguished out of my soul that high esteem which all the world ought to have of your merit; I will contribute as much as is in my power unto your freedom, and move you by my own sincerity to vanquish your own soul, and to rest satisfied. Know then Pharnaces, that since I am obliged to entertain the affection of Spitridates by the commands of the late King my fa|ther, and the Prince Sinnesis my brother, I must eternally pay obedience unto them; and the most peremptory commands of one living King, shall never make me disobedient unto the will of two dead Kings: 'Tis true, I do resolve never to marry Spitridates without the con|sent of the King my brother, neither am I as fully resolved ever to marry any else but him; therefore Pharnaces regulate your designs accordingly, and make use of that great courage which the gods have inspired you withall, to vanquish and suppress a misfortune, which as I think requires not all the vigor of your mind to surmount it; live then Pharnaces, live I say, but let it be in liberty, that you may live happily; and since the want which the King would have of you, would be irreparable, I earnestly desire you to preserve your life, which would con|duce infinitely unto my satisfaction, if you could so far prevail with your self, as only to elsteem me. But suppose Madam, replied he, that I cannot so prevail with my self, would you not conceive it more reasonable that death should rather deliver you and me from that servitude which displeaseth you, then to see me perpetually languishing at your feet, and vexing you? Death, said she unto him, is a thing so horrid, that I do not wish it unto my very e|nemies; and therefore I must needs advise you, not to take so violent a remedy as that: But Madam (said he unto her with extream sorrow) is it so, that you can never love the miserable Pharnaces, nor for sake the too happy Spitridates? I must needs confess it with much engel|nity, (said she unto him) because I may do it with much innocency. It is enough Madam (said he unto her with a drooping sadness) and I beseech you do me the favour to believe, that this shall be the last time of all my life I ever shall importune you; and I pray unto the Gods, that the news of my death may make you know I am able to dispute with Spitridates for the glory of perfectly loving you. After this, he left the Princess with such a melancholy motion, and his countenance did so alter as he did bid her adieu, that it might well be said, all the horrors of death were in his eyes, and the Princess could not chuse but pity him. Af|ter this Sir, we remained at Heraclea, soliciting the Gods against you Sir, for we knew Page 124 you would be in that war; but it seemed Heaven was not pr|pitius n|to us; for you saved the life of Ciaxares, you conquered, and triumphed, and did such wonders, that though they were unto our disadvantage, yet could we not cause but admire when we heard them related: I shall slightly pass over the beginning of this war, and in a few words tell you, that when the combate of two hundred against two hundred was resolved upon, and when all the question was concerning the choice, there was a great contest amongst the Gallantry of our Army, who should be the Combatants: and though Artanus was none of them, yet seemed he to desire the listing himself in the Catalogue of those who were to be chosen: The election was to be by lot, and the names of those who aspired unto this honour, should be put in writing, and drawn by the Captain of the Kings Guard. Pharnaces who was in the first degree of val|lour, and who looked for nothing but death since he could not be loved, had no fancie to trust the business unto lot: so that knowing who was to draw these lots, he went unto him: and after a thousand protestations of friendship, and as many prayers to grant his desire, he gave unto him the Roll wherein his name was writ, and beseeched him to keep it between his fin|gers, and give it unto him as if he had drawn it: The Captain smiling at his proposition, could not chuse but tell him, that every one who brought their names were not so urgent as he was to be in this Combate: Pharnaces had a sus|pition that the Captain did mean Artanus, told him, that he could not believe there was any which did not extreemly desire to honour themselves by such an extraordinary occasion as this; No not Artanus himself, said he unto him, hoping thereby to move him into a farther explanation: when the Captain heard the name of Artanus mentioned, he laughed; so that Pharnaces thinking his thoughts true, did press so urgently, that he told him how Artanus had been with him, and told him that this Combate being to be performed on foot, he should not be able to be an actor in it; because his Horse not long since falling upon him, had caused a great weakness in his h|igh: yet he was not willing to make use of this excuse in publick, lest his enemies should make an ill con|struction upon it, and therefore he desired and conjured him by all possible entreaties to take out the Roll wherein his name was written, from amongst the rest: and to gratifie the favour, he offered him any courtesie if he would be faithful and secret unto him. Pharnaces finding the baseness of his Rival desired to punish him for it, and beseeched the Captain to draw himself and Artanus together in the number of the Combatants, which the Captain, as well to punish the cowardize of the one, as to satisfie the generous valour of the other, promised him to do: The hour of this Ceremony being come, all the Rolls were brought unto this Captain, and he put them all into a Bag, whilst all the pretenders unto this honour stood about him: Since Artanus thought his Roll not amongst the rest, who was more forward and desirous to be one of that number then himself? but how lamentably was he damped when he heard his own name to be the third Scrole which was drawn? he seemed so qualmed at the heart as every one per|ceived it: Pharnaces who was next him, did taunt him with some ambiguous language by way of Raillery, which Artanus did well enough understand: but afterwards the name of Pharnaces was drawn, and all the rest in their course, so that nothing more was to be done but to prepare for combate: As for Artanus, he had never been chosen, had he not been in love with Araminta: but he durst never publish as much, nor complain of the Captain who had deceived him: yet however he resolved to go as far as the place of combate, though he did nothing else. As for Pharnaces, he went thither with other kind of thoughts; for he went in hopes to perish there, and also to see his Rival dye, but before he departed, he writ these words unto the Princess Araminta.

PHARNACES unto the Princess ARAMINTA.

IF Fortune second my designe, I am going thither where by dying I shall vanquish; and where I shall make it known by my generous despair, that though I could not merit your affections by my services, and by my life: yet I shall not render my self unworthy of your compassion by my death.

PHARNACES.

The truth is Sir, you know, he fought like a Fury, and died a Hero: As for Artanus, I believe you are not ignorant, Sir, of the reason why he kept himself i|d whilst Pharnaces only was resisted by you, which was, his hopes that you would dispatch his only Rival, for he made no account of Spitridates: and so love having its several operations, it moved Pharn|aces Page 125 to be more valiant then ever, and Artanus to be more cowardly then he could imagine himself: When we had intelligence of Pharnaces his death, and presently after heard of Ar|tanus his baseness, we lamented the loss of the first, and abhorred the villany of the other: so that since the Combate you had with him to make him confess his lye, he durst never shew himself, neither to the Army, nor to the Princess, nor in Heraclea, but hid himself for a time in the Countrey, where he harboured an invetered hatred against you, not only because you had loaded him with an intolerable burden of dishonour and shame, but also, because he saw you resembled Spitridates. That Letter from the unfortunate Pharnaces, did deeply imprint it self in the heart of the Princess when she read it, which as her soul was ever extreemly tender and compassionate, so she could not look upon it without tears in her eyes; and was for a quarter of an hour together so drowned in a flood of sorrows, as I believe if that illustrious Lover could have revived, and Spitridates had been a Spectator, he would have dyed of a causes' jealousie: In the mean while we had no intelligence from this exiled Prince; and all the consolation which the Princess had, was a secret correspondency with the Princess Aristeia, and in doing her all the good offices she was able. The King was so deeply perplexed at the death of Pharn|aces, as possible could be: but since the love of Mandana was more predominate in his heart then any thing else, he cheered up himself with the thoughts of her; and that seeming peace after your victory, being again broken; Wars, as you know, began to break out more violently then before: then I must needs tell you, Sir, that none could ever entertain a greater admiration of any then we of you; and when we heard the wonders of all your actions related, we had a good ground for our belief, that the Gods were infinitely favourable unto Ciaxares in send|ing him such a Defendor: To be short, it was impossible for any to esteem an enemy more then we did the Illustrious Artamenes: Also when the Princess heard how Artanus had con|spired against your life, and suborned forty Conspirators to destroy you, she had such a fresh and strong aversion to him, that his very name was horrid unto her ear: for since she under|stood you had saved the King her Brothers life, she became extreemly tender of yours: and when you pardoned Artanus, and sent him back, she murmured a little (though she did ad|mire you) against that excessive generosity which moved you to desire the King of Pont not to punish him: yet notwithstanding, she negotiated so with the King her Brother, that she procured his banishment out of the Kingdom, with a strict command never to be seen in it again. Since this Sir, until that famous adventure when you took the King of Pont prisoner, and when we thought you dead, I have nothing to relate, unless I should entertain you with those sorrows which the Princess apprehended, for the disgrace of the King her Brother, and with her Lamentations for the long absence of Spitridates. But since I should thereby only abuse your patience, because you may easily imagine it without my relation, I shall only tell you, that the very next morning after you came wounded unto that Castle, where the Prin|cess Arbiana, and the Princess Aristeia were, there came a messenger from the King of Pont, who was going unto the Princess Araminta his Sister with this message, that he was as much grieved for the death of his vanquisher, as he was for the loss of his own liberty: si|nce this Envoy did but only pass by, and was not to stay in this Castle, where Arbiana and Ari|stea were, the Princess Aristeia taking you for Spitridates, did write these few words only in a Letter.

The Princess ARISTEA, unto the Princess ARAMINTA.

I Hardly dare tell you that Spitridates is here, because he is here wounded: yet since I cannot make a Secret of any thing which will add unto your joy, I cannot conceal it.

ARISTEA.

You may imagine with what variety of apprehensions the Princess mind was possessd upon the receipt of this Letter; and understanding by this Messenger that the King her Brother had lost two Battels in one day; That he was taken prisoner; that you were dead: You Sir, I say, in whom the King her Brother had so great a hope, her sorrows were so great, that she could not perfectly relish any joy at the pretended return of Spitridates, especially hearing by the same relation that he returned wounded: yet since love, as they say, is a most imperious passion, and will be Sovereign in that heart which is possessed with it; therefore she would sometimes rejoyce and cheer up her self in hopes of seeing Spitridates again: but within two days after this, she was deprived of that hope: for the Princess Aristeia did write again Page 126 unto her how she had been deceived by a most prodigious resemblance, she intimated by her Letter, that the picture of the Princess Araminta did undeceive her, when she shewed it un|to him whom she took for her brother; and the conclusion of the Letter was, that Spitridates was not returned; so that she resented the misfortunes of her brother the King of Pont, with|out any ingredient of consolation, but yet notwithstanding presently after, when she heard of your being revived, as I may say, it was a great mitigation of her sorrows, especially when she heard that it was you who was taken for Spitridates, at the house of Arbiana; her hopes was, that you Sir being the most generous of men, would treat her brother the King of Pont very well; and her hopes also was the more pleasant unto her, that Spitridates, according to the Princess Aristea's Letter, would exactly resemble him. In the mean time, since this Princess had a soul which was capable of all things, she began to cast her cares upon the business of State, but she found them to be in extremum disorder. The King of Phrygia was retreated after the loss of two battels in a day unto the furthest part of all Bythinia, and who when he was over the river Sangar, received intelligence, that Craessus King of Lydia was entered into his Dominions with a puissant Army, so that he was constrained to look after his own defence, and taken off from the assistance of others: All his Regiments also were exceedingly shattered and weakened; but yet when the Princess did conceive that Cixares having the King of Pont prisoner, he would not make any new attempts, since he was able to make his own conditions, without any further hazard of his forces, she was then a little more at rest.

But within a few daies after, she was extremely astonished to hear, that all the souldiers after the King was taken did declare themselves for Arsamones, and that all Bythinia was up in Arms in his behalf, and were resolved to return under the obedience of their ancient Lord. Moreover that Artanus, who was one of high quality, was returned into the Kingdom, and had also raised a great part of Pontus, and was himself retired unto a very considerable Town called Cabira, having before hand suborned the Governour thereof with a good sum of money. Imagine Sir, I beseech you, in what an intangled condition this young Princess was in, to see the King of Pont her brother a prisoner, and that Arsamones, the father of Spitridates, was not only Master of all Bythinia, but was also in the head of an Army, ready to fall upon the Kingdom of Pontus, so that she was constrained with all the power she had to oppose and make war against the Father of a Prince, who infinitely adored her, and whom she herself did not hate. She furthermore saw, that he who of all men living she most scorned, and had the greatest aversion unto, had banded a considerable party against her, notwithstanding his great affection unto her: She, poor Princess, had neither any forces, nor money to raise them; and that State was so imbroyled, that she knew not whom to trust; and in this pitiful distracted condition, she knew not whether she should be sad or glad at the absence of Spitridates, for she conceived it not fit for him to fight for her against his own father, neither did she desire he should fight for his father against her; so that not knowing either what to wish; or what to do, she prayed unto the Gods to deliver her out of this gulph of misfortunes. But in conclusion Sir, your generosity not deceiving her hopes, but setting the King of Pont at liberty, unto whom you gave considerable Auxiliaries under the conduct of Artaxes, we received this intelligence with all acclamations of joy; and indeed the people of Heraclea took fresh heart, when they heard their Prince set at liberty after so generous a manner, publique rejoicings were appointed, and the glorious name of Artamenes was as highly celebrated in Heraclea, as it was in Sinope or Themiscira. The Princess then hearing the King was upon his return, would go to meet him, and since we knew there was none of Arsamones his troops that way which he was to come, we went two dayes journey before to meet him; but to our great misfortune we fell into an Ambuscado which waited for us in a Forrest, and carried us a blind way which was unknown unto us; we knew not whether they would carry us unto Arsamones or Artanus, and in the choice of these two, the Princess knew not which to wish; for if it should be unto Arsamones, though she was in hopes of much mildness from him, by the mediation of the Princess Arbiana, and the Princess Aristea, yet she imagined that the King her brother might perhaps suspect she did voluntarily fall into his hands, since he was not ignorant of her affection unto Spitridates, though he could not be ignorant that Arsamones did hate his son for loving her, yet notwithstanding the very name of Artanus was so averse unto her fancy, that at the hazard of being ill used by Arsamones, or suspected by the King her brother, she wished rather to be carried into Bythinia, then unto Cabira, under the power of such a man: But yet the choice was not in her, for towards night we were brought unto Artanus, who as amorous as he was, durst not venture himself Page 127 in this enterprize, but committed the carriage of the business unto a resolute souldier, who heretofore was one of those who conspired against your life: When the Princess saw Artanus in the head of two hundred horse ready to receive her, she was surprized; for though he was known to be a very Coward, yet since to be a Mutineer and a Rebel is sufficient to raise a party, his was not small, and we were much grieved to see so many gallant men obeying such a Captain; but we were forced to submit unto fortune, and be carried into Cabira, where he was Master, and in which there was a Castle of a great strength, wherein he lodged us: I will not stay to relate unto you Sir all the insolencies of Artanus, for it is enough that you know him a Coward, to imagine how he would lay aside all due respects when he is once the stronger; and since it is most ordinary to see them who want courage never to be submissive, but when they are weak, yet he met with a soul so great in the Princess, and so resolute a spirit, that maugre all his insolence, she so charmed him, that he durst hardly come into her chamber, or to see her. Mean while the King of Pontus, as afterwards we heard, came to Heraclea, and was extremely angry at the carrying away of the Princess his Sister, but as the state of things stood, he durst not by any means divide his Army, and he knew that Arsamones was so strong, that it would not permit him to continue a siege; and therefore since his business was either to relieve a Sister, or to save two Crowns, I believe common policy might easily incline him unto the latter, rather than the first. The condition of things standing thus, Artanus was so impudent as to send unto the King of Pontus, and offer unto him his forces, upon condition of his consent unto the marriage betwixt himself and the Princess Araminta; but the King would not hearken unto any such propositions, answering him. That if he had a desire to vanquish his enemies without any trouble, he would wish them such aid as he offered; and also bidding him have a care how he used the princess his Sister, because as soon as he had finished the Bythinian war, he would then call him to a strict account for all his demeanour: You may imagine then Sir in what a condition the princess was in, who knew of all these passages by one of her guards, who was suborned unto it: For when she imagined that Arsamones would kill the King her brother, or that the King her brother would kill the father of Spitridates, she did absolutely lose her reason. In the mean while the King of Pontus, after he had rallied all the forces he was able, went into the field to oppose Arsamones, who was already master of a great part in the Kingdom of Pontus, and in the first encounter the Prince Eurclides was slain, which much grieved Arsamones. But Sir, why should I busie my self in relating the particulars of a war which is known all over Asia? It is enough that I acquaint you how this Prince, as gallant as he was, yet was he almost quite beaten; that which contributed much unto his ruine, was Arieus, who calling away his brother with all his forces, did much weaken him; and though the King of Pontus would consent unto it, because it was done without any order, either from Cixares or you, yet Artaxes obeyed the absolute authority of Arieus, who was then Governour of Sinope; so that this Prince being much weakened thereby, was forced to make a retreat into Heraclea, and to stay there until he had raised fresh forces, and be able to come again into the field: But Sir, he had not time for it, for Arsamones, after that the Prince Inaphernes the son of Galdates was come unto him, not omitting such a favourable opportunity, advanced with his Army, and besieged him within the capital City of all his Kingdom, which indeed was the only place that remained under his obedience; for that part which was not subjected unto Arsamones, yet took part with Artanus. We understood by several relations whilst we were in Cabira, how the King of Pontus during this siege, did do such miracles, as that it may well be said he deserved a hundred Crowns in losing his own: But however, seeing his enemies were not only Masters of all without the Town, but also of one of the Gates, and that they had now nothing to do but to enforce the last entrenchment; since he had no mind to fall alive into the hands of Arsamones, he resolved to fly away in a ship, and to go and offer his sword unto Cixares towards the delivery of the Princess Mandana, of whose carrying away he had heard with unconceivable sorrow, and hoping that after this you would aid him to recover his Dominions: And indeed he did execute the first part of his design, for he went out of Heraclea, not any thing of two flourishing Kingdoms remaining unto him, but the title of King, which fortune could not deprive him of. When the Princess received this sad news, she resented it with insupportable sorrow; for Sir, be pleased to know, that the insolent Artanus assuming new boldness upon this new misfortune, came unto her with more incivility then ever before we saw him. Madam, said he unto her, since I ever thought that the strongest reason which moved you to treat me so imperiously as you have done, was, because I was a subject unto the King your brother, I think it therefore expedient to let you know, Page 128 that now he must never be my Master again, since fortune has taken from him his Crown, and two Kingdoms which he enjoyed, and has nothing left him but one single ship, in which he has conveyed himself away from his enemies; therefore Madam, since you are not now the sister of a King, you may well look upon my condition as not inferior unto yours, and for the future carry your self otherwise then heretofore you have done: Since you have only the heart of a Slave, replied the Princess, I should do you too much honor to regard you as a simple Subject of the King my brothers; and though fortune should take away his Crown, yet since she cannot take away his birth, which is infinitely above yours, she therefore cannot change my opinion of you; and though you had more Crowns then the King my brother has lost, yet should I despise and scorn you upon your Throne, as much as I do now; and though there should be an alteration in your soul (as I think it impossible) yet should you never see me change; therefore Artanus consider a little better what you say, and remember that my fathers were ever Masters over yours; that I have the honor to be daughter and sister unto three Princes, unto whom I have seen you subject, and indeed there is an undispensible obligation lies upon you, to respect and honor me all the daies of your life. The Princess pronounced these words with so much majestique choler, that she made him blush, and forced him to make a scurvy excuse for his insolency, and at last to leave her at liberty to lament the disgrace of the King her brother, which we had a more particular relation of from that guard which was very faithful unto us. Alas Hesionida, said she, how deplorable is my destiny? and unto what a cruel fate am I exposed? I was born upon a Throne, and am now a Slave, and a Slave unto him that is the most unworthy amongst men: I consider the misfortunes of my brother, I have not tears enough to lament his misfortunes; If I contemplate my own, I shall find them so dismal, that I see no way but death to terminate them; hitherto I have loved Spitridates most innocently, the late King my father desired it, the Prince and King Sinnesis my brother appointed it. But now Hesionida, since he is son to an usurper of my brothers Kingdom, and a ruiner of my Family, how is it possible I should love him without a sin? But Madam, said I unto her, Spitridates was not in this war: 'Tis true, said she, but yet he is son unto the usurper of the Kingdom of Pont; so that though my reason does not induce me to accuse him, yet it is not handsom or fit I should love him any longer; therefore Hesionida, whether he be innocent or culpable I ought not to see him any more, though he were in a place where I might do it. Moreover, in what part of the earth could he possibly be, where he could not hear the Pontean and Bythinian war discoursed on? and is it credible, that since he must needs know the state of things, I should never hear any news from him? if he was fuller of ambition then love, why did he not appear in the head of his fathers Army? and if he was fuller of love then ambition, why does he not endeavour to deliver me out of the hands of Artanus? and why did he not let me know that his heart did not approve of what Arsamones his father had done? I confess Madam, said I unto her, that I cannot understand why Spitridates should be so long silent: No more can I, replied the princess, and therefore in all reason I must imagine him dead, but I wish the Gods he may not justifie himself in my opinion by so sad a way. If I should Sir, repeat unto you all the lamentations and reflexions which the Princess had upon the King her brothers misfortunes, upon the mutability of terrene things, and upon the innocent passions of her soul, I should abuse your patience; therefore I shall slightly pass by them, and tell you, that Artanus considering himself under the verge of a victorious Army, commanded by a Prince who had conquered two Kingdoms, he was not without some unquiet thoughts; for although he had very gallant men in his party, yet was he not at all grown more valiant himself, and notwithstanding all his love unto the Princess, I believe he repented more then once of his undertakings: He also sent unto Arsamones to capitulate and propound some conditions betwixt them. But since he desired that Cabira should remain in his hands for his security, and that he might always keep the Princess Araminta under his power, Arsamones absolutely desiring it himself, would not hearken unto him, nor handsomely entertain those which came from him; so that after this refusal, Artanus was more perplexed then before: 'Tis true, he enjoyed some dayes of rest, because Arsamones falling sick, it retarded the march of his Army which was coming against him. As things stood in this condition, there came a Cavalier into Heraclea, where then the Queen Arbiana was (for it is but just to give her that title which is her due) there came I say a Cavalier, who on his Buckler bore the Emblem of a Slave, which seemed to have his choice either of Fatters or Crowns, and he broke the last, and assumed the first, with this Motto, More heavy, but more glorious: As it was late when he came, so he was unknown at his entrance into the Town, and his devise was not observed that night; but as soon as he alighted from his horse, at the house of an old acquaintance, he went Page 129 unto the Palace where the Queen & Princess were; as for Arsamones he was yet sick in the Country, whither these Princesses (with the Princess Istrina sister unto Intaphernis, who was then in that Court) were the next morning to go. This Cavalier went straight unto the chamber of the Princess Aristea, and desired a servant to tell her there was a stranger which desired to speak with her in private, concerning some important business; the servant told him, that she was with the Queen in her closet, into which he durst not enter, but he was so urgent with him to tell it unto them both, that thinking the business was of some great consequence, that he went in, and returned presently back to bring him in: But Sir, he was no sooner stepped into the Close*, but the Queen rising up was extremely surprized: I am very glad (said she unto him) to see you in a better condition then you were the last time I saw you in Bythinia, and when I mistook the Illustrious Artamenes for the unfortunate Spitridates. Madam, you give me a very glorious name (replied the right Spitridates, for indeed it was he whom the Queen Arbiana took for you,) but yet I wonder that you should not know me. The Princess Aristeia taking a candle, and looking him in the face, Madam, said she unto the Queen, without all doubt he whom now you see is my brother, and not Artamenes. Spitridates who had several times been taken for another in his travels, was not less surprized, then if he had not been formerly mistaken; therefore telling them many passages which none but they could know, they then knew him, and expressed all the signs of joy and tenderness that possible could be at the meeting of one so dear unto them, whom they never thought to see again. Since the Queen his mother did always love him, she had used all possible endeavours to mollify the incensed spirit of Arsamones, but she could never move him unto it; yet because she would not perplex this Prince at the first meeting, she spoke not any thing concerning it unto him, but only told him after some two hours conference, that he must not let it be known he was in Heraclea, until she had spoken with him. After this he went a back way unto his chamber, where some tears were bestowed upon the memory of Euricledes, and the Princess Aristeia staid with him, who had not seen him since the death of Sinnesis, in the memory of whom both sighed; but before he entered into discourse of any thing else, he asked concerning the Princess Araminta. I cannot Sir express the sorrows which Spitridates resented to see himself in that place where first he began to love the Princess, and she him; nor can I describe his grief of heart when he considered that it was his own father who was the cause she was not here now. Moreover when he fancied her to be in the clutches of Artanus, he was almost out of his senses, and it was long before he could give satisfaction unto the Princess his sister, who desired to know what adventures he met with since she saw him: But after many sad condolences, he told her (as we knew afterwards from himself, that when he was disguised in Paphlagonia, he writ a Letter unto the Princess Araminta, to ask her whether it were her pleasure he should come and offer himself unto the King her brother, who was then beginning the Cappadocian war, and that in lieu of receiving such an answer as he expected he had received from the Princess, the most cruel Letter in the world, and such a one as made him amazed to see it: And as the Princess Aristeia told him, that without all manner of question there had been some cheat put upon him, he pulled out those two Letters which he always kept about him ever since he received them, and shewing them unto her, she found them to this effect.

ARAMINTA unto SPITRIDATES.

Come not hither to offer your self unto the King my brother, but rather seek out for your self a Sanctuary, in some place of the world so far from me, that you may forget, even the very name of ARAMINTA.

Oh brother (cried out the Princess Aristeia) my eyes tell me, that the princess Araminta writ this Letter, but my reason assures me, that she never thought it: Afterwards, without staying for Spitridates his answer, she opened the other, and found these words.

HESIONIDA unto the Prince SPITRIDATES.

IT grieves me to tell you, that Glory is above all things predominate in the heart of the Princess: and she it so peremptorily resolved to obey the King, to quench her affection unto you, and to forget it, that no arguments under Heaven can alter her. Conform therefore your mind unto your fortune if you can; and since you are generous, strive to forget her who is absolutely resolved never to remember you.

HESIONIDA.

I leave it unto your imagination (said the Prince Spitridates, as soon as the Princess his Sister had done reading these two Letters) what I apprehended, after I received what now you have read: I do easily imagine, said she, but since I am certain that some or other has put a trick upon you, I am not surprized at it: for truly, said she, as long as the Cappadocian war lasted, I continually received intelligence from the Princess Araminta, as I was wont to do: she always enquired concerning you with extreme care, she has secretly done us an hundred good offices: and until the time she was taken away by Artanus, we ever held a good correspondence together; especially since the war began between my Father, and the King of Pontus. Moreover, when the Illustrious Artamenes came into Bythinia; and when we thought it had been you, who returned thither, she expressed abundance of joy, when I did intimate it unto her by a Letter, and I am certain that she was as sad when we acquainted her with our mistake: But, said she, I must compare this pretended Letter from the Princess Araminta with some which I have; and saying so, she opened a Cabinet which was upon the Table in her Closet, and taking several Letters out, she set her self to observe them very exactly: and she found much difference in many Characters: At the first sight all the world might have been deceived; but none could be so deluded that saw the false Letter compared with the true one. Spitridates was so overjoyed at his hopes of being deceived, that for a quarter of an hour he could hardly persuade himself that it was a cheat, but seemed to doubt of it, to the end he might move Aristeia to give him mine assurance of it, and to have a pretence to look longer upon the great difference between their hands. But how may it be imagined, said Spitridates, this cheat should come about? Pharnaces was out a man likely to do it: No, said the Princess, but Artanus may probably be such a knave: and indeed Sir, (as we afterwards came to know) it was he, who having discovered that Spitridates had sent unto Heraclea by that Captain of the Tower, wherein he was a prisoner, caused this man who had the true answer from the Princess, and me, to be followed, his Letters were taken from him, and carried unto a man, who was excellent at imitating of hands, to be counterfeited; It happened, for the favour of his cheat, that this man who had the Letters, was brought up in the house of Artanus his father, unknown unto Spitridates, so that knowing him to be the Son of his old Master, he was easily suborned to carry the counterfeited Letters of Artanus, which caused less knavery to be suspected. That which moved Artanus unto this, was because he hoped the great courage of Pharnaces would cause him to be killed in this war, and then if he could but send Spitridates far enough, he himself should then be the only man of quality in all the Kingdom, which could pretend unto the Princess. After that Spitridates was well confirmed in his belief of being deceived, he related with a far more calm mind then before, the despair which he was in, and how he resolved to seek out a death somewhere so far off the Princess, that she should never hear any more news of him: How in this sad designe, he went unto that Port which was nearest, and to imbarck in the first Ship which put to Saile without so much as asking whither it went: How by chance it was a Merchants Ship of Tenedos which took him in: How from thence he went to Ephesus, because reports went that Croesus would assault it: How he was in all that war, and yet could not meet with death, although he did sufficiently expose himself unto all dangers: How remembering himself, that if he would follow the ambition of Arsamones, rather then the love of the Princess Araminta, he might be a King: and that he preferred the Fetters of Araminta, before the Crown of Bythinia, he caused to be painted upon his Buckler, a Slave, who refused Crowns, and made choice of Chains, as I already told you: How after the conclusion of that war, he imbarqued again for Cyprus, hoping that Island which was consecrated unto the Mother of Love, would be more propitious unto him, then any other; but conceiving that journey too pleasant for an unfortunate man, he passed into Sicilie: afterwards, not being able to stay in any place, he would needs Page 131 put to Sea gain, had he not met with a Persian Magi, who being new come ashore, did render him all imaginable honour; speaking an hundred things in a language which he understood not: An Interpreter which he carried with him for the conveniency of his travel, told Spitridates how this man was a Persian, who took him to be the Son of his King, whom Merchants had reported to be drowned at Chalcedonia: Spitridates hearing this, answered him by the Interpreter, that he was not a Persian: that it was very true it was supposed he was drowned at Chalcedonia, but he was not: But whatsoever this Interpreter said, this Persian would not be perswaded but all that Spitridates said was but excuses. In conclusion, Sir, he was so importunate with Spitridates, to confess that which he was ignorant of, as he was forced to leave him: But this man going unto the Magistrate of the Town, told him that the King his Master, had lost his only Son, and Successour unto his Dominions, who for some concealed reasons, would not return into his Countrey: and how that by chance he had met with him, that he was in this Town, and ready to imbarque away. He conjured the Magistrate to arrest him, and to send him back unto the King his Father: so that this Magistrate finding the Persian of a grave Phisognomy*, and had acquaintance with the greatest and wisest men in the Town, sent Orders to stop Spitridates, as being Son to the King of Persia, and to treat him with all respect as befitting his quality: you may easily imagine that this Prince was extremely amazed at it; he used all his arguments to undeceive these men, but the more he denied, the more this Persian maintained that he was Cyrus.

In conclusion, the Magistrate sent both Spitridates and this Persian unto the Prince of the place, who after he had heard them both, and fearing to commit an error, did send them both unto the King of Persia, and made choice of a man of a good ingenuity and quality for this employment, and say what Spitridates could, he was sent away with a great number of soldiers: I shall omit the relation of his melancholy during so long a voyage, during all which time he was guarded very vigilantly: I shall only acquaint you, that the Persian Magi dyed during this voyage: and being come into Persia, where the Embassador which went with them, heard that all the people believed Cyrus to be dead; and that the Merchants saw him drowned, he began to believe Spitridates, conceiving he had no reason to conceal his being the Son of a King; as really he was so: But so it happened that this Embassador fell sick as well as the Magi, and dyed for company: so that Spitridates was now at more liberty, and stole away from this Embassadors men, when they were in the height of their mourning: but yet notwithstanding, he was often in danger to be stopped by several others who took him to be you Sir: And since he was resolved to draw nearer the place where we were, that he might hear in what part of the world his Princess was, he passed out of Persia, into Medea, where he was also followed divers times, not knowing the reason why: Afterwards being come as far as the Frontiers of Galatia, there he heard of the Bythinian Rebellion, and of the War which the King his Father had declared against the King of Pontus; also he did afterwards tell the Princess Aristeia, that this news did so cruelly perplex him, as he fell so extremely sick upon it, that never man was more violently tormented: for hearing every day a relation of his Fathers victories, and also of Prince Euricledes his death, he conceived this to be the worst way to regain the opinion of the Princess Araminta: not that he wished the King his Father were vanquished, but that he himself knew not what to wish. In conclusion (said he unto the Princess Aristeia,) You see me here, dear Sister, well recovered of my sickness, against my will, and desiring your advice, what course I shall take: for though my Princess should be perfidious unto me, yet would I deliver her out of the hands of Artanus, where I understand she is. That is not an easie matter for you to do, said she unto him, unless it be with the Kings forces: and the sooner to induce him to see you, it is requisite you seem as if you did not love that Princess: Ha, my dear Sister, said he, I cannot counterfeit, not know I how to owe my good fortune unto a lye. But alas, said he, what might my Princess think of my silence during all these great alterations? Perhaps she imagines that I lurk quietly till the wars be ended, that I afterwards would peaceably enjoy the fruits of the victory: but my Divine Princess, how unjust would you be in such a thought? Well Sir, after many such like complaints and lamentations as these. Spitridates retired himself unto the place where he was to lodge: And Aristeia told him before he left her, that the Prince Intaphernes, the Son of Gadates, who is now in the Army of Cixares, had done great services unto the King his Father: and that the Princess Istrina his Sister, came unto the Queen Arbiana, presently after the Queen Nitocris dyed, who desired it should be so: After this, Spitridates went away, and the next morning the Queen and princess sent unto him, with advice to keep himself close, until he heard from them, and that they were going unto Page 132 the Camp where Arsamones was sick: and since the Army was not above one days journey from Heraclea, they should be there that same night: But since they found Arsamones very ill, it was the next day in the morning, before they could acquaint him how they had received some news of Spitridates, but they did not tell him he was come, because they would not expose him unto any danger: Arsamones was much surprized at the news and discourse of Arbiana, and the Princess Aristeia observed both astonishment and anger in his face: yet notwithstanding his angry and tumultuous thoughts, she perceived some signes of joy mixed with them: And indeed since Arsamones had no other Son, though he had some resentments of displeasure against him, in respect of the King of Pont, yet was he very glad and desirous to see him that was to be his Successour: Therefore after he had paused a while, If Spitridates (said he unto the Queen his wife) return with the mind of a slave, as he had when he broke out of prison, it is but fit he should be fettered again; but if he return with such a mind as becomes a King, it is fit he should be treated like such a Prince as hereafter he may be. Therefore Madam, said he unto the Queen, let him know, if you please, that he himself is the Arbitratour of his own destiny: and if he have a mind to finish this war, which I have so prosperously begun, and bring the Princess Araminta into my hands as my Prisoner, I shall entertain him, and give him the Command of my Army: But if he think to return, and continue his affection unto her, whom he ought to look upon as the Daughter and Sister of our Tirantes, I shall let him see that I am Master of two Crowns which I have conquered, and can bestow them upon whom I please: He has been long enough absent, said he, to forget his passion; therefore, (said he, and looked upon the Princess Aristeia) I give you a Commission to dive into the secrets of his heart and discover his real thoughts: for I perceive you know more then yet you tell me, and perhaps he is already in Heraclea: Arbiana would have denied it; but it was after such a manner, that she more increased the Kings belief, so that he said unto them, No, no, Spiritridates be wise, let him not fear anything: therefore if he be returned, as I believe he is, return you into Heraclea, said he unto the Princess his daughter, and if you find him such a one as I say, then bring him hither; but if he be not, I permit him to return unto his exile again: yet I say, if he become with intentions of good fortune unto me, and himself, let him come hither in all haste, because I would then employ him, since I am not well myself, against Cabira, and give Artanus no longer time to fortifie it, and himself in it. The Queen hearing him say so, confessed the truth: and the next morning the Princess returned unto Heraclea, with private instructions from the queen, to desire Spitridates that he would dissemble his love; and to tell him, that when Araminta is under the power of Arsamones, she would intercede, and keep him from any rigorous treating of her: and that perhaps the rare merits of that Princess would in conclusion win Arsamones to favour her: and that to conclude all in one word, he must necessarily force himself, and disguise his thoughts for a time. The Princess did negotiate with him very handsomly: for as soon as she came to Heraclea, she sent to Spitridates, and used all possible arguments expedient for the business: But when she found that he could not resolve upon a dissimulation, What do you intend to do then, (said she unto him) the Princess Araminta is under the hands of Artanus, where I believe she is in a worse condition then she would be under the dispose of my Father, and in Heraclea, where I might be serviceable unto her. Ah, dear Sister, said he, my soul is ballanced betwixt two great extrems: I do know very well that it is my duty to get Araminta out of the power of Artanus, but I know also, that it does not become me to release her, that she may be again a prisoner: Of two evils the least is to be chosen, replied the Princess, and as I conceive there is no comparison betwixt these two. Spitridates was then a long while silent, contemplating whether there was not a middle way between these two to be taken: but the more he thought upon it, the further was he from finding it: gladly would he have preserved his respects unto the King his Father; he wished he were out of this vexing necessity of disguising his real thoughts: he did most earnestly desire that the Kingdom of Pontus were restored unto him who lost it, and keeping only the Kingdom of Bythnia, he might marry the Princess Araminta, and so place her upon the Throne hereafter: But yet he knew well enough that Arsamones would never consent unto such propositions; so that not knowing what course to take he was extremely perplexed. Yet when he thought himself that Artanus had the power to persecute the princess, Well, my dear Sister, said he unto her, I am too long in deliberating: and since I know that Araminta is in the power of my Rival, it is too much to consider upon one minute longer: Come then, let us go unto the King, and tell him, since he will needs have it so, that I am not at all in love; let us transact like an enemy, that I may hereafter appear a most real Lover: and let us not think it a dishonour to tell an innocent Iye, and to assume that disguise which I would never undertake, but to set Page 133 the most glorious Princess in the world at liberty. After much such discourse as this, Spitridates promised the Princess Aristeia, to carry the matter towards the King, as she desired: so that without any loss of time both of them went to Court the next morning, and would not admit of any visits in Heraclea until he had seen the King: when they were come unto the Camp, they understood that this news had so much troubled Arsamones, as he was worse then he was before; and since the departure of the Princess he expressed much impatience of seeing Spitridates. He was no sooner arrived, but it was told the King, who commanded him to enter presently, and notwithstanding his sickness, he received him with many testimonies of tenderness: But after the first passion, whereof he was not Master, he assumed a more serious and severe countenance: Spitridates, said he unto him, I must tell you, that if it be the pleasure of the Gods to dispose of me, I would not have you to hold any Treaty, or contract any alliance with those unto whom we have been Slaves: And if you do, I do dispense with all my Subjects, from acknowledging you as their Prince: Sir (said Spitridates unto him, and bowed) Doubtless the Gods will permit you to enjoy your Conquests long, and I shall have leisure enough hereafter to understand your intentions more precisely: Therefore it will suffice, if you will be pleased, to grace me so far as to tell me what service I shall do you for the present, as I am your Subject: without any further discourse of what I ought to do when I am King, as yet I am not: It is my intentions, answered the King, that if my sickness continue, you shall command my Army: That you march against Artanus, and reduce Araminta into my power. Spitridates did then bethink himself of some words which would admit of an ambiguous sence, which might both satisfie the Nicety of his Love, and might make the King believe that he would punctually obey him: and indeed, he did hit of it so handsomly, that the King was satisfied with his answer, and embraced him: after which being retired unto a very magnificent Tent which was prepared for him, he was visited by Intaphernes, and all the Officers of the Army; for we were informed of all these passages afterwards from Spitridates himself: within three days after, the Physicians told Arsamones, that there was no danger in his disease, but yet it would continue long: so that not to lose time, he gave Orders unto Spitridates to go, and besiege Artanus: yet appointing one of his Lieutenant Generals to have an observant eye upon the actions of this Prince: Then went Arsamones with the Queen, and the Princess his daughter unto Heraclea; as for the Princess Istrina, she was there before: So Spitridates departed for Cabira, the Prince Intaphernes being his principal Lieutenant General, with whom he contracted a great League of friendship: You may imagine Sir, how much we were surprized, when we were informed by our faithful Guard, that there arrived a Cavalier at Heraclea, having a Buckler, as I told you before, and afterwards that this Cavalier was Spitridates, and that this Prince was so gracious with the King his Father, that he made him General of his Army: Our wonder for a long time was so great, that our words could not express it: Joy to hear that Spitridates was alive, and the incertainty of his designe in coming against Artanus, did so divide the mind of the Princess Araminta, that she knew not whether she should grieve or rejoice: However Madam (said I unto her, when she began to grieve) I cannot chuse but be extremely glad to know that Spitridates is living: I have the same resentments, replied she, but however, my soul must needs be in such inquietness, for Arsamones has not altered opinion: and it seems to be almost without all question, that since Spitridates is in such favour with him, they are both of one mind: Oh Madam (said I unto her) censure not before you hear: But yet it is very likely, answered she, that I am not mistaken: a long absence may easily bury all his affection unto me in the grave of oblivion: and he may as easily prefer the enjoyment of two Kingdoms, above a Princess whom he has not a long time seen, and who has nothing but misfortunes to her portion. The truth is, Hesionida, if Spitridates do continue faithful, it is a miracle; and if he do not, then doubtless it is the greatest misfortune that ever could happen unto me: so that not knowing whether I should pray for or against him, whether he will see me at liberty, or take me prisoner, my soul is in a most restless condition. I did all I could to lessen her fears, and fortifie her hopes: But to tell you truly, I do believe they both reigned successively in her heart for many days, and she was not well resolved in her self: In the mean while Artanus was something sick upon the business; the very name of Spitridates, and of his return, did cast him into a qualm, nor could all the power of his love cure him: since he had many brave and gallant men with him, they moved him, much against his mind, God knows, to go and meet their enemy, and to hazard a Battel: at the first, he did oppose the motion, but afterwards fearing, that if he should discover his Cowardice, then doubtless they would all forsake him, therefore he consented unto them, and resolved to be there himself: so that all the Regiments being drawn up under the walls of the Town, where Page 134 we were, he viewed them, and without bidding any adieu unto the Princess, he departed, leaving her under the Guardship of a Captain, who was absolutely his creature: I shall not relate unto you, Sir, all the particulars of this war; only thus much in short, that Spitridates was victor, and the Coward Artanus being much against his will engaged in fight, was mortally wounded by the hand of Spitridates, who took him prisoner, this perfidious wretch living only so long as to confess the counterfeiting of the Princess letter and mine: The shattered part of this defeated Army fell into the Town, and all the Commanders consulted what to do, and resolved to receive their orders from the Princess, hoping thereby to obtain more advantageous conditions by a treaty with Spitridates.

All the Captains then came unto her chamber, whilst we were altogether ignorant of any passages, because Artanus had taken that guard who was our intelligencer with him, and he was killed in the battel. At the first sight of them she knew not how to interpret their visit; but one of them being Speaker for the rest, said thus unto her; Madam, we are come to beg pardon for our past rebellion, we come to tell you that Artanus has lost the battel and his life, and we come to receive orders from you as the daughter and Sister of our Kings; therefore Madam we beseech you let us know, what is your pleasure we shall do, whether you will render your self, or whether it is your pleasure we should defend you against the Prince Spitridates; which of these two wayes soever you are pleased to command we are ready to obey you. You tell me of so many wonders at once, said she, that I cannot upon a suddain precisely resolve you; but it is most certain that I must take no other part but the King my brothers, and that his enemies are and must be mine, and if they will not do us justice, it will be much more noble to die in defending our selves, then cowardly to submit: Yet since you are from rebellious subjects become my protectors, I do conjure you to take such orders as are necessary for the preservation of the Town, and not to attempt any thing without my knowledge, and for the present I conceive you have nothing else to do, but to defend your self if they assault you. Here Sir was a great alteration in our fortune, our guards became almost our slaves, and the prisoners command their keepers: But all this while Spitridates was not without his vexations, amidst all the joys of his victory, since he was not so absolute Master of his Army, that he could do what he would; so that in appearance he must carry himself as a mortal enemy against the Princess, but really as a man who preferred his love unto her above all things else. He sent then to summon the Town, To render it self unto his discretion, after he had surrounded it on all sides, for he could do no otherwise, because that Lieutenant General, who Arsamones did set as an Adjutant with him, was very severe and obstinate. When the Princess heard that Spitridates had sent a messenger, she commanded him to be brought into her presence, and with an incensed spirit said unto him; Tell your Master that the Princesses of Pontus are not used to pay obedience unto the Princess of Bythnia, but rather have been for a long time obeyed, and that I could never have believed that the Sister unto the Prince Sinnesis should have been thus treated withal by Spitridates: and lastly, since he goes so unjustly to work, he may assure himself he shall find it a greater difficulty to overcome the Princess Araminta, then he did in defeating Artanus. After this answer, the Herald departed, and the princess being at liberty to condole with me; Well Hesionida (said she unto me) what do you now think of Spitridates? I think that he is come to release you Madam (said I unto her) and I cannot suspect that he desires to have you in his own power, but in the power of Arsamones: Servitude is not the way to liberty, replied she, and very few Lovers use to release those they love by such extraordinary wayes: But Madam, replied I, as the case is, what would you have Spitridates do? I know not, answered she and sighed, but I am sure I would not be brought under the power of him who is the ruiner of my family; yet Hesionida, I have no reason to complain against fortune, but rather give her thanks, since she has done all she can to give me cause of excluding that tenderness which I kept in my heart for Spitridates, because he is son unto the declared enemy of the King my Brother. I should never and Sir, if I should relate all what the Princess said, and all that Spitridates thought upon the return of the Herald; for since he durst not send any obliging message, lest he should render himself suspected, he perceived by her answer that she did not think he dissembled when he transacted with her as an enemy; yet had he some consolation, that the Commanders of Artanus his Army did obey her, and that it was her self only with whom he was to treat; so that changing his opinion, he call'd a Council of War the next day; where he declared that there was no great honor to be got by forcing a Town which was kept and defended only by a princess, but that it were expedient, first to use all endeavours to reduce it otherwise, before it came to open force; so that to save blood, and the King his fathers forces, and also to carry the matter handsomely with a woman, Page 135 he did resolve to send and desire to speak with her: The Major part of Officers, who began to love Spitridates, principally Intaphernes, did approve of his design, and there was none who did oppose it but that Lieutenant General, of whom I spake, and he did most violently oppose it, as afterwards we came to know; but do what he could, since the plurality of voices carried it, he was forced to submit, and Spitridates had his desire.

He sent then the second time unto the Princess by one who was very faithful and trusty, with orders most humbly to beseech her that he might have the honor to speak with her, before he was forced to make any attempts against her; he commanded him to tell her, that he conjured her by the glorious name and memory of the Prince Sinnesis not to deny this favour, and that she would be pleased to believe that he is and ever will be the same Spitridates which once she knew him. This messenger received this order in private, but he spoke in publique before all the Captains with less tenderness, and more sharply: Might he have followed the humour of his passion, he would never have thought upon the security of his person, but would have entred into the Town, and not so much as desired her to engage her word; but since he was not absolutely his own Master, and not to render himself suspected by his own party, he beseeched her she would be pleased to come unto one side of the wall, which was not very high, where he might with conveniency speak unto her. These, Sir, were the orders which the Envoy of Spitridates received, whose coming was a great joy unto me, as well as to the Princess, who then began to hope she had been deceived in her opinion of that Prince; yet she was so surprized at his message, that she took two hours time before she would return an answer; and to colour the matter, she assembled all the Officers into a Council, though it was with me resolved upon what course to follow; I saw some joy in her eyes, which spoke her hopes that this Prince was not so culpable as she believed him; and I perceived also that she was restless, and knew not whether she should see him, or not see him: Seeing her in this anxiety, I told her she was too blame in making any doubt of the matter: Ah, Hesionida, replied she, it is not so easie a matter to determine, for if Spitridates come as an ambitious Prince, who prefers the possession of two Crowns before me, I ought not to see him, since it would be to no purpose: But if on the contrary he be the same he was, yet ought I not to see him, since it is impossible I should be the same to him I have been heretofore; and the state of things being changed, I ought to change my thoughts also? therefore Hesionida, I must in reason conclude, that it is not expedient for me to see him; yet notwithstanding if they counsell me to see him, then I will, and if I find him innocent I shall not hate him: If he be innocent, Madam, (said I unto her) you would be very unjust to withdraw your affection from him, and which way soever I look upon the business, I find it expedient for you to see him, for though he be your enemy, yet as the case is with you now, you must have recourse unto his clemency; and if he be your lover and adorer, then ought you to accept his services, and rely upon his generosity and love: The truth is, Sir, I found it no great difficulty to persuade the Princess unto a parley with him; but since my expectations from this interview were very great, so it might be in such a place where they might speak together with freedom, I told the Princess, that it would be much better if she met Spitridates upon the middle of the Bridg, which stands over that river that runs under the walls of the Town. After the Princess had well consulted, and since all the Officers could not foresee any happy issue of this siege, but by some advantageous capitulation, and also since they saw no hopes of any relief, they advised her to see Spitridates, and she caused him whom the Prince had sent to come unto her, to tell him that she consented unto the desire of his Master, commanding one of her Captains to shew him the place where she desired this meeting might be the next morning, and also to instruct him in such orders as should be observed, and during which time there should be a cessation of all hostility. After this messenger had viewed the Bridg, and returned to his Master, who approved of the alteration of place, the rest of the day and night following was employed in preparations for this interview, and making the place fit, which indeed was a most glorious sight: As the river was great, the Bridg over it was also very large and stately, so that it contributed much unto the magnificence of this business; for just over the middle Arch were Lists made ready, and covered with rich Sidonian Tapistry; olover the head was a rich and stately Pavilion, trussed up on two sides with golden strings, or to let down if the Sun did offend; so that the next morning Spitridates, who was all joy, in hopes to see the princess, did not sail of his time, after he had drawn up all his forces into Batlalia, in sight of the Town, and caused five hundred foot, and two hundred horse only to advance with him to the end of the Bridg. The princess on the other side commanded, that all the walls should be well lined with souldiers, and with the like number of horse and foot came Page 136 to the other end of the Bridg: She no sooner knew that Spitridates was come, but she prepaired to meet him, and that so fair, as I was astonished at the mixture of so much melancholly, and so much beauty together: Since the Sun was not likely to annoy, I moved her wolmen to dress her as she was used when she went to hunt at Heraclea, which was with a waiving Plume over her head, to cast a shadow upon her face. The Princess being thus dressed, went unto the end of the Bridg, and waited upon by all her women, and Commanders in her Army: as soon as she appeared, Spitridates advanced, being waited upon by the like number; The princess came to the Bars, and went under the pavilion, under which we were also, but at a distance behind her: Spitridates did wear the loveliest Sute of Arms upon earth, and in spite of his melancholy, his garb was so high, and his Air so sprightly and delighting, that I never saw him more glorious then that day; as soon as he espied the Princess afar off he saluited her with much reverence, and both of them meeting at the Bars at the same time, all the men of both sides remaining under their Colours and Arms, Spitridates did bow down to the very ground, and she returned him her complement very civilly: Afterwards, beginning dis|course, When I sent unto you Madam, (said he unto her) to beg the honour of treating with you, I never had any intentions of coming to capitulate with you, but in all humility I come to receive your commands, and to render you an account of a tedious Exile, of my return, and of what I do at this present: Indeed, Divine Princess, if the actions of the King my Father, have not rendred me unworthy of your ear, I am come to give you an account of my life past, and to hear from your own mouth what it must be for the future: Since I hear you say so, (answered the Princess) I begin to think you are the very same Spitridates whom the late King my Father made choice of, for his alliance; who was so well beloved by the Prince Si•esis, and so really esteemed by the unfortunate Araminta; I begin to think, I say, that you are the same Spitridates, who for the love of me endured two imprisonments, with high generosity, and who expressed an hundred signes of a most constant affection: But yet when I look upon this Bar, and all these Souldiers about you, then I do confess, me thinks, you do not look like the same Spitridates I speak of: but I look upon you as the Son of Arsamones: that is, a mortal enemy to the King my Brother.

Oh Madam, cryed he out, if it be your pleasure to know what I am, I beseech you hear; and look not upon that which may seduce your reason, and may make me pass in your opinion for what I am not: I do confess, Madam, that if I did not infinitely and beyond all expressions love you, I should think my father had some reason to take possession of that Crown which was surreptitiously taken from off his head: yet since he cannot do it but by the ruine of your house, I shall look upon him (in spite of all considerations of ambition or nature) as an Usurper of his own Kingdom; and all this because my love to you has taken the whole possession of my heart. You know, said the Princess unto him, that Arsamones is not content with his own, but the Kingdom of Pont is now in his hands as well as the Kingdom of Bythinia: so that though his war were just in the getting of the one, yet it was most unjust in the getting of the other: I do confess it, Madam, said he unto her, but if it may be permitted a Lover, to speak something in excuse of his father, I should then say, that since ambition and revenge reverse to keep within those limits which reasou and justice prescribe unto them; it is no wonder if an injured and an ambitious Prince do not act altogether according to the rules of natural equity: But Madam, loving you as I do, I will never approve of the act: I confess also that the King my Father is injurious; that he deserves the name of a cruel enemy, and that I am the son of an Usurper: But Madam, you may remember, if you please, that when I began first to adore you, you were then, if I dare say it, in the same condition which I am now, and I then as you are now; for as the King my Father has taken the Kingdom of Pontus from your house, so likewise your Father held the Kingdom of Bythinia from mine: yet for all that, Madam, I shall love and adore you, and though you be the daughter of an Usurper, (be it spoken without any irreverence unto that honour I owe you) yet I do for ever devote my self unto your service. I do wish unto the Gods with all the desires of my soul, that the state of things did stand upon the same terms they did: that I were still a Subject unto your Brother; and that it were then permitted me to hope for the same which now I do. Your very long absence, replied the Princess, did doubtless work some change in your mind, otherwise your ba|nishment, notwithstanding my enjoying it, would not have been so long; when Spitridates heard her make that objection, he then told in short, the cause of his departure from Paphlagonia: the cheat of Artanus: his dispair when he believed her perfidious; his voyages, his return, and his extream sorrows to bear of all the victories which his Father had obtained, and that she was in the power of his Rival: And now Madam, (said he unto her, at the con|clusion Page 137 of his relation) you know not what the life of unfortunate Spitridates hath been: he loved ever, even when the King your Father detained that Kingdom unto which he <...> pretend for a share, and he adored you even then when he believed you to be <...> lamented all his fathers victories; he grieved at the Cor quest of two Kingdoms <...> preferred the condition of your Slave, before the glorious Title of a King; and <...> and ever will adore you, be you unjust, or as incensed as you will against him: <...> devoted unto you, that there is nothing which he will not attempt for you: Yes <...> you should command me any thing but to turn my Arms against the King my Father, <...> do it: and truly if you should be so unjust as to command that, I know not whether <...> •e were able to stand out long or no: Now, after all this Madam, can you believe <...> •e? I took up Arms, 'tis true, but it was only to kill Artanus, and force you out of <...> I carry them still I confess: but how could I have come to have known your pleasu <...> I had seemed your enemy? Therefore Madam, since I am only unfortunate, and not <...> pable, you would be most unjust if you should change your opinion of me. Though you <...> ly perswaded me of your innocence, replied the Princess, yet are you not nearer <...> ness: for truly, Spitridates, true generosity will never allow me, to preserve so pu <...> ction as that which I retain for you, since you are son unto a declared enemy of the King <...> Brother: for consider, I pray you, in what a deplorable condition is that Prince, <...> flourishing Kingdoms which once he had, has not but one poor Ship in his power, and <...> more in the power of unconstant winds and waves, then in his own; and would <...> me Spitridates to surrender my self without any conditions? and can you think <...> Arsamones would consent) sit upon that Throne which belongs not to me, whil <...> my Brother who his most right unto it, is tossed upon the waves, and languishing <...> ble exile? Oh, no no, I never will, and if you think it, you esteem me but a little <...> me not at all: I have esteemed you, I do confess, and do still very much: and if <...> too weak to express, think upon one more obliging for your satisfaction, and <...> unto it: but yet for all that, though my heart be the same unto you, that it was <...> yet I cannot comply with you, but as with the Son of mine enemy; therefore Spitri <...> these two things must necessarily be done; either move the King your Father to con <...> self with the Kingdom of Bythinia, and restore the Kingdom of Pontus, or else you resolve never to have this place but by violence and force, or at the least, upon such Capi•ulations, as shall permit me to go whither I shall hear the King my Brother is: for I do peremptorily de|clare my self, that you shall never put me into the hands of Arsamones, and there is nothing which I will leave unattempted, rather then I will submit unto that: I know very well that the Queen Arbiana, and the Princess Aristeia would protect me: but I know withall, that all Asia would suspect me for either treachery, or weakness, which I am not capable of: there|fore Spitridates never endeavour to make me change my thoughts, for it will be absolutely in vain: and if there be any memory of the Prince Sinnesis yet remaining in you, promise me that you will never bring me under the power of Arsamones, if fortune should reduce me into yours. I will promise you any thing, Madam, replied he, upon condition you will promise me not to hate Spitridates, if he be not able to compass all your desires. The Gods do know, that if I were absolute Master of two Kingdoms, you, and only you, should be the sole disposer of them: and I should without the least murmur consent unto the loss of the Bythinian Crown once again, rather then I would in the least displease you. But alas, Madam, they are not in my power, the King my Father is in possession, and all I can do is to imploy the Queen my mother, and the Princess my Sister to perswade him: for my part, if I should quit the Arlmy, I should then fear he would not permit me to return, and so I should disable my self from being inseperably devoted unto your fortunes, as my intentions are: But Madam, dare I be so bold as to tell you, that if Spitridates were as deeply rooted in your heart as he might be, you would not transact thus with him? You would then leave the conduct of things unto the Gods, and wait their happy time for the re-establishment of the King your Brother: nor would you then reject a Prince who for you has suffered prisons, banishments, and all imagilnable miseries; and who may hereafter make you change a prison for a Throne, and bring you into a condition to give a Crown unto the King of Pontus: Not Madam, but that I am resolved to obey you most exactly, but because I foresee into what a miserable extreamity I shall be reduced. I do not intend to impose any possibilities upon you, replied the Princess, something more mildly, and therefore, if you cannot obtain these my desires, I shall surrender up the Town, upon condition that I may be conducted unto what place I shall chuse to go unto: and if that cannot be obtained, then assure your self I will bury my self under the ruins Page 138 of the Ramparts, whilst you enjoy the pleasant fruits of your fathers Conquests, and malking love submit unto ambition, by forgetting the Princess Araminta, you become as happy as I am miserable. Ah cruel Lady, said he unto her, I shall make it appear that I am not ca|pable of any such thoughts: No, no, Madam, you shall never see Spuridates happy as long as you are miserable; nor will he ever be a King, until you be in a con•ition to be a Queen, and this I solemnly protest before the Gods who hear me: But I beseech you, Madam, promise me this at the least, that when I have abandoned all the world for you, you w|ll be pleased to let me follow and participate of your destinies, and that I may never leave you. The Princess was so moved at the expressions of Spi <...> es, that she repented her self that she had in per|plexed him; I will believe, said she unto him, that all your thoughts are generous, and I will promise you, not to suspect your fidelity: and be perswaded of this, that though I act as your enemy in many things, yet you shall be still the same in my heart that ever you were: yet for all this, I must tel you, that in all likelihood we shall not agree. Oh Madam, said he, that lan|guage is so cruel, as it moves me to part with my life, and so neither take your part, nor turn Arms against them I command: I am not of so violent a temper as you, replied she; and as I do not intend to do any thing unworthy of my self, so I do not expect or desire any thing from you, which shall be dishonourable for you: Therefore without any more unprofitable complaints, said she, and sighed, I advice you to go back, Spitridates, and endeavour to induce Arsamones unto some reason: let those whom you imploy, tell him, that the best expedient to preserveth Kingdom of Bythinia, (which is his right) in peace; is to restore the Kingdom of Pontus, which is not his right: Go Spitridates, and transact with all your inge|nuity, both for your satisfaction, and mine: And if you cannot induce Arfammes unto it, yet yet however remember that you preserve my liber, if you desire to preserve your life.

Spitridates was so troubled at these words, as he hardly knew now •o•n•wer: Why Ma|dam, said he; would you have me leave you? Because it is not convenient, answered she: And let me tell you once more Spitridates, because I desire to die in liberty: And let me tell you once again Madam, said he, and interrupted her, That I desire to die your slave. I is not for those who are happy, replied she, to desire death: Nor is it for those who are unfortunate, said he, to desire life; and therefore Madam, if I cannot alter either the mind of the King my fa|thers, or yours, though I should set you at liberty, yet should I expect nothing but my grave: Since your life is and ever shall be, most dear unto me, answered she, I desire you should pre|serve it: But Spitridates once wore I advise you to retire, and tell your Captains that which I shall tell mine, which is, that you cannot give an answer unto my Propositions, before you have sent unto the King your father: Your wits are at so much liberty Madam, replied he, that I perceive your heart is not over-deeply engaged: Since you have so great a soul, replied she, this answer is not becoming you, but Spitridates, I will pardon you, and wish you would not think as you seem to do of me: In saying so, she bowed unto him, and went away, agreeing first, that there should be a cessation of Arms, until the answer of Arsamones was recei|ved; for my part I never saw a more lamentable parting, Spitridates was as pale as if death were in his face; the Princess for all her high soul, seemed so dejected at that instant, as it might well have been a cordial unto the Prince, had he been able to have discerned the sadness of her eyes. He looked after her as long as he could, but so P•anet-struck, that he knew not what he saw: When the Princess was gone ten or twelve paces from the Bar, I stepped to him: Sir, said I, Fortune offers you a good occasion to use your generosity: Fortune, answered he, may be more propitious unto me in the favour of Hesionida, who may do me many good offices to the Princess Araminta: I shall do all I can Sir, said she, and retired, but in the mean time do you all you can. This was spoke so low and quickly, that none could hear or take a|ny notice of it: And presently after we went back to the Town, in which we no sooner were, but Spitridates, since he could not see the Princess any longer, took horse, and retired to his company: He told what she appointed him unto his Officers, and not to lose any time, he made choice of one Democides to send unto Arsamones. This man was one of an excellent wit, and who loved the prince extreamly, so that he could not make a b•tter choice; and that he might the better understand all his thoughts, he related all the passages of his life unto him: He gave him a Letter unto the Princess his Mother, and another unto the Princess his Sister: He writ also unto the King his father withall imaginable submission, he forget nothing, which might probable induce him to be contented with the Reconquest of his own Kingdom, with the usurpation upon the Kingdom of another: He instructed Democides with all the subtil and politique Maximes expedient for his negotiation, and to perswade Arsamones, that it were better to possess one Kingdom in peace, then to have two upon terms of war. Whilst Page 139Spitridates was dispatching this Captain, the Princess was exceedingly grieved, and almost wished that she had not spoken unto him in so obliging a manner: Sometimes again, she was very glad she was not deceived in her choice, and that she had no cause to repent her self for loving Spitridates; but yet these moments of consolation were very rare* for when she con|sidered the present condition of her fortune, and looked upon the future, she found so many sad objects of sorrow, that all hopes were as far from her soul, as from the princes, who since the departure of Democides was full of unquiet thoughts and fears, not to obtain any thing from Arsamones; and indeed his apprehensions were not without cause, for all the perswasive arguments which the Queen and Princess could use, would not move the new King of Byth|inia: This excellent Princess employed all those who had most prevalency with him, but all in vain. Democides used all his politike arguments wherewith he was instructed, but could not perswade more then the rest; the tears of the Princess Aristeia would not move him; but he answered them that moved him, generously to restore the Kingdom of Pontus unto them it belonged, that when he and his had enjoyed the Crown of Pontus as long as the Father and the Grandfather of this King had enjoyed the Kingdom of Bythinia, then perhaps there would be some justice in the restitution demanded: I have (said he) gotten it by more legitimate and honorable wayes, then they usurped ours; and it is but just, that they who have thus long fetter|ed others, should take their turn, and bear those fetters themselves, that they may experimen|tally know the miseries of servitude; and therefore it is my positive pleasure, that Spitridates assist me in taking this Town wherein the Princess Araminta is, otherwise I shall let him know, that he who has not the heart and courage of a King, shall never be my Successor; but treating him as a Slave, I will cast him into prison with the Princess Araminta, whom he loves above his own honor: Democides, according to the instructions of Spitridates, did put him in memory of what he said unto the Prince his son, in the ship as they departed from Heraclea, how he then said he would not oppose his marriage with this Princess: I remember it very well, said he, but when I said so, it was with this condition, that he should go in the head of an Ar|my to conquer two Kingdoms, and save me that labour; but since he has not performed the condition, tell him, that as it was then dishonorable for the Princess Araminta to marry the son of a Slave, so now at this time it is a shame for him to marry a Sister of a conquered us|urper, and the slave of Arsamones, as e're long she shall be; therefore tell him from me, that within these few dayes I will come unto the Camp my self; and because it will grieve him too much to captivate her whom he values above two Crowns, let him attempt nothing against Cabira until I come my self, bid him endeavour to overcome himself, or otherwise he shall know the difference between a Scepter and a prison. You may imagine Sir, how sadly Democ|ides carried this answer. The Queen did write unto the prince her son to comfort him, the princess Aristeia did the like; But oh heavens, how in vain were all consolations? Democides under|stood at his coming away from Heraclea, that Arsamones sent orders unto the Liev•enant Ge|neral his Confident, that he should keep a vigilant eye upon Spitridates; and I understood af|terwards by this Democides, that the despair of Spitridates was so great when he received this rigid answer from the King his father, as it was likely to have cost him his life; yet was he very desirous of the whole truth; and though Democides had a desire to have sweetned the answer in the relation, yet he durst not, because the King did speak it so publicly before all the world, that Spitridates would certainly have known it by others, and then he had just cause of complaint against Democides for concealing the truth, since it was that answer upon which he intended to ground all his resolutions. What (said he, after he had understood it) does the King my father intend that the princess Araminta shall be his slave? and that she who deserves a hundred Crowns, shall wear fetters? No, no, Spitridates cannot suffer it, or at the least will attempt all wayes possible to release this incomparable and unfortunate princess. Do you not admire Democides, said he, at the strange blindness of men? The King my Fa|ther has all his life complained against Usurpers, and now he is become one himself purpose|ly to make me unhappy; he, who if he please, may get unto himself immortal glory, and make me the happiest man alive, whereas now he makes me the most miserable. For Democides to have got two Kingdoms, and to keep that only which he hath a right unto; and generously to restore the other, and then to bestow the Princess Araminta upon me, these would be things which all after ages would speak on with admiration; yet since he will not, indeed he will force me to forsake his interests, though he be my Father, and my King: I must absolutely disobey him, and be all the rest of my life the most miserable Prince upon earth: But the greatest wonder is, Sir, that though ambition could never prevail against his love, yet his •ve did never excessively transport him against the King his Father: But maugre the violence Page 140 of all his sorrows, he began to contrive ways of releasing the Princess, especially since he newly received intelligence from the Princess Aristeia his Sister, that the King would be in the Army within these few days. He also perceived, that the Orders unto the Lieutenant General were very vigilantly observed: but do what he could, Spitridates was so adored by the Com|manders, and Souldiers, that he could not bring about his designe. To be short, Spitridates did publicly send unto the Princess, to tell her, that the King his Father had not yet returned an answer unto her propositions, and that within a few days he would come himself, and bring the answer. Mean while, after he had consulted with Democides how to release the Princess, he commanded him to get into the Town disguised like a Peasant, which during the cessation was no great difficulty: and that he should go unto the Castle, and enquire for me, which ac|cordingly he did: He delivered a Note unto me from Spitridates; the contents whereof was, That I should give credit unto what Democides should tell me: so then, after he had delivered it unto me in private, he acquainted me with the ill success of his voyage, with the despair of Spitridates, and his resolution to release the Princess, with the orders that he had taken about it: he told me further, that the Troops which were under his particular Command, were quartered all along the River side; That our best course would be to come out of the Town in the night by boat, and unto that place where his Troops would wait for us, and be our convoy unto Sea, which was not above fifty furlongs further, and that he had taken order for a Ship at the next Port: he t•ld me further, that to move the Princess the more to trust her self with him, Spitridates would first let her see, he trusted her; therefore, said he, if the Princess please to give orders for one of the Gates which she shall name unto me, to let him enter, he will be there at midnight with one page only, and no more. You may be sure, Sir, that I went in all possible haste unto the Princess, and carried Democides with me. Though the news was but a subject of astonishment and sorrow, yet to what purpose is complaints where there is no remedy? and therefore it was resolved upon to depart the very next night. Since all her women, were placed about her by Artanus, we cared not for carrying them with us: and since all her Captains had once been her enemies, she hardly knew whether she should trust any of them, but since they had testified much affection unto her, since the death of Ar|tanus, she was unwilling to abandon them, and leave them in the lurch unto the victory of her enemies; yet upon more consideration she conceived it best not to carry any of them with her, and that the Officers being Masters of the Town, they might make honourable conditions for themselves when they pleased: Therefore the resolution was to confide in none of them, but such as were necessary for the business; to wit, that Spitridates might enter, and we go out; But, Sir, I have already so trespassed upon your patience by the length of my relation, as I must tell you in short, that I took such order with two Captains, as they were wholly de|voted to serve the Princess in any thing whatsoever. About midnight, Spitridates stole un|discerned out of the Army, after he had left one Letter for Arsamones, and another for the Princess Aristeia, and entered into the Town; Democides conducted him unto the Princess Chamber: and kneeling down, Madam, (said he unto her) are you so generous as to suffer the son of your enemy to throw himself at your feet? and will you be pleased to receive your liberty from that Prince whose Father would make you a Slave? Liberty (said she unto him, and first desired him to rise) is so secret, that one would take it from their most mortal enemy; but Spitridates, it is not just I should purchase mine with the loss of yours: It is enough for me to escape out of the tyranny of your Father, without engaging you to share in my misfortunes: Therefore, do not charge your self with my escape; seem to be sorry for it; return unto the Camp, and live happily whilest I seek out some blind corner of the world to hide my tears, and my misfortunes in. Can you Madam, give such counsel unto a man whom you have pro|mised to honour with your esteem? And indeed, how esteem him if he should be so un|worthy as to take it? No, no, Divine Princess, either you care not what you say, or else you say this only to make trial of my constancy: But since we have no time to spend, I beseech you, Madam, let us depart, and when we have once taken Ship, then may you command what course we shall steer: as for my part, I am resolved to wait upon you over all the world: The Princess did a while refuse it, though it was but in appearance: at last, I interceded, and said unto her, I beseech you determine some way or other, the time is almost past, and Spi|tridates perhaps would be more in danger with his Father, then with you; and Democides tells me, that all things are ready for our departure.

In conclusion Sir, Spitridates presented his hand unto the Princess: we got happily out of the Castle, and Town, accompanied only with the Prince, the page he brought, Democides, and the two Captains, which were of the plot, and so took boat: Never was flight more Page 141 prosperous then this, for we met with no obstacle: The Troops which Democides command|ed, guarded us to the Sea: and Spitridates having caused a Bridg to be broke in the night, by which other Quarters had communication with Democides, so that we were very safe all the way: Democides did not expose his souldiers unto any danger, for they acted according to his orders, and it is not for souldiers to examine the Commands of their superiour Officers, but were bound to obey without any dispute, and therefore they ran no hazard. In conclusion, we came to the Ship, which waited for us, and we imbarqued, not yet knowing whi|ther to go; not thinking upon any thing but how to avoid the danger of falling into the power of Arsamones. When we were once in the open Sea, Spitridates came unto the Princess Calbin; Madam, said he unto her, you are now at liberty, and there is none here who are not most willing to obey you: Whither is it your pleasure we should steer our course? This question brought tears from the eyes of the Princess, for when she could not find any place in the world wherein she had any power, she could not chuse but fall into apprehensions of sorrow; yet recollecting her memory, she told him, how she heard that the King her Brother when he went from Heraclea, did designe for Cappadocia, and to offer himself unto Ciaxares to deliver his daughter, with intentions to demand some aid from you: and she said, that she could not think upon any other place of safety but that: then Spitridates told her, how he heard the day before from a souldier which came from that Army, that the Princess Mandana had suffered shipwrack, and was drowned, and that certainly the King of Pont was not with Ciaxares; the Princess then not knowing either what to say or do, in conclusion resolved, to get far enough off from Pontus, and Bythinia, and to make towards Cappadocia, to try whether what the souldier said was true. All that night, and the next day, we steered that way, and towards evening a violent storm did arise, which lasted all the night following: at last we were almost gravelled in a Bank of sand, but by good fortune we escaped the danger without any hurt to the Ship: There we saw the Sea even almost covered with abundance of shipwrack, and near a Rock close by us, some men that were dead, and some in whom there was some life: It was a large while before we could put out a little boat to help any of these miserable men, because the Tempest was yet very high, but after a little calm we took two of them up, who did yet breathe, and one of them I knew to be a Servant unto the King of Pontus: I no sooner saw him, but I cried out, and calling him by his name, he turned his eyes towards me, and would have answered, but could not; It was apparent enough that he knew me, for he lifted up his hands towards Heaven, as if he did deplore the misfortune of the King his Master, and seemed astonished to see me: whilst I was busie in applying such things unto him as common humanity required, some or other did very inconsiderately advertise the Princess of this accident, who would needs come to see this unfortunate man: since it was she who preferred him unto the King her Brother, he knew her voice as soon as he heard it, and when she spoke unto him, he began to strive with himself, and pronounced these words distinctly; Ah Madam, is it you? Yes, replied she, but where is the King? In Armenia, said he unto her, and sent me to bring you—In speaking these words he fell into a swoond, and expired before he could end what he begun to speak: The other man also who we brought into the Ship dyed speechless also, and we could know no more: Then did we search his clothes for Letters, and indeed did find one, but as ill luck was, the water had defaced all the characters, except two or three by which the Princess knew it to be the hand of the King her Brother. This Encounter renewed all our sorrows, and whilst they were endeavouring to get this Ship from off this Bank of Sand, the Princess grieved exceedingly, not because this man had been her slave, but because he had something to say unto her, and died before it could be known: In the mean while we got unto the open Sea, and the Princess desired Spitridates to go into an Arm of the Sea not far off, where the Lower Armenia towards Pontus does border upon a little Province, which formerly was the Kings. It is a hard task Sir, to relate unto you, all the discourse between Spitridates, and the Princess Araminta, during our Navigation: But in short, they expressed themselves unto each other in all the terms that love and vertue could invent: After we were come into this Arm of the Sea, we quitted our Ship: and Democides, whom Spitridates had ordered to take money enough for a long voyage, when he came first from his Quarters, went unto the next Town to buy horses, to carry us unto the River Euphrates; for as you know, this River divides the two Armenia's. Then was it put to the question, what course Spitridates should take when they came in Armenia: and it was a most pitiful story unto him, when the Princess said, that he must leave her; for I must confess unto you, said she unto him, that I dare not trust too much unto the generosity of the King my Brother, and though I do know him to be very generous, yet I will not adventure Page 142 you in the power of a Prince who never loved you, especially now, since you are son unto his enemy, and an enemy who hath taken two Kingdoms from him: Therefore Spitridates, since your vertue has preserved me from falling into the hands of the King your Father, it befits me to preserve you from the fury of the King my Brother: Alas, Madam, said he, let not any considerations of my interest trouble you, nor hinder me from waiting upon you: for though the King your Brother should treat me hardly, yet would I most willingly endure it for the love of you. I doubt it not at all, said she unto him, but however I desire you should only endure the miseries of absence for the love of me; for I cannot look upon you but with an eye of great esteem, and I know that the King my Brother will not relish it, because perhaps he will imagine that my complacency towards you proceeds from my hopes of two Kingdoms from Spitridates. But Madam, said he unto her, whither would you have me go? Any whither, said she, where you may with safety to your person wait for a turn of fortune: and until the heart of the King your Father be mollified. But Madam, replied he, since I most willingly forsake all for you, may you not dispense a little with that rigid Decorum which you observe in every thing? If you really love me, and think upon my passion and respects unto you, what sorrows I have suffered; what imprisonments I have endured, and what exile I now undertake for you, I conceive you will permit me to live disguised with you, or else to let us go and live together in some unknown place far from any acquaintance, where we may wait upon the pleasure of the Gods, until such times as I am in a capacity to restore one Crown unto the King your Brother, and present another unto you. What you now tell me, replied the Princess, is neither just nor honourable: for I should thereby incense the mind of the King my Brother, and you the King your Father, and we should expose our selves to a thousand unprofitable miseries. Then, suffer me, said he, to go with you unto the King of Pontus, without any disguise or banishment. Though he should be in a disposition to receive you favourably, answered she, yet certainly it would be upon a condition that you should bear Arms against the King your Father, which questionless you never will. nor will I advise you unto it; and therefore, Spitridates, of necessity you must leave me. Must I needs leave you, Madam, replied he in a sad tone? Yes, said she, and if reason will not prevail with you, I will joyn my prayers and commands unto it. And however, you may be sure of this advantage, that as my fortunes are, you need fear no Rivals. Ah Madam, cried Spitridates, in taking away of Crowns, they have not taken away your unparalleled beauty, nor your incomparable mind, which has not a second in vertue: Therefore, Madam, I must always doubt it, especially knowing that the King your Brother will be continually exasperating you against me. Look not upon Spitridates, I beseech you, Madam, as the son of an Usurper, but as a Prince who will never be King, till he can restore one Crown unto the King your Brother, and another present unto you: I have already said it, and I repeat it again: you Madam, shall either reign, and your Brother too, or else I will not: and therefore, you may if you please, be so just at the least, as to give him some assurance of your affection, who has consecrated every minute of his life unto you: Do not, I beseech you, banish me from you, before you assure me that I shall be entertained always in your heart, and that nothing can ever banish me from thence, for without this Madam, I cannot obey you. I will promise you, said she unto him to possess the King my Brother with your generosity as much as I can; and will eternally remember the Commands of the dying Prince Sinnesis, and by consequence keep my affection entirely for you, as long as I live. May I build upon this? said this sorrowful Prince, You may, replied she, and I should think my self most unjust and ungrateful if I failed, since you are so generous, and since my affection is so pure and innocent, that it were a greater crime to resist it, then preserve it for you. I know not, Madam, whether I should dare to tell you, that this is not enough. I know not, Spitridates, (said she, and interrupted him) whether I should tell you, that I think it a little too much, and that you do me wrong to suspect me, and complain. But Madam, replied he, what is it I beseech you that you do for me? and what can I do more for you? You do every thing, answered she, that I can desire, I cannot deny it; but though I do nothing for you, yet I do all I can, or may be, more then I ought, and let that satisfy you. Oh Heavens! replied he, what do you do, my Divine Princess, which I can interpret unto my advantage? I shew you, answered she, those sorrows which I cannot hide: you may see the thoughts of my soul in my eyes; and I permit you to think that my heart prefers you before all the world; and after this, Spitridates, what can you desire more? and whether is it not more then the Princess Araminta ought to do for the Son of Arsamones? However, Spitridates, take heed lest ambition be too prevalent with you during your absence, since it is usual to alter the souls of all men. To be sure of that, replied he, do not banish me from you. Page 143 would I could not, answered she, but it must be, and you must be gone: I should be too tedious, Sir, if I should repeat all this sad conference, which truly on both sides was so tender, so generous, and so full of sorrow, that I who heard it wept; for the Princess desiring, I was all the while present: It was in vain for Spitridates to use any arguments of dissuasion, for since we were got a good way into Armenia, and out of any fears of Arsamones, she would needs have him leave her; and she resolved to go either into Cilicie, or Paphlagonia, and wait there for some alterations in fortune. He had a great desire not to part until they certainly knew where the King her Brother was, but she would not hearken to him, being much afraid lest Spitridates should fall into the hands of her Brother: So he obeyed her, but never was so sad a separation: he would needs have Democides, and the two Captains, remain with her, and he keep none with him but his Page. I shall not relate every circumstance of this sad adieu, since the truth is, I cannot without tears, and so many testimonies of my weakness, as perhaps you will condemn me for it: But so it was Sir, that Spitridates departed the saddest man alive, and the Princess as melancholy as ever any in the world. Then we left the River Euphrates, and went towards Artaxates. Since the Princess did not know the intentions of the King her Brother, she desired not to be divulged for what she was until she had spoken with him, so that all the time of our travel we did not so ceremoniously render those honours which were her due. When we came to Artaxates, where we might easily conceal our selves by reason of its greatness, we were informed, that the King of Pontus had been there but every one told us he was not there at that time: The Princess could not believe it, but being grieved that the thing was known only amongst the Grandees, and that for some reason she understood not, the King her Brother desired to be received privately, and with some ceremony. In conclusion, she commanded Democides, and the other two Captains, to be diligent to get true intelligence, that those unto whom they addressed themselves for some designe: Moreover, the Prince Phaartes, Brother unto the King of Armenia, chancing accidentally to see the Princess enter into a little dark Church whither we went early in a morning, he being of his curiosity to know who that stranger was: for though our habits were after the Persian fashion, he supposed she was not an Artaxetian, because he never heard her before: so that being extremely desirous to know what she was, and where she dwelt, one of his servants to follow her: He who was employed in the business, having observed concerning us, told him, that we were people of some hidden designe, and that certain Princess was one of great quality, though we had never spoke as much; and by his report this Prince was much more earnest to know who she was. At the same time time one of the King of Armenia's Grand-officers, who lodged near us, being informed by this Prince, that there was some disguised people in Artaxates, who had some bad designe in agitation, and since all Asia almost was in Arms, and knowing how he had incensed the King of Media by refusing Tribute, he sent unto us to know who we were: At the first, we dissembled the truth, but since no credit was given unto us, and the Princess was in fear to expose herself unto some dangerous adventure, she confessed all, and told them who she was, and desired to speak with the King. But the King not being very well, he appointed the Prince Phaartes to go unto her, and to see what the matter was: Then went this Prince unto the Princess Araminta, whose beauty made a deep impression upon his soul: She told him her quality, her condition, and her business; he without any difficulty believed her, and did assure her that the King her Brother came not unto that Court: He was exceedingly civil unto the Princess, and went in all haste unto the King his Father, with intentions of moving him to treat her according to her quality: But the King who ever was of a suspicious and covetous disposition, had thoughts far different from the Prince his Sons; for he would not take any notice of her, lest she should put him to some expences, and lest he should thereby incense a prosperous Prince, as Arsamones was, by protecting the Sister of his enemy: so that notwithstanding all the alliances between the Kings of Pontus, and the Kings of Armenia, he seemed as if he suspected her, and commanded that she, and all about her should be secured: as afterwards I understood by one who was a Confident unto Phaartes: This young Prince did with all his power oppose the King his Fathers designe, but the King being desirous not to have it published, charged the Prince his Son not to speak of any thing which the Princess had said unto him; intending doubtless to serve his own ends by it upon any occasion, either by restoring her unto the King of Pontus, or unto Arsamones. The Prince Phaartes even desperate at this injurious resolution, did yet procure that we should be brought into this Castle, with Page 144 the two Captains who are here also: As for Democides, the Princess had employed him to go and enquire after news of the King her Brother, so that he was not taken as we were: You may easily imagine, Sir, the sorrows of the Princess, when she saw her Sanctuary was turned into a prison, and when she saw no possible means to get out without some extraordinary assistance from the Gods: Since then, Sir, we have been kept here, without any consolation, but from the Prince Phaartes, who often did visit the Princess; and indeed when you did take this Castle, his frequent visits began to displease; for contrary to the King his Fathers orders we were treated with so great a respect, that it was apparent he disobeyed his Father and that love had took too deep an impression in his soul. In the mean while we heard no news either of the King of Pontus, or Spitridates, or Democrides, nor heard we the King of Bylthinia so much as talked on. This Sir, is the fortune of the Princess Araminta, unto whom, if you please, we will go, since I have no more to say, but to conjure you to protect her.

You need not move me unto that (wise and discreet Hesionida, replied Cyrus) which so many reasons does invite me unto. The beauty, virtue, quality, and misfortune of this Princess, are arguments able to move the most insensible man alive to serve her, and therefore since you think it fit, let us go and tell her as much: for I can assure her, that her misfortunes are not greater than my desires to be serviceable unto her: for though she be a Sister unto a Prince who is my Rival, and who detains from me that which is incomparably most dear unto me, yet shall I be as just unto her, as she is unto Spitridates, who does not accuse Spitridates for the ambition of his Father, but knows how to put a just difference, without any prejudicated opinion. After this Cyrus gave Hesionida thanks for her great pains, in relating unto him the story of the Princess Araminta, and going unto the Chamber where she was, he saluted her with extraordinary civility. Madam, said he unto her, when I did visit you before, I knew only your quality, your beauty, and some part of your mind; but now, since I understand the whole Story, and am acquainted with the height of your soul, your virtue, and your great misfortunes; I regard you with much more reverence and admiration, than before. The last of these whereof you speak Sir, answered she, and which is the only thing that I have any pretence unto you, does not usually beget respect in the minds of men, but since you Sir, are none of the ordinary sort, I must and ought to expect miracles from you. You may expect submission and service, answered he, from all that are capable of reason. Then to let her know, that he hearkened unto her Story with an attentive ear; he repeated the most considerable passages of her misfortunes, and condoled them: Then did he exceedingly commend Spitridates, knowing that nothing is more obliging and pleasing, than to hear the party loved well spoken of, and indeed he omitted nothing which was requisite to comfort this great Princess, from whom also he hoped for some good office, whensoever she should speak with the King her Brother. After a thousand expressions of reciprocal love from both sides, he left her, and went to give necessary orders for matters of war. He was informed that Artaxates was very quiet, that all the Guards were very circumspect, and that Hidaspes, who was gone out towards the foot of the Mountains, unto which the King of Armenia was retreated, had intercepted many Carriages of Victual and Ammunition, which the Country would have carried unto the King: and afterwards retiring to his Chamber, he spent the rest of the day in memory of his dear Princess: he wondred that Ciaxares came not up; he was vexed that he could not hear any thing of the Assyrian King; he was grieved that he could not know where Mandana was: and comparing the misfortune of the Princess Araminta with his own, though hers were great, yet he thought his more insupportable. Then did he remember how Hesionida spoke of certain Persian Merchants, which had seen Spitridates near shipwrack at Chalcedonia: Then did he conclude, that from thence did the reports of his death arise, since every one said, there was such a great resemblance between the Prince and himself: and that since Spitridates had been in Persia, and afterwards in Medea, from thence did arise all the reports of his resurrection; and so his fancy passing from one thing to another, yet never forgetting to retain a pleasing apprehension of his dear Princess, he passed away almost all the night without any sleep at all, and he did think it not permissible, that he should bestow one minute of his life upon any thing whatsoever, that might exclude the passion which rained in his heart.

ARTAMENES, OR CYRUS the GREAT. The Third Part.

Book. III.

The Sun no sooner sent out his first Rayes, but Cyrus had intelligence of some Troops which appeared upon the further side of the Plain, in the way towards Artaxates: Since it was not that way which Ciaxares was to come, nor had he received any intelligence of his Advance, he imagined that perhaps, it might be some relief going unto the King of Armenia: so that he took horse, and went himself out to see who they were: he presently dispatched Orders unto all the Quarters of his Army to take heed of a surprize, and commanded them all to rendezvous: then drawing out that Troop which was next him, he went out to observe the March of these unknown forces which appeared: he had no sooner got upon a little hill, from whence one might discover all the Plain of Artaxates, from the bottom of the Chaldean Mountains as far as those where the King of Armenia was, but he espied a far off some Troops, which seemed to make a halt, whilst a party of about fifty horses only were drawn out, and came directly towards the place where Cyrus was; he no sooner observed that, but drawing out the like number of his own men under the Command of Aglatidas, he sent them to know who they were: himself staying in much impatience to observe what passed: since Aglatidas desired nothing more than any occasions to die honourably, he obeyed Cyrus with much joy: and after he had given some animating exhortations unto his men to fight gallantly, if there should be any occasion, he advanced towards them, who made towards him: when they were both of them within a flight shot one of another, and Aglatidas believing them for enemies, and prepared for fight, he saw that he who commanded this fifty horse, did let fall the Point of his Javelin, in signe of peace, and caused all those who followed him to do the like. Aglatidas being much amazed at this, kept his Javelin with his Rest, and advanced to see who it was: Then the Commander in chief, of this supposed enemy, advanced himself alone in the posture of one that would parley, and not fight: Aglatidas seeing this, sent back those which followed him, and letting the Point of his Javelin fall, he went unto him, and saw him to be a man of a most admirable Garb, wearing the most glorious Arms that ever eye beheld, and mounted upon a most goodly horse; they saluted one another very civilly, and afterwards this unknown Gallant, said unto Aglatidas, Since I do not now come to fight with you, I pray do me the favour to conduct me unto your General; and if you think these fifty horses be too many for my Guard, I will go single with you upon your word: Your generosity to trust a man you know not, replied Page 146 Aglatidas, doth let me see that I need not fear any thing, and takes away all distrust of you, and therefore if you please, you may command your men to follow mine: In the mean while Cyrus was much astonished to observe the passage, and could not possibly imagine the meaning of it: he was so unquiet at it, that he could not rest any longer in that place, but advanced some forty or fifty paces, with a party of Officers and Volunteers with extream curiosity. He saw afar off, that this stranger was very handsome: but being come nearer him, he was much more surprized to see it was the King of Assyria: This unexpected sight did make him change colour, and brought a fresh lustre into his face: and as for the King of Assyria, he no sooner saw Cyrus, but he was also much moved: yet since they were both of them infinitely generous, after Aglatidas advanced to tell Cyrus, that this stranger whom he knew not, (for he had but only one glimpse of him before upon the Tower of Sinope) desired to be conducted to him; they saluted one another with much civility: and both of them lighting from their horses, Cyrus since he was yet only the Son of a King, and the most civil of all men living, did render unto this King all the honours which could possibly be expected, as if he were yet the Master of Babylon, and a quiet Possessor of all Assyria. The King of Assyria did also pay all due civility unto Cyrus, as one that merited the Empire of all the world, and as one that was both his Deliverer, and Vanquisher: And indeed, the complements from both were so high, that it was evident they strived which should excel in civility, and it was evident, especially to such as were acquainted with their interests, that their minds had not much tranquillity in them: There appeared such a kind of fierceness in their eyes, as did discover the agitation of their souls, and such a constrainedness in all their civilities, as plainly spoke them to be Rivals, and Enemies: After they were both alighted from their horses, every one out of civility withdrew, and kept at a distance. Then (said the King of Assyria) As I have not changed my mind, in changing my name of Philidaspes, so I cannot think that you have changed your resolution in ceasing to be Artamenes: but that I shall find Cyrus to be the same Prince with whom I made Conditions on the top of the Tower in Sinope: I hope, I say, that we shall both of us go together in Quest of our Princess; that we shall fight for her; that we shall release her; and until then, we shall live together as if no difference were between; and then, in conclusion of all, I do expect that satisfaction from you which you promised, and that though your illustrious Arm has already vanquished me, yet you will not refuse to dispute this last victory with me. You have reason to believe, replied Cyrus, that I shall punctually perform all my promises, and therefore you may think your self as safe in the King of Medes Army, as if you were in the head of your own; for I am most certain, that Prince will never fail no more than I, in whatsoever he has promised. I am very sensible, replied the King of Assyria, that the Conquerour of Babylon may well think it strange, that the same Prince whom he hath vanquished both in private and publick fight, who owes his life unto him, and who has no share in the Princess Mandana's heart, should, yet after all this contend for that prize which his Conquerour does deserve, which he hath already conquered, and which she hath bestowed upon him: But yet Sir, love is all my argument: I love her, and you love her, there needs no more. And since love, not ambition, was the ground of our wars, to conquer Provinces, and Kingdoms only, is not an absolute conquest; but it must be my death only which will com|pleat your victory, and permit you to enjoy the fruits of it without any molestation. Questionless, replied Cyrus, it was not ambition which spurred me up unto this war; and I wish with all my heart that you were Master of Babylon again, so the Princess Mandana had not been carried away: I wish that giddy fortune had never put me to the necessity of making my self happy, by the ruins of so great a Prince as you: but since the case is upon these terms, let us think no more upon it: not of any thing else, but releasing our Princess, and putting her into a condition to take the Vanquisher, and lament the Vanquished: Let us, I say, perform such glorious acts for her deliverance, that we may both of us render our selves worthy of her esteem, and compassion: for knowing your valour, as I do, (said Cyrus with much modesty) I ought rather to expect her compassion, then her affection, after your defeat; but said he, I would it were come to that, since we cannot know where the Princess Mandana is. The King of Assyria did condole with Cyrus at the bad news, and rendring an account of all his actions, he told him, that in his departure from Pteria, he went unto a Province in his Dominions, which lies along the River Euphrates, and confines upon Armenia, that there he had raised some forces, which with some fresh Levies in other places, amounted to the number of twelve thousand men: Cyrus also out of his high generosity, rendred an account unto him in a concise manner, of the state of all things: and after that the King of Assyria told him that all his forces were to be ordered according to his Commands, Cyrus for a while refused it, yet in the end, Page 147 he took all necessary care for their encampment, and appointed them their Quarters. After this, these two illustrious Rivals took horse, and went towards the Castle where the Princess Araminta lodged, as if they were the best friends upon Earth, without any difference at all betwixt them: In the way, Cyrus shewed his Army as they stood in Battalies unto the King of Assyria; shewed him also their several Quarters, and the Mountains unto which the King of Armenia was retreated. Both of them did sigh very oft; for love and jealousy, hatred and grief, did so discompose their minds, that they stood in need of all their magnanimity to keep themselves within those limits of civility which they had prescribed. The King of Assyria told Cyrus, how he heard the King of Lidia was arming himself without any cause, knowing that it was neither in behalf of Ciaxares nor himself.

Thus, discoursing upon several subjects, especial upon their hopes to hear more of the Princess Mandana upon the King of Armenia's taking, they came at the last to the Castle, where Cyrus having given orders to make the best Chamber in it ready for the King of Assyria, he left him in it, and went out to take care of all things expedient unto their Design. The sight of this Rival did so freshly revive all the differences which had passed between them when he was only Philidaspes, that he longed to be alone in his Chamber, and therefore with none but Feraulas he went thither: Is it not enough (said he unto this dear Confident of his passion) that I should be separated from her I love above my life, but that I must be tormented with his presence, whom I hate even unto death? and yet generosity commands me to suspend all my resentments, and civilly to comply with my most mortal enemy: Yet were I assured the divine Mandana would one day recompence me for this violence I do unto my self, I should have some consolation. For my part, said Feraulas, I conceive you may rather expect a chiding then any thanks from the Princess, for promising the King of Assyria to fight with him, after you have released her. Oh I wish to the Heavens, replied Cyrus, it came to that; No, no, Fortune, I desire no other favor at thy hands, but to assist me in releasing my Princess, and so let me meet my inveterate enemy with a sword in my hand: commit all the rest unto my valour and my love; for as gallant as he is I hope for victory: But alas, in the mean time I am all fury; the fight of my old enemy Philidaspes revives all my jealousy and hate: The King of Pont also, who loved me before he knew I was his Rival, triumphs over all my hopes; Perhaps, I say, he has not only the happiness of seeing her, but hath gained her heart, and obtained his pardon: so that since he did not, like Philidaspes, ravish her away, but save her from shipwrack, she cannot look upon him as an injurious Ravisher: however he is no less culpable in my eyes; so that which way soever I look, I see none but the Ravishers of Mandana to punish: yet alas, I see them but asar off, since I must not fall upon the King of Assyria, and since I know not where the King of Pontus is. Amidst these thoughts Aglatidas entered, and brought Artaban unto him, who came from Sinope, and assured Cyrus, that within these two days the whole Army would be come up before Artaxates: Cyrus did gladly receive him, both because his news did please him, and because he was a friend unto Aglatidas. He enquired very affectionately concerning the health of Ciaxares, the Kings of Phrygia and Heriania, and of all the rest in the Army. After this, conceiving it fit to acquaint the King of Assyria and the Princess Araminta with this news, he prepared to go unto them, bidding Aglatidas very sweetly to make his friend welcome, But (said he, addressing himself unto Artaban) grieve him not with any stolries of Amestris, for his own passion, without the addition of new misfortunes, torments him enough. I should be very sorry Sir (replied Artaban) not to obey you in all things; but I told him as we were coming hither, how that fair Lady was not in a very happy condition: and I told him also how Ottanus would not accept of the Government in the Province of the Arisantines, which you would have conferred upon him. Would not Ottanus (replied Cyrus in great amazement) accept of a thing so advantageous for him? what may be his reason for it? I know not that, Sir, answered he; I, but I am certain he hath left Ecbatan, and when I came from thence reports were, that he came into Artaxates, so that if this be true, he is certainly upon the Mountains where the King of Armenia is. If it be so, said Cyrus unto Aglatidas, perhaps we shall release Amestris before Mandana: for it is to be supposed, that Ottanus having committed so base an act, as to side with the enemies of his Prince, and a Prince too who had honored him with a Government so much above his desert, he will perish and dye there: which if he do (added he, and smiled) Aglatidas must go and comfort Amestris. I do not know (replied that sad Lover) whether or no I shall be able to comfort others, but I am most certain that I have had a long time need of consolation my self. After this, he thanked Cyrus for his tenderness over him, and waiting upon him as far as the Princess Araminta's Chamber, he went to entertain his dear friend Artaban with more freedom then before, and Page 148 to enquire more particularly of him concerning Amestris. Mean while, after Cyrus had acquainted the Princess Araminta with the King of Assyria's arrival, and with the news of Ciaxares his advance, he went unto the Chamber of his Rival, whose mind was altogether as turbulent as the mind of Cyrus, who in all likelihood could never hope for the happiness of being beloved, although he should deliver Mandana, and vanquish Cyrus: nor though he did flatter up himself with hopes in the Oracles, yet could he never pretend to have any other satisfaction then revenge upon him: However, since love and hope are inseparable Companions, he sometimes fancied that this his illustrious Rival should be no sooner out of the world, but he should possess his place: yet these fancies did quickly vanish, and he did more often imagine, maugre all his oraculous assurance from Heaven, that as soon as he had killed Cyrus, he should then be more hated then before: These were the imaginations of that Prince when Cyrus came into his Chamber, to acquaint him with the news which Artaban brought. After he had stayed a quarter of an hour with him, consulting what Quarters those Troops which he brought should have in the morning, he left him and went to give orders for it, and many other things.

Mean while the King of Assyria, after he had sent to ask the permission of Cyrus, went to visit the Princess Araminta: In the mean while also Cyrus sent unto several Guards which he had placed, that they should not be surprized or amazed when they saw the Troops of Ciaxares advance. He sent also into Artaxates, appointing them to prepare the King of Armenia's Palace for Ciaxares, and the Princess Araminta: for since the whole Army was to be joyned, he thought it expedient to make sure as well within the Town as without. He was also informed by Araspes, that Hidaspes and Chrisantes had defeated some Troops which the Prince Phaartes had sent out into the Plain to forrage for victuals. After all this he retired unto his Chamber, and, as usually he did, passed over the night without a wink of sleep. In the morning he went to visit the quarters of Hidaspes and others; and the day following that, he would go meet Ciaxares, and carry the King of Assyria with him: These two Princes then took horse; Thrasibulus, some Voluntiers, and two hundred Horses only waited upon them: and after he had caused the Assyrian Troops to advance, and ranked them in Battalia with the rest, to receive Ciaxares with the more ceremony, he sent Araspes before, that he might prepare the King to meet with the King of Assyria; not but that he knew Ciaxares would keep promise since he had passed it, but because he always used to observe order and decorum in all things. After some three hours march they discovered clouds of dust to arise from the ground, caused by the march of the Army: Presently after, they met: and he came up to that Regiment where Ciaxares was, with the King of Phrigia. As soon as the Souldiers saw Cyrus, they began to shout with such great acclamations of Joy, that it may well be said they forgot Ciaxares was there. Cyrus beckened unto them with his hand, and with great modesty made signs unto them to be silent, to march, and keep their ranks; he refused these honors with such a kind of obliging smile, as spoke him neither pleased or angry at it. The King of Assyria heard all these acclamations with much perplexity, though he would not shew it: and at last they met Ciaxares in a place where he was lighted from his horse to refresh himself, and to see those Troops drawn out, which he intended should march first unto Artaxates. As soon as Cyrus discovered him under the Trees, he advertised the King of Assyria, so that lighting from their horses some twenty paces off, they went up unto him. Our invincible Hero went some three paces before the King of Assyria, with intentions to present him unto Ciaxares; but do what he could the King embraced him first, and afterwards saluted the King of Assyria very civilly, telling him, that though he had been the cause of all his troubles, yet it was just he should in some sort repair those incivilities done unto Philidaspes, with the respects which they would render unto the King of Assyria. Sir, replied this Prince, if I have trespassed against you, Fortune hath sufficiently punished me for it; not that I think the loss of my Crown comparable to the loss of the Princess Mandana: my intentions are to bring the last unto you, without asking you the other; and I come into your Army with resolution to hazard my life for your service: If the propitious Fate of your Arms had left me a greater number of Subjects, I should have brought you a greater aid; But since all are become yours, I hope you will accept of these twelve thousand men which now I bring, as well as if they were a hundred thousand, since they are all I have. Ciaxares returned a very civil answer unto him. After this, Thrasibulus, and others of quality who came from the Camp, saluted Ciaxares, and gave Cyrus time to bestow a Complement upon the King of Phrigia, upon whom the King of Assyria did cast a malicious eye, remembering him as one that changed sides, and forsook him. After this, Ciaxares taking Cyrus aside, whilst the King of Assyria was in discourse with Thrasibulus, he commended Page 149 him for all he had done, and grieved with him, that they could not yet hear of Mandana: Cyrus rendered a short and pithy account of all the Armenian Affairs since he came into it, and of the present state of every thing: After which taking horse, and giving the right hand unto the Assyrian King as unto the greatest Prince of the world, they went unto the great Town of Artaxates; near which Cyrus by orders from Ciaxares did draw up all his huge Army into Battalia, that the people seeing it, might still continue in better obedience, and that the King of Armenia discovering it from the Mountains, might sooner think upon rendring himself: Mean while Cyrus sent all those Troops which he brought first to guard the Palace where the King was to quarter: he sent others also to keep Courts of Guard in other publique places, and Ports of the Town. And when all was thus ordered, Ciaxares entred into Artaxates with those who were ordered to quarter in it; leaving the main Body of his Army to quarter all along the River Araxes, which runs through the midst of that great Plain: The next morning Cyrus moved Ciaxares that he would be pleased to permit the Princess Araminta to come from the Castle where she was unto Artaxates, that she might be well used, although she was sister unto the Ravisher of Mandana: Ciaxares consented; so that he went, and conducted her into the Town, where Ciaxares did visit her, and at the request of Cyrus rendered her all the honour that was due unto her quality: She was lodged in a Palace by her self, which formerly belonged unto the Prince Tigranes, for Cyrus did alter his former intentions, and ordered it so; because he thought that to be more convenient for her, by reason she would be there at more freedom. This Prince likewise treated those two Captains which came with her very civilly; and omitted nothing that either Reason, civility or generosity required: The King of Phrigia also did visit this Princess, remembering still the friendship that was between him and the King her brother, though now they were on opposite sides, and confirming her in that high esteem which she had already entertained of Cyrus. The day after, the Reer-guard came up, under the Conduct of the Hircanian King, which was quartered also in the same Plain of Artaxates: This Prince not desiring to lodg in the Town, more then Cyrus, who since the Army came up lay always in the field; and so did the King of Assyria, who, according to his old custom, could not endure his Rival should out-do him in any thing. Mean while a Councel of War was called to consult whether they should content themselves with stopping all victuals from the Enemy, or whether they should enforce the King of Armenia out of those Mountains which seemed absolutely inaccessible: The King of Assyria, though he had been vanquished and an enemy, yet had his voyce in Councel: But though Cyrus and he had both of them jealous thoughts one of another, and ever had a secret hatred and spirit of contradiction in every thing, yet in this they were both of one opinion, and were the only two which voted to force the King of Armenia out of those inaccessible Mountains: Not that they saw any great reason for their opinions; but since it concerned Mandana, and since they gave their votes in presence of one another, they both of them aimed at the highest difficulties, and the most hazardous for themselves. All that Hidaspes reported from the Armenian Souldiers whom they took prisoners, and related their Prince had not victuals to subsist many days, was in vain; and they answered unto that, how it was not wisdom to give credit unto reports, since it is common for prisoners to flatter their Conquerors with some advantageous tales in hopes to be better used. When it was objected, that these Mountains were inaccessible, and that by rolling down great stones only, six thousand men might easily defend themselves against six hundred thousand; when they could not contradict this objection, nor belye their own eyes, then they said, that it must indeed be confessed some men would be lost, yet the dishonor and shame to have so great an Army at the foot of these Mountains, and attempt nothing, would be ballanced with it: That there was a great necessity of knowing where the Princess Mandana was, and to be satisfied, there was as great a necessity of taking the King of Armenia presently, and not to linger out the time till famine force him out of his sanctuary. That, whilst they were busie in guarding only the passages and adventures unto these Mountains, perhaps the people of both Armenia's were uniting themselves, and gathering into a vast Body, which might find them more difficulties to overcome then this, and therefore for these Reasons their opinions were to enforce these Mountains. But although the opinion of Cyrus did always use to lead the rest at other times, yet it did not so now: for all with one consent knowing certainly the King of Armenia had but scant of victuals, and seeing that at fewest thirty thousand men must needs perish in the attempt, did resolve only to stop all passages; to repulse all those that made any sallies out of the Mountains, and to invite them unto it, to seem sometimes as if they would make assaults in several quarters: They conceived it not just to let such a vast number of people to perish for want of a little patience, especially since they had no certainty that the Princess Page 150 Mandana was in the place. This advice being generally to be pursued, no more was to be done, but to keep most strict Guards round about the mountains, and to find out all the blind paths and by-ways.

The next morning, Ciaxares would take a view of the Assyrian Troops, in Battalia by themselves, which now they had mingled with the rest, as being all of one side: Mean while, this Siege without a Town, was not so idle a business as Cyrus did imagine it, for since the Prince Phaartes was very gallant, and since love was a spur unto his valour, he began to bestir himself, though during the first days, he was sick with grief at his Fathers losses, and that the Princess Araminta was in the hands of his enemies. As he was well versed in all the by-ways of these mountains, he would sometimes come and send us a shower of Arrows, and so vanish in a moment, that none could know what was become of him: Sometimes he would come in the night unto the foot of the mountains, by such blind ways through the Rocks where none but Armenians could come, and give an Alarm unto all the Camp; and since he had very good Spies in the Army of Ciaxares, he always made his Sallies on that side where Cyrus was not, for the valour of this Prince was most terrible unto all the Armenians. But since Cyrus was not used to be surprized, not surprize others, he resolved every night to go into severall Quarters, in hopes to meet with this almost invisible enemy, who would never fall upon his side, and who he knew to be the Prince Phaartes by some prisoners which he had taken. Upon such a design as this which Cyrus had, the King of Assyria would be sure to make one, as well as other particular friends of Cyrus. Thrasibus, Aglatidas, Araspes, Persodes, Gadates, Gobrias, Megabises, Hidaspes, Thimocrates, Leontidas, Philocles, Adusias, Chrisantes, Feraulas, and many others were then with him: After they had waited several nights in vain, at the last it happened one night that Phaartes having no intelligence in what Quarter Cyrus was, and having a designe to send out a Captain disguised in the habit of a Peasant, unto Tigranes his Brother, he happened to descend from the mountains on that side, where Cyrus lay in ambush with six hundred men, which he had culled out for that purpose: yet he had placed himself so, that Phaartes taking a little path upon his left hand, could not come unto the foot of the mountains, but that which at the first seeing did anger him, was afterwards his advantage; for when Phaartes with half his men was past the foot of the mountains, Cyrus did immediatly step between him, and his retreat, and perceiving that there was abundance of men amongst the Rocks as well as in the plain, he could not tell in which of those two the Prince Phaartes was; so that to be sure of meeting with him, he divided his men, the one half to assault those who were in the Rocks, and the other half to pursue those in the plain, who seeing their Retreat cut off, endeavoured to find out another; but Cyrus pursued them very close, whilst the King of Assyria did scuffle with them among the Rocks: The Heavens was very serene and clear, and the Stars did give a splendent luster, so that this nights combate proved very sharp, and bloody: Thrasibulus and Aglatidas did do wonders in seconding the valour of Cyrus, who sound no small resistance from those he fought with: for the Prince Phaartes being there, did desperately defend himself, and did things worthy of eternal memory, yet being wounded in the right arm, and left hand, so that he could not hold his sword, he endeavoured to save him|self: Then he fell off, being followed by fifteen or twenty of his men, whilst the rest kept their ground, and unperceived by Cyrus, or any of his men, he got into a little valley, wherein did fall a very rapid Torrent from the height of the mountains; there Phaartes h-d himself, hoping that when the Combate was ended, and the Troops of Cyrus drawn off, he might then perhaps get into his rocky way again. In the mean time, all the rest of his men were cut all in pieces, and Cyrus finding no resistance, went to see what the King of Assyria had done: he found him very busie with his enemies, who did not flye according to their old custom, because they knew that the Prince Phaartes was engaged: yet at the last, hoping he might gain some other Pass whereby to retreat, they retired unto a Pass, beyond which it was not possible to follow them; for as it was so narrow that two men might make head against an hun|dred thousand. After that they had done all that was possible, and were thinking upon a retreat, Cyrus enquired concerning all his friends, whom in the obscurity of night he could not dis|cern: Aglatidas being next, told him that he heard the name of Ottanus used in the Combate. I heard more then you, said Cyrus, for I heard one cry, Ottanus is dead; as Aglatidas was about to answer, intelligence came to Cyrus, that some of the enemy had rallied together in a little valley, so that he went immediately thither; But Phaartes, (for it was he they meant) being advertised of their coming, by a souldier whom he had set sentinal at the advenue of the valley, and finding himself disabled from fighting with any, and also considering the little num|ber of his men, and they all wounded as well as himself, commanded them, to throw down Page 151 their Arms, and follow him, chusing rather to trust unto the generosity of his enemy, then to a feeble resistance, which could do him no good: and since he was disabled from fighting, he thought it less shame to render himself unto a gallant enemy, then to flie, <◇> let himself be killed without resistance: All his men obeying him, he went unto a passage where he expected his enemy to come; and since the Moon shined very bright, and objects might well be dis|cerned; Cyrus was no sooner in sight, but one of his men knowing him, because he had been with Tigranes at Sinope, did shew Phaartes which was he: This Prince then cried out, with a most generous boldness, so loud as he thought he might be understood: Whither art thou going Cyrus? doest thou not know, that it is not glorious to overcome at all times? Suffer thy self sometimes to be vanquished, and be assured that being overcome after that manner, thy victory will be more noble then if thou wert a Conquerour, and at this time there will be more honour in the triumph of thy clemency, then of thy courage and valour. Cyrus upon this stood still, and turning towards Chrisantes, who stood next him, said smilingly unto him, I see there is nothing more ingenious then ill fortune, nor any thing more witty then necessi|ty: and how much more wisely and eloquent we speak when we are conquered, then who we are Conquerours: after this, holding out his hand unto this disarmed enemy, whom yet he knew not; Assure thy self (said he unto him) thou shalt receive no harm from me, and who soever thou art, I will render thee any service in my power, even so far as to give thee thy li|berty; for it is my custom to take them only for enemies, who are in a condition to defend themselves. Phaartes being charmed with the high generosity of Cyrus, said unto him, I do not wonder at all that the Gods should so continually give victory unto a Prince who knows so wel how to use it, and I wonder less at the extream affection which the Prince Tigranes my Bro|ther had unto the most Illustrious Artamenes. Cyrus knowing by these words, that it was the Prince Phaartes, he embraced him most civilly, and perceiving him wounded, he command|ed horses to be fetched in all haste to carry this wounded Prince speedily unto some place where he might be dressed; For generous Prince, said he unto him, the mountains may perhaps be dangerous for you, considering the state you are in: The horses being brought, Cyrus com|manded them to aid the Prince Phaartes, and two souldiers to lead his horse, because he was not able to hold the bridle by reason of his wounds. When he was gone, Cyrus missing Thra|sibulus, enquired concerning him, and they told him, that he stayed with a wounded enemy, who rendred himself unto him: Feraulus said further, that after the fight was ended, he cau|sed this prisoner to be carried by souldiers to the Camp, and he himself followed. Since the place where now they were was not far off from the place where the Prince did quarter, they went unto his Tents, and placed the Prince Phaartes in one of the most magnificent Pavilions; causing the Chyrurgions which were in the Tent of Thrasibulus to be called, for Cyrus him|self would see him dressed: Mean while he sent Feraulus unto Ciaxares to inform him of all passages. The wounds of the Prince Phaartes being found to be more painful then dangerous, the Chyrurgions said, that there was no danger, if he escaped a fever; to prevent which, it was requisite for him to rest all that night, and a good part of the next morning. Cyrus then retired as well as the King of Assyria, though it went much against his mind to depart before he had asked him concerning the Princess Mandana, which considering the condition Phaart|es was in, he durst not mention, but reason at this time ruled above his love, and Cyrus re|solved to wait some certain hours for a satisfaction of his desires: Mean time, since Thrasibulus yet appeared not, and since he understood the Chyrurgions had been in his Tent, he asked them, whom they dressed there? They answered him, that they had dressed a very handsome man, who was in great danger of death, and who told Thrasibulus an hundred obliging Stol|ries: That Thrasibulus was very much perplexed for him, and that without all doubt he was a man of quality. Cyrus sent to ask who it was, but Thrasibulus leaving his wounded prisoner at rest, according to the orders of the Chyrurgions, came himself to relate the adventure. Cyrus no sooner saw him, but he saw melancholy in his face, and asked him very obligingly, how he did: What, generous Prince, said he unto him, are you so unfortunate as to wound a friend in lieu of an enemy? Sir, said he unto him again, to make you understand the whole ad|venture: It is requisite I relate the whole Story of my life, it being impossible otherwise, to com|prehend the aversness of my Destiny: for, Sir, when I shall tell you that he who is now your prisoner, and wounded in my Tent, is Son unto the wise Pittacus, Prince of Mytelenes, whose name is Tissander, then you will doubtless know that he is Son unto one of the prime men of all Greece. I have long desired, said Cyrus, to know the life of that Prince, who hath taught me to overcome my self, and I am much indebted unto your valour; but illustrious Thrasibul|us, I have been so busied with my own misfortunes, since you came to Sinope, that now I have Page 152 no mind to desire the relation of yours; yet prepare your self ere long for the relation of it, and in the mean time go and rest your self, and take care of your wounded prisoner, who cut of my affection to you I know not whether I should love or hate; and if some Conference which I am to have with the Prince Phaartes concerning the Princess Mandana, do not drive me into absolute despair, and deprive me of my reason by depriving me of all hopes, I shall then hold an hour or two in discourse with you in private. Thrasibulus then thanked him for his good|ness, and retired; leaving this Prince at liberty to lie down upon his bed for two or three hours, to recover his weariness; his sleep was not over quiet, for his impatience to speak with Phaartes did so torment him, that he could take no rest: He sent above twenty times, to know whether he was awake, and how he did of his wounds, but still the answer was, he was asleep. But desiring to see him before the King of Assyria came unto him, he went him|self to visit him, and came just as he waked, so that he and the Physicians and Chyrurgeons en|tered together, they found him very well, so that after he was dressed, they permitted him to perform his Complement unto Cyrus for his great care of him, not forbidding him to talk, as they did the night before. Sir, said Phaartes unto him, if you treat your Enemies thus, how would you treat your Friends? You may know that by your self, answered Cyrus, if you will; for if you will sincerely tell me where the Princess Mandana is, you will oblige me to be your Friend. I should be extremely glad to satisfie your curiosity, if I could, replied Pha|artes, but I do profess before all the Gods whom we adore, that I know not where she is; and to make it evident that I am sincere, I will not say with the same confidence, that the King my father knows not, because since he is a Prince who doth not use to impart matters of State unto any, he may know more of it then I do: But Sir, if you dare take the word of an Enemy, permit me to go as soon as I am able unto the King my father, and after I have employed all my ingenuity to discover the truth, I will return and give you a sincere relation of it. Generous Prince, replied Cyrus, you need not pass your word, for you are absolutely free, and may do what you please, for I serve a King who uses to make good all the promises which I make: so that when it is your pleasure to return unto the King your father, you may; but if the prayers of an Enemy have any prevalency with you, I do conjure you to move the King of Armenia to impart all he knows concerning the Princess Mandana, and not to force Ciaxares to ruine him: Perchance you have seen how potent his Army is from the tops of your Moun|tains, so that I hope both reason, sense, and generosity will induce you to satisfie my demands. Phaartes then obliged himself by a hundred protestations of sincerity and freedom, and told him, that if the Chyrurgeons thought expedient he would be carried the next morning, though he would not accept of that favour which Cyrus offered, to release him absolutely. But, said he further unto him, that you may give more credit unto my words, I will trust you with a secret which much concerns my life, which is, Sir, that you have in your keeping a Princess who hath the same influence upon the heart of Phaartes, that Mandana has upon the generous Cyrus: so that having a pawn so dear and precious unto me, you may well expect that fide|lity from me, which very few enemies would pay unto those they fight with. As they were thus in conference, intelligence was brought unto Cyrus, that Ciaxares and the King of Phrigia, who also lodged in the Town, were coming to the Camp; so that he went from Phaartes to meet them: Just as the King of Assyria was entering, having some curiosity to enquire of the Princess Mandana, Cyrus blushed, and in short related the answer of Phaartes unto him, so that they went both together to meet Ciaxares, who gave them both very high commendations, but so, that it was easie to see he put a great difference between them. Cyrus gave him an account of all his Conference with Phaartes, and beseeched him that he might be treated as he had promised, which Ciaxares easily condescended unto, conceiving indeed that it was easier to come unto the knowledge of the truth by the mediation of that Prince, then any other way: So that Ciaxares gave Cyrus full power to transact that business, and every thing else, as he himself thought best expedient, without making any ad|dresses unto him for advise; and after he had bestowed a visit upon Phaartes and Tisander, he returned unto Artaxates. In the mean while Aglatidas, who thought he heard the name of Ottanus mentioned in the fight, and who understood from Cyrus, that Ottanus was said to be dead, went to see the Prince Phaartes, and beseeched him to resolve him, whether it was true that Ottanus was engaged in his quarrel, and out in the last Combat: Phaartes told him both were true, and that he beleevved he perished the last night, because he heard one cry in the heat of Combat, that Ottanus was dead: Aglatidas understanding this, desired Artaban who knew him, to enquire more certainty of it, during the two hours of truce which was agreed upon, for the fetching off their dead, and which indeed the Enemy did Page 153 desire, principally to see whether Phaartes could be found amongst them. Artaban then went along with those whom Cyrus sent to bring off the bodies of some ten or twelve of his Souldiers which fell in the fight, seeming to look for an Officer and Friend of his who was missing: He searched very narrowly amongst all the dead; but though he did not find the body of Ottanus amongst them, yet was he able to carry back most certain news of his death: for amongst those who carried off their dead, there came also a servant of Ottanus who Artaban knew, and who searching for his Master close by that Torrent which falls from the Mountains into the little valley where Phaartes was retreated, he began suddenly to cry out: Artaban came to him, and there saw amongst some Rocks which stood in the water, a dead man, yet could not discover his face; yet by the rest of his body, clothes, and very remark|able Arms, the servant knew it to be his Master Ottanus: he saw also, that his shoulder which lay out of the water was all bloody, and therefore concluded him to be wounded: yet since this Torrent was so rapid and deep, it was very difficult to come unto the place where the corps was, which stuck upon the point of a Rock: They sent for long poles where with to draw him out, but none could be found long enough to reach him; and no other invention could be del|vised; for it was too deep to wade, and too rapid to swim: yet whilst they were inventing some new way to draw off this corps, a great gush of water fell from the Rocks upon that point which stopped him, and then the impetuous Torrent did gulf him into the bottom of the water, and there was he buried. After this, Artaban returned to the Camp with cer|tain news of Ottanus his death, since his eyes were witnesses of it, it being imaginable, that as he fled with the rest into this little valley, he fell into this Torrent, and there perished; at the least it was the imagination of Artaban, for all the other men were of a hundred opinions contrary to one another. All those who knew the Interest that Aglatidas had in the death of this man, did rejoyce at it; but as for himself, he was too wise, and too well accustomed unto sorrows, to pass so suddenly from melancholy to joy: all he said was, that he was not very sor|ry for the death of him who was a Tyrant unto Amestris, and by consequence that she was rid of him: Yet Megabises, who upon the same reason should have been glad also, was very sad at it, because he thought it would become the happiness of Aglatidas: so that though he thought never to have loved Amestris again, yet he found that he loved her still, by the renewing of his secret hate unto Aglatidas; yet he durst not manifest it, for Cyrus did so tenderly affect him, that it was a capital crime to be his declared Enemy. All this while Thrasibulus was with Tisander, whom the Chyrurgeons found to be in a better state. The Prince Pha|artes also did much mend upon it, so that he desired Cyrus he might go the next morning unto the King his father, and acquit himself of his Commission: Yet Cyrus would needs have him carried in a Litter, and so, that very morning on which the King of Armenia sent to see the Prince his son, he was conducted by a Guard of two hundred Souldiers unto the first Guards of the Armenian King, with whom Cyrus renewed the Truce, until the Prince Phaartes re|turned with his Answer. During this short interval, in which Cyrus hoped for a clear satisfaction of his desires, he payed all due civilities unto every one: He went unto Artaxates to wait upon Ciaxares, and there he visited the Princess Araminta, and related unto her all that Phaartes had said concerning her, and what had passed between them, which she harkened unto not without some blushes: She gave Cyrus thanks for the liberty he had given Phaartes, but it was after such a manner, that he might know she rather thanked him for delivering her from all new expressions of his affection which he would have rendered her whilst he had con|tinued a prisoner, then for any love she bore him, though she did esteem him very much. After this, Cyrus returned unto the Camp again, contemplating always upon his dear Princess, or discoursing either with Aglatidas, or Feraulas, or Chrisantes, in whom he put much confidence: He loved Araspes very well, yet since he never had been in love, he never spoke unto him concerning his passion: When he was come into the Camp, he went immediately unto the Tent of Thrasibulus, where since he was at leisure, he intended to pass that day and part of the night in hearing a relation of what he desired so much to know. As soon as he went thither, he expressed his desires of being alone with Thrasibulus, so that every one did leave him the liberty of Conference; and as soon as Cyrus saw this opportunity, he said very obligingly unto him; Well, my old Conqueror, said he, will you suffer your self to be over|come, and acquaint me with all the circumstances of that life which as far as I know of it is most glorious? You will not say as much of the rest when you know it, replied Thrasibulus and sighed; for Sir, you will only find two things in it; that is, much weakness, and much misfortune: Yet since it is your pleasure to have it so, and since indeed it concerns the present condition of my affairs that you know it, therefore I shall very exactly obey you: But can you Page 154 endure Sir, the relation of so many trivial passages, which must needs be very impertinent unto you, and indeed very inconsiderable unto any who knows not what belongs to love? Praise them not, trivial and inconsiderable, replied Cyrus, when they concern my friends, and when my dear Thrasibulus, (said he, and sighed also) I am not ignorant of that misery where|of I think you complain; tell it therefore, I conjure you, and know that I have leisure enough to hear it, though it take up all the day, and night also: for since there is a truce with the King of Armenia, I have little other employment, and since nights are but tedious, and restless unto me. Thrasibulus then seeing his opportunity, and knowing that it was requisite Cyrus should be acquainted with his past adventures, considering the present condition of his fortune, was most willing to obey him; and taking their seats, he began thus.

The History of THRASIBULUS, and ALCIONIDA.

HAD I a Soul as sensible of ambition as love; I do not think it had been possible to endure all those misfortunes which have fallen upon me: But since I ever thought it a greater glory to merit Crowns, then possess them; I stood in need of all my constancy, since I was not tormented with that proud passion, which has razed and ruined all the Monarchies, and Re|publiques in the world. And though I am sensible of the loss of that Sovereignty which bellonged unto me, yet did I not give my self over unto despair and sorrow for it, but only as this loss was an obstacle unto my love: so that it may almost be said, I never was sensible of ambition until I began to be in love. But to acquaint you Sir, with those miseries I have suffered both in my fortune, and in my love, Give me leave to tell you, that I am the Son of Thra|sibulus, Prince of Miletus, whose name I bear, who as long as he lived was an intimate friend of Periander, King of Corinth, and whose name was very notable as long as he lived, for the wars which waged for eleven years together against Sadiattes, the little son of Giges, and against Alliates, father of Craessus, which he finished with too much good fortune, wisdom, and ho|nour, to be related in a few words, and since that which followed after was the foundation of all my miseries. This war, Sir, was the more considerable, since it was begun during the Reign of Giges, when he usurped the Crown from Heraclidus: for since that Ardis who succeeded him, did keep it from him, as likewise Sadiattes his Son after him, and as now Alliates does the same. The Prince my father, then being very busie in the beginning of his Reign to establish in his house that Sovereign Authority which belonged unto him: he could not during the first years of his War against Sadiattes, with all the forces he had resist him, because he had many enemies within the Town; and not daring to go out of it, left in his absence a seditious party should gather to a head in it, Sadiattes was absolute Master of the field, and continued his wars for six years together, in a very strange manner: for without making any attempts against the Town, he brought every year in the Harvest time a very vast Army of Foot into the Millesians Countrey, and without any burning of houses, or destroying Towns, he only carried away all their corn, and fruits, and stayed no longer in the Countrey. Since my father was stronger at Sea, he saw it was in vain to attempt any thing against Miletus, since it could not be famished: but his hopes were, that the Milesians being forced to buy their corn of stran|gers, and money growing scant amongst them, then they would revolt from their Prince: But for all this, my father would not draw out of the Town, until such time as he saw himself absolute Master of his people, saying, That the Sea would bring him corn, when as nothing would bring him Miletus if it were once lost. Afterwards when by fears he had made the people abso|lutely to submit unto him, he drew into the field presently after the death of Sadiattes, and the new King of Lidia made war after another manner. The Prince my Father, without the as|sistance of any, unless them of the Isle of Chios, (who remembered the aids which he lent them when the Erithreans made war upon them) was in a condition to fight that famous Battel of Limenia, and afterwards that upon the Banks of the River Meander, where with his own hand he killed the Prince of Phocians Son. And since these two battels were bloody unto both sides, and the victory dubious, they gave a stop unto the progress of Alliates, who despairing of absolute victory, according to his hopes, did upon his return set fire unto a great field of corn, whose flames did not only consume the corn, but by the greatness of the wind did set the Temple of Minerva on fire, and entirely consumed it. This sad accident did trouble the people of Miletus, more then it did the King of Lidia. But within a while after, that Prince falling sick, and sending to consult with the Oracle of Delphos, the Pithian told the Lidiens, that she would return them no answer, until they had rebuilt the Temple of Minerva which they had burned. Periander, who knew of this answer, sent to advertise the King my Father, Page 155 that he might make the best use he could of it, so that a while after when the Lidian Embassa|dours came to ask leave, that they might rebuild the Temple, my father commanded all the In|habitants of Miletus to bring all the provisions of corn that were in the Town, and to set them down in the publick place of sale, where the Embassadours of Lidia were to pass: which being done according to his command, and the Embassadours making a report of what they had seen unto their Master, they caused him absolutely to despair of ever overcoming my father; and since they saw the Milesians themselves were able to make war with four Kings at once, they offered them very advantageous and glorious conditions of peace: Alliates then caused two Temples in lieu of one to be rebuilt, and afterwards recovering his health, he became a very intimate friend of my fathers, who since that pacification was a very quiet Possessor of his Dominions, notwithstanding the several secret factions which he knew was amongst his Subjects: for he was very constant, bold, and politick, one that made every one to fear him, and one who defeated all manner of conspiracies against him: This being the state of things, he lived a long time in great tranquility, and Miletus was unquestionless one of the most magnifi|cent Towns of all Cairo. I was then about the age of thirteen, or fourteen; and a natural Son unto the Prince my father, called Alexidesmus, was some seventeen, or eighteen years of age: since he was the son of a Concubine, whom my father did highly affect, he loved him exceed|ling well, and educated him with the same care he did me. Since the Princess my mother died, when I was very young, and the Prince my father did enfranchise and marry that mother of Alexidesmus, that illegitimate Prince had a powerful upholder which I was deprived of; for that woman was of a witty and subtle spirit, and one that was capable of any thing: about the same time it was, that the wise Thales, so famous every where, returned from his long voylage cut of Egypt, where Solon was then Resident; and he took so great affection unto me, as I can well boast without any vanity, that I am beholding unto his sapient precepts for that little virtue which I have: had I made as good use of them as I ought, doubtless I should not have been so unfortunate as I am: for he always read so many lessons against love, and against marriage unto me, that had I followed his advice, I should at least have prevented one part of my misery. The principal rule which he taught for the order of life, was, never to do that thing which we would condemn in another: But though he taught me the lesson over and over an hundred times, yet did I not keep close unto his document: for though I have often con|demned others for suffering themselves to be so far captivated by beauty, as to lose their tran|quility, I my self am so deeply plunged in the snares of love, that I even lost my reason. But since the miseries of my fortune did precede those of my love, it is therefore fit, I first tell you, Sir, that Melasia (so was the mother of Alexidesmus called, whom my father had married since the death of my mother) did project a marriage for her Son with a Milesian Lady, who was extream rich, and of high quality: This at the first seemed very strange unto the world, for every one thought that I ought to be first thought upon: But yet since the Prince my father did favour the designe, none durst make the least murmur, and Alexidesmus continued his ad|dress without any obstacle: for though this Lady, whose name was Leonia, whose father was dead, and she at the disposition of her mother, had no fancy unto Alexidesmus, yet she con|cealed it by the command of her mother: and indeed (if it be lawful to speak sincerely of a man who was the causer of all my misery) Alexidesmus was far from amiable, for he had the violent humours of my father, but he wanted his wit, his resolution, and an hundred other good qualities which he was owner of: on the contrary, he was extremely choleric, cruel, ambitious, weak and bold both together: as for his person, it was reasonable handsom, and there was a great difference between his body, and his mind: yet since Melasia had the heart of the Prince her Husband at command, he would not see the faults of her Son, or at least seemed as if he knew them not: for he was continually cherishing and flattering him up, and made no distinc|tion between me and him, though I dare boldly affirm, I was free from many vices which they winked at in him. The mother of Leonia was Sister unto the Prince of Phoceus, whose Son, as I told you before, my father killed, at the last battel against the King of Lidia, so that in her heart she hated our house: yet notwithstanding the Prince of Phoceus being all ambition, he sent her word, that if she could so contrive it, that Alexidesmus should raig, and I disinherited, that then she should consent unto this match, but otherwise not so much as to think upon it. This Lady being ambitious as well as her Brother, and holding a great corres|pondencie with Melasia, did so cunningly break the business unto her, that there was no question but to find a sutable compliance between two women of one and the same disposition, both of then did quickly understand the desires of each other, since the same ambition did enflame them: so that no longer hiding the matter, they plotted together how they might Page 156 make Alexidesmus Raig, and concluded to bring it about, though at the rate of many crimes committed.

Whilst things were thus transacting, the Prince my Father finished that good strong Citi|tadel in Miletus; and I was continually busied either in my exercises, or in the conversation of Thales, or else diverting my self in such delights as were fit for a Prince of my age: I carried my self with all civility to wards Melasia and Alexidesmus, but I do ingeniously confess that my aversion to them both was so great, that I had much ado to dissemble it: All this while the marriage of Leonea went slowly on: for since the Prince of Phoceus would see some appearance of his hopes before he would consent unto it, his Sister whose name was Philodicea did cunningly protract it; neither could he bring it about soone, because they of Prienna being forced to declare War against Policrates Prince of Samos, who would needs be King of the Sea, and fight with all he met, my father thought, that is common policy he was bound to oppose this new Sovereignty, since he had a good pretence unto it, and set forth a great Navy of Ships, of which he was constrained to make me Admiral, because he could not handsomely do otherwise, since he would not go himself in person unto this War. Not but that I was very young for such an employment, being then but fifteen years of age; but since my Lievtenant General was a man of great experience, he was to manage the business, and I only to have the honour of the Title, neither do I know whether I should have had that if Alexidesmus had not faln sick, so that he could not go this Voyage. The Prince Philoxipes, who was then about my age, and the Prince Tisunder, being both of them moved with a desire of glory, came and took our parts, and carried themselves most heroically in this War, which proved not very prosperous unto us; for the Fortune of Policrates was so great, that nothing could refin him: yet may I truly say without a boast, that though we were sometimes worsted, yet was it not without glory; and though we were not so fortune as to conquer, yet we shewed our Ene|emies that we deserved it. At the last a Peace was concluded by the mediation of sage Bits; who to that end went from Prienna unto Samos, though it lasted not long, since it was impossible to tie up Policrates from roving at Sea, and assaulting almost all he met. At my return to Milet, I found the marriage of Alexidesmus and Leonea almost concluded: for during my absence, Melasia and Philodicea had cajoled with the chief of that faction in the Town who were opposite unto the wise Thales, who though he was a great Lover of his Countries Liberty, yet would he not buy it at the rate of any violent courses, oftentimes saying, that a Tyrant who governed his Subjects in Peace was better then that Liberty which was bought at the price of a War. But there were some of another faction, who transacted upon other principles, and after another manner: for conceiving that the Prince my Father had usurped an Authority which did not belong unto him, and desiring to reduce the Government into a Popularity, and to prevent his Successors from raigning after him, see how they argued the matter amongst themselves, without acquainting Melasia and Philodicea with it, though they were all of the Conspiracy. They thought, that as long as the Prince my father lived, there was no thoughts of recovering their Liberty, but all their design was how to carry things after he was dead: These men took notice how the people of Milete did extreemly affect me, and seeing by my inclinations that my Raing would be milde and sweet, they conceived it would be very difficult to make the people shake off their obedience; but on the contrary, foreseeing plainly that it Alexidesmus should Raing, he would prove the most cruel, violent and tyrannique Prince in they world, they thought it would be a most easie business to induce the people to revolt, and to shake off a weak and wicked Master: so that in hopes this way to ruine sovereign Power, the promised Melasia and Philodicea, that when it was fit time, they would set Alexidesmus in the Throne: so that these two women were ignorant of their principles; but however they were even ravished with joy, to see their design like to prosper according to their wish; and therefore the Marriage between Alexidesmus and Leonea must be solemnized without any longer delay, and a Feast is prepared in Milete for it; at which the Prince of Phocius, seeming to forget the death of his Son, was present: and for a Months time, nothing but publique Rejoycings and Sports were to be found amongst all those who were not of this close design: Every one did think it strange the Prince my father should marry Alexidesmus before me, since by usual course he who was to be his Successor, should first be thought upon: But since it was not the custom to murmur at whatsoever he did, all the Town seemed to be very jocund. I seeing which way things were like to be carried, consulted with wise Thales, who always told me, that what the Gods had ordained, must needs come to pass, and therefore the best course would be to submit unto their Providence. The state of things standing upon these terms, and the Prince my father thinking himself the happiest man upon Earth, Periander, Page 157 King of Corinth, who at that time found no very exact obedience from his Subjects, did send unto him to ask, what would make a King that was but ill obeyed, to live quietly in his DoJminions? The Prince my father, who naturally was of a jealous disposition, and one of whose principal Maxims was, to trust asecret unto as few as possible, and to put nothing to hazard, in lieu of writing unto Periander, or giving any answer unto the Messenger, he carried him to walk in a great Meadow, and through a great field of Corn ready to reap (for it was that time of the year) and said unto him, Tell the King your Master what you see me do in this Corn field, and tell him that's my answer. The Messenger, who knew not the Contents of their Lett^r which he brought, began to observe very exactly what the Prince did, who as he walked along the field of Corn as if he were in a deep study, did break of those ears of Corn which grew higher then the rest, and medled not with those whose weight did bend them down to the ground: Whatsoever this Messenger might think upon this action, yet he could not comprehend the meaning, but resolved to tell his Master what he had seen: yet since it seemed something odd, and of small consequence, after the Prince my father was entered into the Town, and this Envoy gone to his lodging, he could not chuse but tell the matter unto a man of Milete, whom he thought to be his very good friend, and one who promised him not to speak of it: But as soon as he was gone, this man told another, and that other told his friend, and that friend told another friend, and he unto the chief of the Conspirators against me: As this man was of a subtle wit, and knew very well the state of the Corinthian Affairs, and who moreover understood from Melasia that Periander had sent to ask counsel of my father con|cerning some important business, did well enough interpret the riddle, and easily understood, that the breaking those highest ears of Corn, was as much as to say, that he must pull down the Grantees of his Dominioes, who he thought did aspire above their quality. So that fearing lest this lesson which was taught unto Periander, should be executed upon himself if ever the Prince of Milete should come to discover his Plot, he told those of the Combination, that it was requisite they put their plot in execution sooner then once they intended: But it was a long while before they could act their intentions, so that I had leasure to go into that War, wherein Leontidas served Policrates, of which he told you in his Relation at Sinope. But during my absence Anthemius (so was the chief of the Conspirators called) did so cunningly manage his business, that he induced Melasia to think that the Prince my father lived too long, for since the vices of Alexidesmus did every day grow higher, the Prince began to make some difference between him and me: And Philadicea, who saw that her daughter would be most un|happie in the person of her husband, yet her ambition was her comfort, and she continually pressed Melasia to move the Prince unto a Declaration in behalf of Alexidesmus, telling her that it was easily done, and that there did need no more but to publish unto the world, that she was his first legitimate wife, and that the Princess my Mother was never so, and so by consequence Alexidesmus being the elder, it was his Right to Raing, and also to tell the Prince my Father, that it was expedient to see it settled so whilst he lived. Melasia promised she would, and indeed did move my Father unto it; but he would never give her a direct answer; so that her spirit being exasperated, she consulted with Anthemius. The Prince of Phocius also came again to Milete, to consult afresh with the said Anthemius and Melasia; and the result of the Councils was, to poyson my Father during my absence, and cause Alexidesmus to be proclaimed Sovereign: The Prince of Phocius said further, that he made no question but I had many friends, yet since I was not in the Town, they would not be over violent in my behalf; and to prevent the worst, he said, he would cause a good strong party to enter into Milete secretly: Anthemius wished it otherwise, because he desired to introduce Liberty upon the death of the Prince, yet he durst not openly oppose it, lest he should render himself suspected, and discover the plot which he hatched in his heart.

The wise Thales, though very busie at his study, yet had intelligence that some plot or other was in agitation, so that hearing of a Ship which the Prince my Father sent with Ammu|nition, he writ a short Letter unto me, wherein he intimated that my presence was very ne|cessary at Milete, but since he could not imagine at what end the pernicious plots of Melasia, Philodicea, the prince of Phocius, and Anthemius, did ayme, he writ no more unto me, hoping that I would come time enough to disperse all factions. In the mean while, the four persons did almost all of them transact by several principles; for the prince of Phocius did principally ayme at revenge; Melasia and Philodicea sought to satisfie their ambition; and Anthelmus aimed at the Liberty of his Country. But, Sir, why should I trouble you thus long with the miseries of my house? To be short therefore, let me tell you, that Melasia poysoned my Father, and published a Declaration, by which Alexidesmus was acknowledged for his Page 158 Successor: The prince of Phocius was in Milete with a commanding power; Anthemius acknowledged Alexidesmus for his Prince, and after his example others also: Those friends I had in Town would have taken up Arms; the people in general murmured; but the party of Anthemius and Phocius had the sword in their hands, and were the stronger: When I arrived at Milete, they would not permit me entrance; and since my Navy had been much weather-beaten, I was in the most pitiful condition that ever was Prince: But sending about two hour after to know the reason, Alexidesmus sent me a counterfeit Declaration, which he had forged in my Fathers name, and as soon as it was dark, the wise Thales did let me understand the truth of all things by a fisher-man, who came by water: So that in one day I heard of my Fa|thers death, the loss of my Dominion, the Treason of my Brother, and Revolt of my Subjects, and all this without any power to help it. My Ships were much torn; I was not in a condition to attempt any thing, having not men enough to attempt any thing against Milete either by Sea or Land; nor knew I well how to get away from the Town, considering the disorder which this affront had infused into my Fleet. The wise Thales did further send me his advice, and conjured me not to ruine my Country for my own private Interest; but to stay until time, my friends, the debancheness of Alexidesmus, and the Gods, did revenge my quarrel, and re-establish me in my Dominions: for without all doubt the Gods were so just, as they would in fit time punish my enemies, and recompence my vertue, if I were so patient as to make good use of my misfortune. When I first received this advice, I did much wonder at it, and I confess it was something difficult to follow it; so follow it; so that it was necessity rather then choyce which made me follow his counsel. However, the Sea being very serene, although my Ships were in a very bad condition, yet I endeavored to put in at one of the next Islands, and there to accom|modate my self: yet did secretly send a Declaration into Milete, by which I let all my Subjects know, that the pretended Declaration of the Prince my Father was forged, and that Alexidesmus was not only a Rebel and an Usurper, but that Melasia his Mother poysoned her husband purposely to make her son to raing. Since this Crime was horrid in the highest degree, every one would not believe it, but imagined that it was only my politique scandal to render them the more odious. But since misfortunes seldom come alone, I was no sooner in the open Sea, but a tempestuous storm began to sise, and within two hours all my Fleet was dispersed: The angry Billows wafted some of my Ships into the very Port of Milete; dashed others against the Rocks, and split them; some sunk into the bottomless Abyss; and I only with three Ships remained struggling with the wind and waves: I thought a hundred times that it was impossible but I must needs perish, and I did as often render thanks unto the Gods that I was not to survive my misfortunes: But against my wish, it was my fate to live, and after a whole day and nights most dismal Tempest I was cast upon the Isle of Chios, where I landed, and was permitted only to reaccommodate my Ships: for since those Islanders did know of the Alteration in Milete, they were afraid that if they should harbor me long in their Ports, then the Mileteans might have a pretence of War against them. And thus Sir I found the proverb true, That those find the fewest places of retreat who stand most in need of them, and unfortunate men seldom find sanctuaries from those who are not so themselves. It was in vain to stay in hopes that any of my Ships would return; for whether they all perished, or were driven by the Tempest far off, or forsook me, and returned to Milete, I know not; but I am sure I never heard any news of them: Two only of those three which remained were fit to sail, and the third was no sooner ready, but I resolved for Le|stos, to try whether that friendship which I had contracted with Tisander son unto sage Pittacus Prince of Mitibines, would entertain me in spite of my misfortunes. This generous Friend recive me with abundance of kindness, and induced the Prince his Father also to respect me with as high honors as if I were in full possession of my Dominions. In this Court I flayed a long time, and sent unto Periander King of Corinth for some ayd: but his hands were so full at home, by reason of some opposite Factions amongst his Grantees, that he was in no condition to assist me. The Prince Policrates was at peace with Alexidesmus; so likewise were they of Prienne: The Prince of Phoceus also was for him, and engaged all those of his alliance to the like: So that I saw no possibility of effecting any thing with those succors which the Prince of Mytilenes only could afford me. I understood likewise by that intelligence which I ever held with Thales, how he had discovered that Anthemics, who seemed so jealous in behalf of Alexidesmus, did privately animate the people against this Usurper: so that there was much reason to believe, there would ere long be some fresh alteration in Milete. My best course then was, not to incense the people by bringing a War upon them, but to prepare my self in a readiness to enter the Town whenever any favorable occasion should be offered. Page 159 Thus was I forced to sit still, and wait for the future success of my fortunes; but I must confess it was with so melancholy a mind, that nothing was able to divert me: And there was one thing which did double my misery, which was, that the Prince Tisander was as unfortunate as my self: for he was pleased to know Sir, that he had above two years loved, in a most violent and desperate manner, that famous Lady which you saw at Lesbos, when we met there toge|ther, but he could never obtain so much as a favorable look from her, though he courted her with all possible inviting allurements which usually move affection. Since the admired Sapho, of whom I speak, was a miracle of wit, beauty, and affability, I could not blame him for esteeming her above all the world; yet since I never had been in love my self, I did extreemly condemn him for being as melancholy as my self. But Sir, it is not the History of this Prince which I intend to relate: I shall only thus far tell you, that he being past all hopes of ever moving the heart of this Lesbian Beauty, he desired me to be the Companion of his Exile, and to travel with him over all those Seas which were not far remote from Milete, in hope that absence would be his cure. Since, in this disgrace wherein I lived, all places were indifferent unto me, I easily consented unto his desire: So that colouring our departure as well as we could, we left Lesbos, and committed our selves unto Fortune. All our discourse was commonly disputes of ambition and love, and each of us maintained his opinion according to the suggestions of his heart: We had two Ships besides that in which we were; but presently after we had only that, for meeting the Prince Polistrates, who was much stronger then we, he took the other two from us, and all we were able to do was to escape out of his hands. This accident did extreemly incense me, and (if I may use the phrase) first moved me to turn a Pirate: for it begot in me so hot a desire to regain what I had lost, that we resolved to fall upon all we met, that would not ren|der themselves, conceiving it as lawful for us as for Polistrates to make prizes of what we could. In less then a Months time we made above twenty Combates, and I presently got the name of a Pirate: as for the Prince Tisander, he would not be known in any place were e're we came. It may, I confess, be said I was a Pirate, but now am none: for since my design was only to get a small Fleet by my courage, I only retained the Ships and such of the men as would willingly serve me, and only as much as would sustain us. We took three Ships from the Prince of Phoceus my Enemy, which did beyond all expressions joy me; and at the first Isle we came at, I set the men on Land, and took others in their room: This did revive my hopes, since I began to conquer my Enemies. I understood from these Phocian Mariners, that their Prince would ere long imbatque, and go by the Euxine Bridg unto the Town of Appolonia, so that resolving to intercept his passage, I returned from whence I came, and it was then, Sir, when I met with you as you were sailing from Corinth to Ephesus: Since my design was to fight the Prince of Phoceus, whom they said would come with six Sail, I resolved to set upon yours, and gain it if I could. Yet to speak the truth, you disputed that Victory with so much courage, as it may truly be said that number did overcome you, and that your valor notwithstanding was victorious. But Sir, will you give me leave to tell you, how that valiant man who fought with you in the Sea after you were both fallen in, and whom I took up with you in a little Boat, was this same Tisander who is now in my Tent, and who would not permit me to discover him unto you all the while you was in my Ship?

How, generous Thrasibulus, (said Cyrus, and interrupted his story,) is he whom I fought withall, and who certainly had overcome me if you had not been, is he here? Then let me entreat you at my request to redouble your cares of him, for I do not think there is a more valiant man in the whole world than he: But I beseech you go on with the Relation of his Life, which is as tender to me as my own. When Thrasibulus had admired the high generosity of Cyrus, in interesting himself as he did in the preservation of that man who had so furiously disputed with him for the Victory, he continued his Discourse in this manner.

I will not bring into your memory, Sir, any more passages of that Adventure, because I know your modesty will not permit it: but give me leave to tell you, that when I landed at Lesbos, it was to set Tisander on shoar, who had received two wounds from you, less in appearance than those two you received from him, but much longer, and more difficult to be healed. Then Sir, according to my intended design, I carried you to the Euxine Bridge, where I had the good fortune to encounter him I was in quest of, to wit, the Prince of Pheceus; for indeed, it was he, Sir, against whom you fought, and whom you vanquished, for certainly without you I had been vanquished: But as fortune was, he was not in any of those three Ships which we took, but by a miracle of Fate escaped: Then Sir, after you refused those two Ships which I did present unto you, because indeed they belonged unto you more than unto me, and after that you were pleased to accept but of one of them; that same Tempest which did rise within six Page 160 hours after we parted, and which as I understood afterwards, did drive you some two days after upon the Port of Sinope, that same wind, I say, which drove you that way, did also by a prodigious blast, drive me the contrary, and carried me into the Hellispoint, and afterwards caused me to pass between Lemnos, and Lesbos, then forced me more upon the left hand, until I touched upon the Isle of Chio, and after upon the Coasts of Guides, so well known by that Isthmus which shoots it self so far into the Sea, as if that neck of land did joyn it unto the Continent.

Hitherto, Sir, you may be pleased to look upon the most happy time of my life, for amongst my misfortunes, I always enjoyed some happiness, either in the friendship of the wise Thales, or in the sweet society of Tisander, or yours: But since the day that I arrived at Gnides, nothing but miserable misfortunes were my lot; for be pleased to know that just upon the point of this Isthmus, whither the Tempest had driven me alone, (all my other Ships being dispersed by the storm) there stands a very strong Castle, which is the greatest defence of this Isle; A man of good quality, whose name was Euphranor, and who was one of the Council of Sixty which governs that Republique, did command in that Castle when I came thither. This man, to my good fortune as then I thought, was upon the top of a Tarrass, and from that height did see how the impetuous winds did dash me against the bottoms of the walls; so that out of his civil humanity, he sent presently unto all the Mariners in the Port to assist me, and he took especial care to know in what condition my Ship was, which indeed was the very same in which he had formerly commanded: for he saw it to be a man of War, and one of the goodliest and biggest that ever was seen in those Seas, and indeed it was the same I fought in against Policrates, and in which I had the happiness of your company. Some Mariners which knew my ship, told him I was that famous Pirate, who had a long time kept those Seas, and who never used to take any money or merchandize, but only men and ships; assuring him also that they knew me very well, and once saw me assault a ship whilst they escaped. But being informed by others at the same time, who came to see me, that I had not the Garb of a Pirate: that that ship which was much weather-beaten, and that it would be a long time before I could be in a condition to depart from Gnides; he sent order, either out of curiosity to know who I was, or else for the security of his Fort, to bring me unto him. Since I knew it was the custom of all Garrisons to do the like, and since I resolved not to make my self known, I willingly obeyed, and only one man of quality in Milete, called Leosthenes, who would never forsake me, and three more of my own men followed me: I was brought unto Euphranor in a great Gallery, where several people were walking with him: he spoke unto me very ingeniously and civilly; he asked me from whence I came, and whither my intention was to go; he did also put many questions unto me to discover the truth of my answers: Unto which I replied so readily, as I did not fully give him satisfaction: for I answered, that though I should tell him my name, yet would it be unknown unto him: that I came from the Euxine Bridge upon some important occasions, but knew not whither I went when the Tempest did drive me upon that Coast, however I acknowledged my self bound unto his generosity in sending his men to relieve me, and my ship, which if he had not done, I had certainly perished. Whilst I was thus speaking unto Euphranor, I observed how all the men in the Gallery with him flocked about me with a prejudicated opinion that I was a Pirate: Since there are only four languages spoken amongst all the Ionians, and they much resembling one another, so that whosoever understood one might understand all the rest, we understood one another very well; there being but little difference between the language of Milete, and that of Guides, only in the accent, for both were Greeks. But, Sir, amongst those which came about me, I saw four or five Ladies of handsome Garb; amongst the rest, the daughter of Euphranor was the fairest that ever eye beheld; and since she was more curious than the rest, to see a Pirate, which I heard her say, she had never seen before; she came nearer to me than the rest, and I did salute her with more submissive reverence than I did the rest, unto whom I only bowed my self in general without any particular application: But unto Alcionida, (for that was the name of that beauty) I addressed my self with as much humble reverence as if a Divinity had been present. Whilst I was in conference with Euphranor, me thought I heard her say unto her companions, that I had not the Garb and Air of a Pirate, as they had formerly described Pirates unto her; so that to confirm her in that good opinion of me, I endeavoured to answer Euphranor with all the ingenuity that possible I could, and indeed he was so well pleased with me, that in lieu of the quality of a Pirate, which is never admitted into their Ports, he very favourably offered me his assistance, and told me, that I might stay in Gnides as long as I pleased to trim up my ship: after this, I retired, holding discourse as long as handsomely I could; to the end I might the longer look Page 161 upon the wonder of Beauty, Alcionida. But at the last I went out of the Gallery, and returned unto my ship: But since it leaked in very many places, I was forced to lodge in the Town; at the end of which, this Castle was built, still retaining in my fancy the perfect Idea of this divine beauty which I had seen. The next morning, I went unto that famous Temple of Gnidenian Venus, where I found the divine Alcionida, and so charming and amiable, that I changed colour when I saw her. Since I wore that day a very rich Suite of clothes, she hardly knew me, yet recalling my face into her memory presently after, she answered my salute very civilly; since she was then with her mother, and since I passed but under the notion of a Pirate, I durst not accost her, but conceived it fit to ask leave before I addressed my self unto her: I conceived it fit to go and thank Euphranor, and give him a ceremonious visit: I went unto him the very next morning, and my discourse was so suitable unto his disposition, that he acknowledged himself to be very glad of mine acquaintance: After I parted from him, I bethought my self, that commonly, Presents with men, have the same operation that Sacrifices have with the Gods, and therefore I presented him with an admirable Sword, the hilt of which was gold, and set with precious stones, full of most rare workmanship; for it was done by the hand of that famous Philosopher, and Arts-master, whose skill in Gold-works none could imitate. Euphranor was much taken with this magnificent Present, and received it with much delight: In the mean while, I was so charmed with the sight of Alcionida, that I forgot all necessary orders for the trimming up of my ship, and left the care of it wholly unto Leosthenes: I should stay alone in my Chamber, and contemplate upon nothing but the divinity of her beauty: I should stand a whole hour in a pleasing study, and think upon the sweetness of her looks, the pureness of her complexion, the excellent composure in every part of her face, and of the modesty which appeared in all her actions, and the sweetness of her mind which appeared in her Physiognomie: But after I had long stood in such contemplative musings, I should upon a sudden wonder to find my self so employed; I (I say) who ever since the death of my father had a mind continually full of revenging thoughts, and hatred, thinking upon nothing but how to regain what I had lost: I confess, this alteration astonished me, and was much ashamed of so much weakness in my self; I resolved to take another course, and to send for permission to visit the wife of Euphranor, whose name was Phedima: for, said I unto my self, I must not expose my self unto so great a danger as to look upon so charming a beauty as Alcionida; for I scarce saw her above one minute, but I forgot all my enemies, what then would become of me if I should discourse with her, and give her time to captivate my heart? yet in a moment after I laughed at my own fears, and believed, that to quench my kindling flames, there did need no more, but to desire I should not love Alcionida, and that would smother it up: others, said I, who are entangled with this kind of passion, are themselves in the fault, because they do not check and stifle it at the first, but I for my part shall take another course, and I will go and see Alcionida, with a firm settled resolution only to admire, but never to love her. Thus Sir, thinking my self sufficiently armed against the charms of this admirable beauty, I sent after dinner to ask leave that I might visit her, and it was granted unto me. I went then, and took Leosthenes only with me, but spoke not a word unto him all the way. Sir, said he unto me, and laugh, you are too much reserved for the visit of Ladies. I laughed at the observation of Leosthenes, and knowing no reason why I should acquaint him with the cause, I gave him no answer, but seemed as if I understood him not. I went then into the Castle which was very near, and Phedima received me very civilly. The admirable Alcionida also was so charmingly sweet unto me, that I had all the motives possible to commend her: Since there was many Ladies there when I came in; after the first complements were past, Phedima addressed her self unto those she was in discourse with before I entered: and since I had the honour to be next Alcionida, I had occasions given me to observe that her soul was as full of beauty, as her face: and I believe never any had a more charming discourse than she, for she did speak as much as possible could be to divert her hearers: she equally spoke well of every thing, and kept her self within the limits of Ladies knowledge; and would not discourse of things too high, and above the sphere of her understanding: her eloquence was excellent, but natural, and came freely, and unprompt for, from her: and though she was of the talkative Sex, yet she could be discreetly silent, and lend a willing ear unto any that spoke, though never so far from the purpose; so complacential she was, and wise, and judicious; so that according to this description of her, you may easily imagine, that she would permit me to speak unto her; and was so good as to return her answers. After much common and indifferent discourse, in which all the company did intermix, she very obligingly told me, that I was something beholding unto her for the opinion which she had of me before she knew me: For (said she unto me) it was oft-times my diversion, when the Sea was highly incensed, to look out, and see the mountainous waves dash against Page 162 our Rocks: and it happened, that as I was looking out of my Closet, I saw how the wind did beat your Ship against the foot of the Castle; and when I saw that all within were ready to perish, I confess my heart did beat, and I prayed unto the Gods for your preservation: Since therefore my first thoughts of you were well wishes and pity, therefore I say you are a little beholding unto me. Is it then, Madam, unto your prayers that I owe my safety? said I unto her; then it is to you that I must address my thanks. It is unto the Gods, and not to me, replied she, that you are to render thanks; and I can claim no more but a slight commendation for pitying you before I knew who you were: and I know that when I met you this morning in the Temple, doubtless you thanked the Goddess of that place for your preservation. It is most true, said I unto her, that I went thither to that purpose, for then I did not know that it was unto your prayers that the Goddess was propitious; and at this time I do not at all wonder that the Goddess of Beauty should grant the desires of the fairest Lady in the world: But Madam, perhaps now you know me, you repent of that favor you did me when you did not know me. I know not why, replied she, unless appearances be very fallacious, I should repent of my pity, since miseries are apt to move all unto it, especially my sex, and since you seem to be of another quality than I thought you to be. Oh Madam (said I unto her) I do conjure you not to change your opinion of me. It seems then by your discourse, replied she, that you rank your self in the number of miserable and unfortunate men. Yes Madam, replied I, the most of any man living, not only in relation to those misfortunes which have already fallen upon me, but also in respect of those which in probability will hereafter happen. You are too ingenious to persecute your self, said she, in grieving for that which perhaps may happen; and for my part I do confess unto you, that I do equally condemn those that build their happiness upon hopes only of being so, and those who are miserable only out of future fears. There are a sort of men in the world (said I unto her, and smiled) whose joys and sorrows do consist only in hopes and fears. I have heard as much, replied she, and smiled as well as I, but for your part, you cannot be acquainted with any misfortunes of these kinds, since living continually at Sea, you have nothing to hope for but a gentle gale, nor any thing to fear but a furling Tempest. Pirates (replied I in such a tone and after such a manner as might make her think I was not one) are not originally out of the Sea as your Goddess is, but they are born upon Land as others are; and indeed Madam, said I and blushed, my Shipwreck may tell you, that Pirates are not always amongst the waves. You give your self a name, said she, which suits so ill with your discourse, that I do not think it belongs unto you. I do confess, said I unto her, that I have not always had that title, nor did I take it up my self, but since people bestow it upon me, I shall keep it until it please Fortune to take it away again. Thus did I hold the fair Alcionida in discourse until all those Ladies which were with her were making ready to depart, and I thought it long enough for my first visit: So that giving Phedima a Complement of gratitude, and desiring the honour to visit her as long as I stayd at Gnides, I returned to my Lodging: Leosthenes, who all that while had only the company of a stupid blockhead, complained against the longness of my visit; but my mind was so taken up with my new passion, that I knew not well what he said, nor answered him much to the purpose; he judging therefore by my actions that I desired to be alone, left me and went unto the Port, to see whether the trimming up of our Ship went forward. I then was no sooner at liberty, but remembering my firm resolution which I had taken in going unto Alcionida, not to love her, I began to question my self whether I was free, or whether I was a captive? I examined my reason and my heart upon it; but oh Heavens! I found the first of these so engaged, and the other so prejudicated, that I was not a little amazed at it: I called for the aid of ambition, since I heard say, that Passion of all others was able to resist the power of Love; but all was in vain, and Ambition did submit unto Love: yet for all that she did not quite desert my heart; but on the contrary, notwithstanding the predominancy of Love, she redoubled all her strength; and I esteemed my self a hundred times more unfortunate in losing my Dominions since I knew Alcionida then before, because now I looked upon my misfortunes as an invincible obstacle unto the happy success of my new passion. If I were absolute Sovereign in Milet, said I, I might almost be certain to obtain the favor of this fair one: but since I am an Exile, and passing for a Pirate, I can never have any hopes in pretending to any share in her affection; and I must prepare my self to suffer all the torments that both Love and Ambition can inflict upon me. Moreover, what will the wise Thales say unto me? what will the King of Corinth think? what imaginations will the Prince of Mytilenes have? and what censures shall I incur from all the Princes and people of Jonia in particular, and from all Greece in general? when they shall understand that a Prince unjustly driven out of his Dominions, abused by his Enemies, Page 163 betrayed by his own Subjects, and deposed by a Bastard; a Prince, I say, who should think upon nothing but revenge and honour, and not suffer himself to be weakly overcome by the fair eyes of Alcionida without any resistance. Resist then, for shame, said I unto my self, and do not yield my self a Captive without a Combat. But, oh Heavens! (said I presently after,) what Arms should I use against her? what can I think or do, not to love her? Can I discover any blemish in her beauty? or can I find any fault in her mind? and can I suspect that her Soul is not so generous as her face is fair, and her wit is charming? Let me try if any thing can cure me: Let me visit her daily, and keep a close observant eye upon her, and enquire whether this fair one, who doubtless is beloved of all that know her, do not also love some one or other; and let me neglect nothing which may free me from that misery which torments me. Thus did I reason with my self, and could not contrive any other way to deliver my self, but by discovering some defects in this incomparable beauty, or else to find out that her heart was already engaged. The next day then I enquired with all possible diligence of what I desired to know, which I could with more ease do, because at the same Lodging where I did lie, there quartered also a man of good fashion, a stranger as well as my self, who had been at Gnides a long time to harken after news, with him I did comply, to effect my desires the sooner: I understood then from him, that Alcionida was loved by all reasonable men which ever saw her, but none could ever move her heart; and he told me so many things in her Commendations, that I made no question but her Soul was as excellently fair as her face, and as great as her wit: Sometimes I despaired of finding any of those defects which I sought for; and sometimes again, my heart, whether I would or no, would extremely rejoice at the knowledge of her excellent perfections. I could not chuse then but submit Sir, and love the fair Alcionida: but for all that, my hatred of the Prince of Phoeceus, Alexidesmus, Melasia, Philodicea, and Anthemius, was not extinguished: on the contrary, I wished them worse then I did before, because the miserable condition into which they had brought me, was the obstacle in my love: So then, not neglecting my Milesian Affairs, I resolved to please Alcionida, if I could; so that I was not a little busily employed about it. Since Euphranor had some suspicion that I was not of that quality which I spoke my self, he always treated me very civilly, and took it kindly when I came to visit him; and the other I saw Alcionida, the more charming I found her, and me thought she did not look upon me as a Pirate; yet was I not at all the happier, for I knew she would not look upon me as a Lover: oftentimes had a desire to hint something unto her which might make her guess my thoughts, but presently after I checked my design; and my fears to be ill used moved me to be content with her civilities to me, rather then to expose my self unto her anger: for said I unto my self, If I should acquaint her with my Passion, and not my Quality, she will treat me as a Pirate: Also if I should tell her the condition I am in, what hopes is there, that she should give any entertainment unto an Exile, and unfortunate Prince. In conclusion, I resolved to make her know I was in love with her, and that she should still think that I was not of that Quality I appeared in; but not to let her know directly that I was a Prince, which was thrust out of his Dominions, but it was so difficult a task to keep an even way as not to speak either too much, or too little, to infuse this knowledge into her, that I looked upon it as a business almost impossible, and lived a most vexatious life. Mean while Leosthenes, who had a bold and an attempting wit, fell into league with a Cousin of Alcionida's, who dwelt with her; and that so deep, as I wondered at it; for this woman was full of friendly expressions to him. 'Tis true, he had prepared her with many little presents which he bought privately in Gnides, and said he brought them out of a far Country, such as Essences, Powders, Perfumes, and such knacks; and since this woman was of free disposition, she imparted all that ever she knew unto Leosthenes.

Upon a day then, as she was in discourse with him, she pressed and conjured him to tell her truly who I was; and since he imagined, that happily this curiosity did not proceed from her self, he pressed her as earnestly to tell him why she desired so much to know it: so that according to her usual freedom and ingenuity she told him, after she had made a mighty secret on it, that her reason was, because Alcionida had a great desire to know my quality; for she could not believe that I was really a Pirate. As good fortune was, Leosthenes answered her, as I would have appointed him if I had known of it; for he fretted and fumed, and answered so ambiguously, that he made her believe Alcionida was not mistaken. As Leosthenes had plainly perceived that I was deeply in love with Alcionida, so he thought it would please me in telling how inquisitively she had enquired who I was; and indeed the relation of it did so much joy me, that having no power to hide my passion, I discovered all my thoughts unto him, and made him my Confident: not that I thought him very fit for it, for his spirit was a little too Page 164 insolent; but because, the truth was, I had no other to chuse, and because I could not inclose the violence of my passion in so close a place as my own heart. Oh Heavens! how many pleasing minutes did this curiosity of Alcionida afford me? and how many fears did I apprehend, when I did imagine the knowledge of my misfortunes would bar me admittance into her heart? However, I did visit her every day, and every day I loved her more and more violently: The most powerful of her charms was, that all those vanities which usually young people are most taken up in were much below her: this alluring Lady did never do any thing as a diversion only: her dress was most ornamental, but so, as it did not require half a life to the putting it on, as most women use; her discourse was never upon any trivial vanities; moreover, all the Gold and Diamonds of the East, could never adulterate her mind; but she could at the first visit discern a comely man though in meanest habit, from a stupid Ass in the most magnificent clothes upon Earth; and notwithstanding his outward lustre, she would be so just unto real merit, that she would be more respective unto a very Pirate who was owner of good qualities, then unto a Prince who could boast of nothing but his vices. I finding then so much wisdom and virtue in this admirable Lady, how could I chuse but love her. I remember, being one day with her, and leaning against the window in the end of a Gallery towards the Sea, whilst other Ladies were walking behind us; See (said she, and shewed me the place where my Ship was bulged) yonder is the very place where you were like to suffer shipwreck. Pardon me, Madam (said I hastily unto her,) that is not the place where I was most like to perish; for indeed it is not so far off you. Truly (said she, and did not understand the mysterious meaning of my answer) you do not know so well as I do the place where your Ship was in most danger, for these eyes did see it at that time, but I believe you were so busy in giving order what to do in that extremity, that you did not observe the place. I know very well, Madam, said I unto her, that my shipwreck was like to have been in your presence, but yet for all that, those who are ready to perish, know the place better then any lookers on. For my part, said she and laughed, did I not conceive your Soul to be very resolute, I should think that fear might at that instant have a little disturbed your reason, for I can assure you, it was at the foot of that great Rock where you were in greatest danger. And I am most certain, replied I, and notwithstanding the respects which I owe you, I must maintain, that it was against this Rock against which I am most in danger, and not that which you speak of. Alcionida, being not accustomed to find me so full of contradiction, did then suspect there was some hidden sense in my words, and blushing at it, I am to blame, said she, to argue with you concerning a business of no importance; for since you escaped the danger, it is sufficient, and I may well be satisfied, without more discourse upon it: But truly, said she, and laughed still, those who say, a wise Pilot will never split twice upon one and the same Rock, do not know how difficult it is to prevent it, since you who seem so wise do not know the place where you were most in danger; however, let us speak no more upon this Subject, but fall upon something else which will better please you, and tell me I beseech you when your Ship will be ready to put to sail, for I do imagine you wish for your departure as much as all they who know you do wish your stay. I was much non-plust at this question; for though it gave me a handsome opportunity to discover my thoughts unto her, yet there appeared in her eyes so much severity mixed with her sweetness, that I durst not reveal it: I only told her, that I thought it not possible to be very earnest in hasting away from that place where she was; and since common civility might well exact as much as I did say, she returned me as civil an answer; and all the rest of our Conference was such as this: I had been divers other times with her, and never durst expose my self unto her anger in declaring my love unto her; and I understood from Leosthenes, that since the first day, Alcionida never spoke a word to her Cousin concerning me. In the mean time, I deferred the mending of my Ship as long as handsomly I could; and I could have found in my heart a disposition to break some things which were whole, purposely to gain time: so that in lieu of three weeks, I made it six, that I stayed in the Port of Gnides. But at the last, the wise Thales, whom I had secretly advertised of the place where I was, did send me word, that there was a very seditious face upon things in Milet, and advised me to come thither; and then was I forced to depart, notwithstanding the interest of my Love: Moreover, since the repairing of my Ship was so long in hand, there was a report in Gnides, that I had some secret design in it, and Euphranor himself suspected something, as I understood by Leosthenes, and he from his Confident; giving it out, that as soon as he returned from his voyage of eight days, he would force me to explain my self. All these considerations therefore requiring my departure, and my Ship being ready, when Euphranor was to go his Journey, I took my leave of him, telling him that I should depart before Page 165 his return, and beseeching him to believe, that if I did not die in a business about which I went, I would return, and make my self a little better known unto him. After his departure, I stayed four days still at Gnides: during which time, Alcionida who never had been in a Ship of War, no more then three or four of her friends, seemed very desirous to see mine; and I beseeched her to satisfy her curiosity in honouring me so far as to come into my Ship, the last afternoon I was to stay in that Port: and having obtained the promise of it with the permission of Phedima, I prepared to receive her with all possible magnificence, but yet with all the melancholy that a heart could be capable of. And when I seriously considered, I should within those four days see Alcionida no more; I was so grieved at the thought of it, that I was not able to order this intended Feast as I desired: but relied wholly upon the contrivance of Leosthenes, who did order it admirably well: for though the time of preparation was very short, yet was my Ship adorned with an hundred waving Flags of several colours, on which the name of Alcionida was written in gold, and silver, with variety of Mottoes. There was placed upon the Deck all manner of Sea musick, such as might resemble the Tritons, and the Nereides; and besides these, there was very admirable voices in imitations of the Syrens. All the Souldiers were tricked up in the best Arms in the Ship.

The day and hour being come, in which I was to be honoured with seeing Alcionida in a place where I had any power, I went to meet her, and her Aunt which accompanied her, with ten or twelve more of her friends; as for Phedima she was not very well, and therefore could not come: I was in the most magnificent Arms that ever I wore, with a Plume of several colours, and waited upon by Leosthenes, and all the principal Officers of my Ship: conducting her then into this Ship, thus ordered, as I told you, the musick begun to play as soon as we came near, and going into a Cabin, she was amazed at the greatness of it; at the rareness of the Pictures, and the magnificence of every thing, and she could not be perswaded she was in a Ship: After she had well viewed these things, the Mariners to divert her, did in her presence, do all they use to do, either in a Calm, or in a Tempest, which was to pull up, and let down the Sails, to turn upon a sudden, or by degrees, to remove all that abundance of Cordage in an instant; and in short we shewed her all manner of Maritime works, which usually are wonders unto those who never saw them. Whilst Alcionida was viewing these sights, the Banquet was brought into the Cabin wherein we were at the first: so that when she entered again into it, she was afresh surprized with pleasing delights: for the truth was, Leosthenes had ordered things very well; she began then to commend and thank me, but still chiding me for my magnificence, and telling me with a most obliging smile, that if all Pirates were like me, they would shame all that Greece had most excellent and magnificent. I returned her a complement with much joy, and I was extremely pleased to observe Alcionida so delighted: But when I began to think, that I must depart that very night, (for the wind was very good) I was not able to look upon Alcionida without extrem sorrows: Alas, (said I unto my self, whilst she was at the Banquet with her friends, and looking most attentively upon her) perhaps I shall never see Alcionida again; every minute drives me further from her: And canst thou live Thrasibulus, and endure this? hast thou an heart to bid her adieu? Ah, no no, rather die a thousand deaths, then admit of so rigorous, so incertain, and so long an absence; so certain for its cruelty, and so insufferable in its torments. These cogitations did make so deep an impression into my soul, that I changed colour twenty times in an hour; so that Leosthenes drawing me aside, when he perceived my extream melancholy, and whilst the Ladies were eating, and according to his free and bold humour, How do you, Sir, said he unto me? are you the only man in all the world, whom the sight of the party loved does satisfy? Alas, Leosthenes, said I unto him, what satisfaction can it be to see this admirable beauty whom I adore, since I must see her no more? If that be the cause of your sadness, said he to me, why will you not see her all the days of your life? Alas, how can I do that, said I to him? You may do it (replied he very hastily) by permitting me to cut the Cable which fastens the Ship unto the Anchor, and so let me hoise up Sails, and put to open Sea, as if it were with intentions to divert them, and so you may carry them whither you please: retaining only the fair Alcionida, and her lovely Cousin, and set at the rest on shore, at some convenient distance from this place. Euphranor, said he, is not now Gnides, and we shall be far enough off before our flight will be discovered: and however, said he, whether you do it as a Pirat, or as a Lover, it will be a prize worthy of you: At the first, I thought that Leosthenes had spoken this out of rallery: but presently after, seeing he spoke seriously, and as one that was interested in it, my first apprehensions was to refuse the motion: but love in an instant, seducing both my generosity, and my reason, forced me to say unto Leosthenes, almost not knowing what I said, Canst thou tell me of no way, cruel friend, to make Page 166 me happy, but by making me culpable? and doest thou make such a pleasing proposition, as honour forbids me to accept? The fault is easily repaired, said he unto me; and those who are happy, do never pass for culpable: and therefore without loss of time in needless discourse, go, and entertain the Ladies, and amuse them, whilst I take all necessary courses to execute so haply a designe: Ah, Leosthenes, said I unto him, I dare not consent unto such an unjust proposition, how pleasing soever it be. Consider (said he again) that if you will needs be so exactly just, you may perhaps never see the fair Alcionida again: but may for ever enjoy her, if you follow my counsel: But then she will hate me, replied I unto him: But on the other side, you will for ever lose her, (answered he.) Look upon the treasure, (said this unjust friend, and pointing unto her with his finger) which you intend to lose: Indeed Sir, what shall I say in my excuse? Love disturbed my reason: Leosthenes seduced my will: and hardly knowing what I said, I half consented unto his desires, which doubtless were more for his own interest, then mine, in relation to the Cousin of Alcionida, whom he loved; and I went as he advised me to entertain, and amuse the Ladies, whilst he cut the Cable, hoisted Sails, and took the open Sea. Since the Banquet was ended when I entered, Alcionida came towards me with such obliging civility, and so many signes of satisfaction in her countenance, I was so ashamed for consenting unto what Leosthenes had propounded: as I did not only grow pale, and blush, both in an instant, but checking my thoughts, No Madam, (cried I upon a sudden) I can never consent unto it, I had rather die an hundred times: Come Madam, (said I unto her, and presented her my hand) and go out of this place which is unworthy of you, and never trust your self again in the hands of Pirates: But Madam, make haste, I conjure you, lest that repentance which now is in me, be not seconded by a worse; Alcionida was so amazed at this, that she knew not what to think; but she saw so much disorder in my face, that she was in a great disorder her self, and knew not what she should answer: Then seeing that every one began to obey Leosthenes; and that he had his Sword in his hand, and his Arme up to cut the Cable, I did absolutely forbid him: Then turning towards Alcionida, do as I desire you, Madam, said I unto her, though what I desire do cost me my life. But (said she, in giving me her hand, and making ready to go out) will you not tell me, what the matter is? When you are upon the Land, replied I, and I rid of my fears, then perhaps you will guess what the matter is: I cannot possibly express, Sir, the disorder of my soul at that time, the astonishment of Alcionida, and likewise of her Aunt, and her friends; nor can I express the vexation of Leosthenes, or my despair: for being prompted unto it, by my love, my respects, and my repentance, I set Alcionida on land, and in her Coach, not remembering what I said, or whether I said any thing, or no: I know only that I left her, that I embarked, and though our intentions was not to depart until the next night, yet I caused the Anchors to be taken up, the Stils to be hoisted, and left Gnides immediately, where also I left the Soul of my affection. Leosthenes would have said something to me, but I could not endure his sight, nor would admit of his excuses; for I must needs grieve first for my loss, before I could pardon his evil counsel. Within an hour after our departure, I commanded the Sails to be let down, and the Anchor cast: And though this Command seemed to be very odd, yet was it obeyed: And in the mean time not knowing what I would have, I grieved most excessively, sometimes for the absence of Alcionida, and sometimes for consenting unto so unjust a designe, and sometimes, I repented of my repentance, thinking that I was in no fault, and that it was rather an effect of my violent passion, then any disorder of my soul: and in the mean while, not being able to resolve whether I should come nearer the shore, or put further off; although I know both honour, and necessity doth require the latter, yet I could not do it, until I was assured Alcionida did know I loved her: so that I designed to write unto her, and send my Letter by one of my men in a little Cock-boat: I writ then, though Heaven knows with much ado, and if I be not very much mistaken, the words were these:

THRASIBULUS, to the fair ALCIONIDA.

I Have so many things to say, that I am much puzzled where to begin. But, Divine Alcionida, I wish you knew, that my affection unto you is in the highest extream: that my quality is not as it seemed: that my sorrows to leave you are unexpressible: that my consenting for a minute to displease you, will beget a miserable repentance in me, as long as I live: and though I durst not tell you as much, yet did I love you more then any tongue, indeed, can tell. You might perceive as much, me thinks, by the disorders of my soul: you, I say, whose judgment is so ingenious, and piercing, I beseech you, remember a Prince, who durst not Page 167 tell you his quality, unless he had acquainted you with his misfortunes also: Remember, that he departed from you with intentions to return, and to return the most passionate and faithful Lover in the world: but remember not, I beseech you, that I was a while your Ravisher, unless you remember at the same time I was your Deliverer: However, Madam, though perhaps you will not retain any thoughts of tenderness towards me, yet I beseech you do not think upon me with scorn, since it would be too much injustice to use him so, who adored you without telling it, departed from you without hope, and who shall love you as long as he lives, although you hate him.

After I had read this Letter over and over, unto which I did not subscribe my name, I was constrained to make use of Leosthenes to carry it; as well because he did extremely press me to pardon him for his evil counsel, as because he was very fit for such an expedition; and so as soon as night was come, he went to Gnides. Since there was a very good correspondence between him, and her whom he loved, she let him see Alcionida whether she would or no, and unknown unto Phedima; and also carried him into her Chamber without any asking. When Leosthenes gave her my Letter, she made a question whether she should read it: but after she had read it, she made a greater difficulty to answer it, being very angry against her Cousin for bringing him into her Chamber: Yet Leosthenes being very bold, told her, he would never go out of her Chamber as long as he lived without an Answer; so that to be rid of his importunity, she writ me these words.

ALCIONIDA unto the Illustrious Pirate.

Though I did beleieve all that you writ in your Letter to me, yet ought I not to answer it; or if I did answer, yet not so as would please you: Therefore I do declare unto you, that of all which you writ, I beleieve only one thing, which is, that you are not of that quality which people think you, and therefore I ask your pardon for all the incivilities which I offered unto you whilst you were here: I suppose you to be so just, as not to deny it: And I hope you will not take it ill, that one who is a professed Lover of Truth, do not make any answer unto so many incredibilities as your Letter is filled with: In the mean while be perswaded, that it is advantageous for you, that I do not beleieve it; and had it not been for the wilfulness of Leosthenes, you should not have seen under my hand the name of ALCIONIDA.

To be short Sir, Leosthenes returned, and brought me this Letter, which though it contained nothing but matter of indifferency; yet did it so much joy me, that I should hardly have gone from the Coast of Gnides before I had writ another Letter unto her, if a Tempest had not risen, and forced me to take up anchor, and put to open Sea. I went then to Milete, according to the advice of the wise Thales, and in my voyage I had the good fortune to meet two of the Ships which I had lost: but in exchange thereof, I had the bad fortune to hear the Prince of Phoeus was returned to Milete, as soon as Thimocrates was gone to render an account unto the Amphictions of all passages; and that this Prince had crossed all that Thimocrates had done in my favor; that he had established the Authority of Alexidesmus, and punished all those who desired to rebel, or expressed any zeal to my Party: So that my cross destinies driving me into despair, I was constrained to retire, and wander over all our Seas, not knowing well what course to take. I sent once again unto Gnides privately, to enquire what Euphranor would say at his return concerning my odd departure: for since there were many Ladies with Alcionida at that time when I left her in such haste, that I imagined the passage would be made known unto all the Town: In the conclusion, I understood that Euphranor was much amazed at the matter, and could not guess at my reason; and that things were in such a state, as that I could not return unto Gnides. So that being out of all hopes ever to see the face of my miserable fates to smile upon me, I conceived it impossible to gain the good opinion either of Alcionida, or her father. I gave my self over so desperately unto sorrow, that passing by Lesbos, I would not land there, but sent only to enquire of Tisanders health, and writ a Letter to him, which was left with the first Mariners I met in the Port; wherein I told him in general without naming Alcionida, that I was to ask his pardon, for condemning that passion in him, which at that present was most predominate in my self. After this I fell into the Hellispont, and then into Delphos, intending to consult with the Oracle; but when I came there, I was so full of fears to find what I sought for, that I could not resolve whether I should enquire Page 168 of it or no: In the mean while I fell sick, and that so violently, that I was not able to stir from thence in four Months: But at the last, when it was the pleasure of the Gods that I did recover, without ever praying unto them for it, but found so little pleasure in life, that I did not look upon death as an evil; then, I say, I imbarqued, and coming by Gnides, but landed not, I took this way: yet the winds were so contrary, that I was forced to leave Chios upon the right hand, whereas my intention was to pass between that Isle and the Isthmus of Gnides: and being carried by the winds, I met with four Ships in that Rode: Now since all the world were become my enemies, and since I was accustomed to make all those I met to vail their Bonnets, I would needs do so by these, but they would not: I looked upon their Flags, but knew them not, and I imagined that perhaps it might be the Prince of Phoeus disguised: After they refused to vail Bonnet, I assaulted them, and turning towards the greatest of the four, I gave her chase above an hour: since he had no disposition to fight, he betook himself wholly to his sails. but since my Ships were lighter then his, though greater, I came up to him, and fought him so sharply, that in less then half an hour I became Master of him: I was most encouraged to fight, by seeing my other Ships had burned one of their enemies, sunk another, and taken the last: So that notwithstanding all the resistance of those I fought with, I saw my victory was certain. All that were in the Ship having submitted themselves, I entered into her with my sword in my hand, having no other arms left, for I had not only darted many Javelins, but that only which had the name of Alcionida upon it, which I had kept since the day she was in my Ship. I entered then, and charged my Souldiers to commit no disorder: But going into a Cabin where I heard the voyce of women, I saw the fair Alcionida lying upon a bed, having a mortal paleness in her face, and her left arm naked and bloody, because a Javelin had run quite through it, and I saw also ten or twelve women crying about her, and durst not venture to draw this fatal Javelin out of her wound. You may imagine, Sir, what operation this object had upon my Soul: I came nearer her, and cried as loud as ever I could, that he who threw this Javelin should dye for it, if I could know who it was: I kneeled down at the side of her bed; I called for my Chyrurgions to come unto her; I took her fair and bloody arm in my hand, whilst all the women about her, not knowing me, were amazed. But oh Heavens, <◇> no sooner took her by the arm, but I knew that fatal Javelin to be the very same which had her most illustrious

Name upon it; and that it was my own self which darted it, at the first assaulting the Ship. Imagine, Sir, in what a desperate condition my Soul was in, when I saw it was my hand which wounded Alcionida; my amazement was so great, that not knowing what I did, I let her arm fall so rudely, that its own weight did almost bring the Javelin out: The pain of it did cause her to come out of her swoond, and to open her eyes just as the Chyrurgions entered. I, not being able to speak, made signs unto them, to help her; and looking for my sword with intention to run it through my own heart, I remembered Leosthenes had taken it up when I let it fall upon my first seeing Alcionida in that condition: I would have pulled it from him, but he would not part with it, telling me, that it were a thousand times better for me to help Alcionida, then desperately to ruine my self. I approached then nearer unto her bed; and seeing that since the Chyrurgions had pulled out the dart, she was very well come unto her self, I kneeled down before her, my sorrows being so great that I could not cry, (for those are but slight sorrows which can be expressed by tears:) Oh Madam, said I unto her, inflict what punishment you please upon that sacrilegious hand which wounded you; and do not think, that though I defer the execution for a little while, it is not with intentions of living long: No, Madam, I would only see you in a way of recovery, to the end you may see me dye, and that way expiate this horrid crime which I have committed. Alcionida was so surprized to see me, and hear me thus express my self, that though she had not been in so weak a condition as she was, she would not have been able to hold any long discourse; therefore not answering at all unto what I said, If I dye, said she unto me, I shall pardon you with all my heart; and also I entreat the Prince Tisander, if he be living, to pardon you, as well as I. The Prince Tisander, Madam? (said I with much wonder,) is he here? As she was about to answer, the Chyrurgions prevented her, and told me it would kill her if she spoke any more: so that hastily retiring, and leaving her with her women, I took her Cousin by the hand, and carrying her to the Chamber door, asked her what it was which Alcionida said unto me: But at the same time, some Souldiers which had taken Tisander in another Ship, brought him into mine, and he knowing that it was I which he had fought against, desired to speak with me; and when in entrance into the Ship he understood that Alcionida was wounded, he was in as desperate a case as I: Cruel Friend (said he in coming first to me) what a fatal adventure is befallen us? Give me leave rather to say (answered I) what a fatal adventure is mine? Ah, Page 169 said he, you are not to be pitied so much as I, for the thoughts of friendship are nothing so tender as those of love: Doubtless you love me, and will be sorry for fighting with me, and for being perhaps the cause of her death whom I most adore, and intend to marry. But (said I, and interrupted him) do you intend to marry this fair and most incomparable Lady? Yes, cruel Friend, answered he, and therefore imagine the sorrows of my Soul: But I beseech you, let me see this fair and unfortunate Lady. In saying so, he went into the Chamber where she was, and I with him, and he no sooner saw her, but taking her hand, kissing it, and also washing it with his tears, he expressed a hundred signs of sorrow and affection, which I durst not render unto her. She cast her eyes upon me, and doubtless did so plainly perceive the sorrows I endured, that she turned away her eyes and blushed. Tisander observing this, and fearing to be troublesom to her, went from her, imagining the alteration of her face to proceed from no other cause but the extremity of her pain. We asked the Chyrurgions what they thought of her: but they could not tell what judgment to give, until the second dressing, not yet knowing whether any of the Nerves were molested, or Veins cut. In the mean time I understood that Tisander, being cured of his passionate affection unto the fair and wise Sapho, did consent unto the marriage which the Prince his father had made up between him, and the fair Alcionida, before he knew her; and that as soon as ever he saw her, he was more in love with her, then ever he was with his first Mistress. I understood afterwards, that he did not know my Ship, because it had been newly trimmed up at Gnides; and since all the Banners and Flags which Leosthenes had set up for the entertainment of Alcionida did stand still, it was not possible Tisander could know it: Neither could I know his Ship, for since his intended marriage his Flags also were full of gallant devices, and other Motto's then he was accustomed to have. Since this Prince was really generous, and seeing me silent he did ask me pardon, if in the extremity of his sorrows, he had spoke any thing which was offensive to me. But I my self was so much disturbed in my mind, that I knew not what I should answer him: But I gave orders, that all his men should be set at liberty, and treated as my own: however, the sight of this Prince was insufferable to me, since I understood he was to be the husband of Alcionida, and I could not resolve to go out of his Ship, because I could not depart from her: yet not being in freedom to grieve in her presence, I went into my own, under a pretence of giving out some orders, and went into my own Cabin, with a mind so full of sorrows, that I was a hundred times ready to throw my self into the Sea, and there bury my self and all my misfortunes together; but there was a kind of secret chain which linked me to Alcionida, that restrained me, and kept me alive: And being alone with Leosthenes, I began to descant upon the strangeness of my misfortunes; and my mind being a little more quiet then before, Confess with me, Leosthenes, said I unto him, that I was born under a most malignant Constellation; for if you look upon the present condition of my fortune, you may therein find miseries enough to make a hundred men unfortunate: Were it only the inconsideration of my sorrows for fighting with my friend, and hurting her whom I infinitely loved, I deserved compassion; though for nothing but to find my Friend my Rival, I had cause enough to grieve for it extremely; were it for nothing else but to find my Mistress enjoyed by another, I were most worthy of pity; and were it for nothing but wounding with my own hand that Lady for whom only I desire to live, all my tears are too few to lament the sadness of the accident: But having in one day fought with my Friend, wounded her I loved, found him to be my Rival, heard my Mistress is to be married, and my own hand putting her in danger of death; Ah Leosthenes, these are too many miseries to be endured, and it would be as base as impossible for me to live under the weight of them: For indeed, what can I do? I must not hate my Rival, since he is both my Friend and my Benefactor: I never dare speak any more of my passion unto her who first did cause it: my Soul is out of all hopes; my Love cannot now be innocent; I dare not hereafter find any fault with her: I have no reason to accuse Tisander; I have not power to acknowledge my passion unto him, and it were in vain if I should, since he is the husband of Alcionida: In one word, I am in as deplorable a condition at ever any Lover possible can be: But alas, what do I say? and what would I do? I speak as if Alcionida were not wounded, and wounded by my own hand, and that perhaps mortally. Oh most cruel thought (said I,) canst thou ever suffer that prophane hand which did it, to be employed in any thing but reaching a Dagger to my heart? But Sir (said Leosthenes unto me,) you are not in any fault; it was a meet chance which gave Alcionida that fatal wound. After this I stood a long while silent, and my mind was so filled with variety of different thoughts, that I was not Master of my self. If she dye (said I) I must follow her into the grave; if she recover, still I must dye, for she recovers only for Tisander; who is already her husband, and ever must be; he who perhaps Page 168 <1 page duplicate> Page 169 <1 page duplicate> <2 pages missing> Page 172 though Tisander had not been in love with her as he was, yet might he well perceive I was, by the disorder of my soul which appeared in my eyes: so that he could not possible be ignorant of it; and he stood between us in such a silent Dilemma, that none durst interrupt him. Alcionida averted her looks from me, and I did court hers, whilst Tisander observing us both, did discover that Secret which I would have locked up in my heart. After we had been an hour with Alcionida, Tisander impatiently desiring to clear his suspicions, told me in most civil language, that it was convenient to leave her at rest that day; and moved me to go out with him into his Chamber. I was no sooner there, but seeing none in presence; I beseech you, my dear Thrasibulus, said he unto me, Tell me one thing truly, which I much desire to know? Since it was long before I answered, and he suspected that I would disguise the truth; Nay, do not go about to colour the matter, said he, for perhaps, I do not stand in need of your help in the knowledg of it. If so, said I unto him, why do you desire to know that from me, which you know already? Because, replied he, I desire to be infallibly certain, whether or no, I am so unfortunate as to be the cause of this deep melancholy, which I perceive in your mind; Tell me, my dear Thrasibulus, Has not the sympathy of your humour with mine caused us both to love one Lady? and am not I so unfortunate as to deprive you of Alcionida? I do confess, that what resolutions soever I had taken, not to reveal unto Tisander the reason of my passion, yet now it was impossible for me to disguise it: I was so non-plust at these questions, and my eyes were so troubled, that my face did so betray the thoughts of my heart, as this Prince not doubting any longer, did cry out with extream generosity, and most sensible sorrow; Alas, my dear Thrasibulus, how sad is my soul, that my felicity should be your misfortune: for since we both of us do love one and the same Lady, we shall both of us be miserable all the days of our lives. That would not be just, (said I unto him, and sighed, my heart melting at his obliging discourse) and therefore, ask me no more: Believe, if you can, that it is ambition only which is the burden of my soul; Imagine your self happy, and that I am still the same insensible Thrasibulus, who condemned you for loving the fair Sapho: and quietly enjoy your felicity in the Divine Alcionida. I confess, that being transported with the excess of sorrows, that notwithstanding the friendship between us, I did not rejoyce at your satisfaction: all that reason and remembrance of that friendship could do, was, to oblige me not to disturb it. I ask your pardon, generous Thrasibulus; but withall, I beseech you remember in my excuse, that I loved Alcionida before you did, and must love her as long as I live, perhaps more then you: for since she was the first, so doubtless she shall be the last that shall ever move my passion. But least this confession should too much incense you, let me tell you, that as my love of her, is so purely innocent, that it cannot be offensive either unto her virtue, or our friendship, or the Gods themselves, so also is it so extremely violent, that I cannot endure her sight, or yours: for so miserable do I esteem my self, that now I am past all hopes of Alcionida's love. Since your passion is so purely innocent, as you tell me, and since also I do believe it (answered he) I will promise you so great a share in the friendship of Alcionida, that though it cannot make you absolutely happy, yet at the least it may afford you some consolation: for since she knew you, it is impossible, but she must needs esteem you, and therefore I shall hope she will love you for my sake. Therefore, my dear Thrasibulus, though you cannot be compleatly happy, yet do not you render your self absolutely miserable; nor by your misfortunes interrupt my happiness. I do once more declare, said I unto him, that the glorious luster of Alcionida's fair eyes, which has enflamed my soul, is as pure and splendent as the rays of the Sun: But yet, most generous Tisander, you must needs know, if you know how to love, that though a Lover do not always enjoy the beauty of a beloved and adored Mistress, yet would he have the sole and absolute possession of her whole heart and mind to himself: so that since I cannot desire so great a happiness without a wrong to you, nor indeed, never hope for it: I have no way but to die, and let you live happily. But that I can never do, replied he, if you do not live happily as well as I: Then are we both most unfortunate, said I unto him. Time, said Tisander, may perhaps produce some remedy which you cannot think of. Since those remedies, said I unto him, are commonly long in curing, I do not think, I can stay the issue, & I believe death would sooner work the cure then time. However, I beseech you think, that if you had not forced me to discover my misfortune unto you, you should never have known it: But since you screwed out that secret which I desired to hide, it is but just in you to rid your self of a vexatious Rival, who shall be always a disturber of your happiness. When I doted upon Sapho, replied he, I did not think it possible ever to be cured of that tormenting passion which possessed me, yet her rigour to me, her compliance with another, and the all commanding charms of Alcionida, has made her most indifferent unto me. It is not so with me, said I unto him, for though I believe Page 173 Alcionida loves you, and most certainly know she will never love me, yet can I not banish her from my heart. But for your part (said I with a most incensed mind) perhaps you can quit Alcionida for another, as you quit Sapho for her; and I shall perhaps hereafter hear, that the same which would be my heaven of felicity, is not so to you. But most inconstant and unjust Friend, said I, if ever you leave adoring this divine Lady, you will be the most undeserving man that lives. I had no sooner spoken this, but I repented; and found by his milde answer, that he would love Alcionida as long as he had life; however, he gave me such sweet and generous language, that he allayed my anger against him, and I began to long until night did separate us, that I might enjoy my own private thoughts, and at last we parted. Tisander was informed by some or other of the time when I was at Gnides: He understood from one of Alcionida's women, how I caused her to get hastily out of my Ship: However, we were both of us the next day much perplexed: I durst not ask him how Alcionida did; and yet I could not forbear; nor durst I go to see her: And Tisander, I think, as generous as he was, had variety of resentments of it, in one and the same day: yet since he enjoyed the happiness, and was well satisfied concerning the virtue of Alcionida, it was an easier matter for him, then for me, to transact with Reason: He was so generous as not to take any notice of a hundred follies which I expressed unto him, and to speak unto me always with much affection. But that there might want nothing to make up the full measure of my misfortunes, it chanced that I being in a Chamber of his Ship which joyned unto Alcionida's, I saw her there, she not knowing I was in that place, or thinking that all the partitions of a Ship being made of planks only, one might easily hear all that was spoken out of the one into the other.

Since Alcionida was now much better then she was before, Tisander thought it convenient to acquaint her with my desperate condition, to the end she might not hereafter be surprized at it, or else perhaps to discover her real thoughts of me: I heard him ask her, how I carried my self at Gnides? what she thought of me? whether she really thought I was a Pirate? and, as I verily think, fearing lest she should take a displeasure at all these questions, he told all he knew concerning my passion, which did so much surprize her, that she could not make any answer: Yet since she perceived Tisander knew more then her self, she told him sincerely what she beleaved concerning my Quality, and partly what she knew concerning my Love. Then he desired her to tell him whether she had any good esteem of me or no; and she answered so obligingly in my behalf, that I thought my self then much more miserable then I was before. In conclusion, he conjured her to comply with me, as a man whom of all the world he loved most. Your desire, said she unto him, is too dangerous for me to consent unto; not but that I dare trust my self well enough with him, but because I dare not trust you. Tisander did then protest a thousand times unto her, that he would never be jealous. Yet notwithstanding all his earnest importunities, she could not consent unto it: For indeed, said she, if the Prince Thrasibulus do not love me, he may easily forbear my sight; and if he do love me, he were most inhumane to continue his passion; Therefore, Sir, I conjure you to solicit me no more. When he was gone out, I heard Alcionida call one of her women which she loved very dearly, and commanded her to reach a Cabinet, which she opened, and took out many Letters, for I found out a little hole in the partitions of this Chamber, through which I could see all she did: amongst many other Letters she found that which I had writ unto her, which I knew very well; and she commanded this woman to take this Letter, and to tear it all in pieces, and when it was dark to throw it into the Sea. Why Madam (said this woman unto her, who used to be very free with her) is it a greater fault to keep it to morrow, then it was yesterday? The reason is, replied she, because I must banish out of my heart the remembrance of that Princes affection, which without a crime I might have preserved, when I thought I should never see him again: but now, since he is here, I must not do so: I must not look upon him as a Lover of Alcionida, but only as a Friend of Tisanders. What odd adventures do the Fates produce (said she,) why did they send Thrasibulus unto Gnides, only to be miserable, and to make me restless? Not because I do not esteem my self happy in the marriage of Tisander, but because I wish with all my heart that the Prince Thrasibulus were not so unfortunate: Yet did they both of them see the secrets of my heart, Tisander would be less pleased, and Thrasibulus would be more miserable: For the truth is, the reason why I did oppose my marriage with Tisander, was because I had some hopes that Thrasibulus would return unto Gnides in such a quality as he told me; and that I might innocently follow my inclination not to hate him: Yet as the case is now, I must suppress those thoughts (said she and sighed,) and therefore do as I bid you; to the end I may if I can preserve my heart solely for Tisander, and remember Thrasibulus no more. I leave it unto you, Sir, to judg what joy and what sorrow this expression of Page 174Alcionida did infuse into me: The sorrow did so much triumph over the joy, and that cruel resolution to forget me did so pierce my heart, that against my will I made a great noise; and since I was so near, that I almost touched the side of her bed, certainly she heard me, for she was silent presently upon it, and questionless was sorry she had been so loud in her discourse; and I beleieve, I should have spoke to her through the partition, had I not heard some enter in|to her Chamber: So that the knowledg that I was not hated, and that I must for ever be miserable, did drive me into such horrid despair, that I suffered inexpressable torments of mind. In the mean time Tisander, who did really love me, came to seek me, and carried me into the Chamber of Alcionida, entreating me, and earnestly conjuring me, to content my self with her friendship and esteem. I went with him, and at my entrance I heard her charge the wolman whom she spoke unto, to do as she appointed her: This made me change colour, and look so seriously upon her, that she dejected her eyes. I shall tell you, Sir, what our Conference was, for I think there was never three persons did love one another so well, and were all three so discontented as we were. Tisander did most passionately love Alcionida, and he loved me also very well: but yet because I loved her he did, I perceived that either out of his compassion unto me, or out of some other considerations mingled with it, he did not delight in my company. Alcionida did questionless love Tisander, and did not hate me; but because my passion could not any longer appear innocent, and since Tisander was not ignorant of it, her mind was extremely unquiet. For my part, I had as high an esteem of friendship for Tisander as possible I was capable of, and I loved Alcionida more then my tongue can tell; but since my Friend was owner of this inestimable Treasure, and since he knew I loved her, and since I knew that Alcionida was fully resolved absolutely to forget me, that I was not able either to begin discourse, or answer unto any: But indeed I went out of the Chamber with some kind of consolation, though it be not ordinary to leave her one loves without much sorrow. But Sir, not to abuse your patience too much, give me leave to tell you, that we arrived at Lesbos and Mitilenes, where the joy was a little clouded by the news of that sad accident which happen|ed unto the fair Alcionida. Yet since she was quite out of all danger, the magnificent Solem|nities of her entrance were deferred but for a few days. The wise Prince of Mitilenes re|ceived his fair daughter with much joy; but for my part, when I saw her go out of the Ship, it is most impossible to express my thoughts. I forgot one thing which chanced, that was a great addition of sorrow unto me, which was, That Tisander, the better to take order that Alcionida might be received into the Port with Ceremony, went out of his own Ship into one of mine, which was an admirable good Sailer, that he might be at Lesbos an hour or two before us, telling and embracing me, that he would commit the Guardian-ship of his only Treasure unto me: As soon as he was gone, I had so great a desire to entertain Alcionida once more in private, that without sending to ask any leave, I entered into her Chamber; thinking since I understood from her own mouth that she did not hate me, though she resolved to forget me, that I might presume upon so much boldness. I found her sitting upon her bed, most magnificently dressed, though she had her arm in a Scarf: I beseech you, Madam, pardon me, said I unto her, for assuming so much boldness; but indeed, Madam, I am so unfortunate in every thing else, that I hope you will not deny me so much consolation in my misery, as to speak once more in my life unto you. The Prince Tisander loves you so dearly well, replied she and blushed, that I should incur his displeasure, if I should refuse you that which civility only bids me consent unto. I conjure you, Madam, in the name of the Gods (said I unto her, seeing none with her but that woman which I knew to be her Confident) to grant me this honour for my own sake, and let me not be beholding unto that Prince for this favor, unto whom I am already so much engaged and loaded with his generosity: Never fear, Madam, that I shall speak any thing that shall either offend you or the Prince Tisander; No, no, Madam, as violent as my affection is to you, I am not guilty of any criminal thoughts: but since I must shortly for ever lose you, it is not just you should refuse me that innocent favor, since it is the last I shall ever ask you. As a Friend unto the Prince my Husband, replied she, you may hope for any thing from me; but as a Lover of Alcionida, never expect any thing. It is in this last named qualification, Madam, said I unto her, that I hope to obtain my desire of you. Why ask me nothing then, said she, for certainly you shall be denied, and that with abundance of anger: Though the Prince were not your Friend, as he is, yet the respect which you ought to have un|to me, should restrain you from any such expressions as these. Why, Madam, said I unto her, do you chide me, before you know what I will ask? What you have already said, replied she, is sufficient cause of complaint against you. I know not whether I am ill interpreted (said I unto her,) but I am most certain that my thoughts are purely innocent: For indeed, divine Page 175Alcionida, I desired nothing now, but that you would in my presence be pleased to revoke that unjust and cruel sentence which you pronounced against me in the very same place you now are in, when in giving unto this woman here that Letter which I took the boldness to write unto you, with orders to tear it and throw it into the Sea; moreover, you then most cruelly said, you were resolved to forget me absolutely for ever: Madam, I heard this unjust and dire doom, and now I hope for a Revocation. Alcionida was so amazed to hear this, and to remember that she heard a noise, which made her know I heard her, that she durst hardly so much as look upon me. Did you then hear what I said? (said she.) Yes, Madam, replied I, I did hear; and being more just then you, it shall never out of my memory. I ask you not (said she, and was much ashamed) how you durst be so bold; but methinks, if you well consid|er the sence of my words, you may conclude that your procedure ought to disoblige me. My Reason, said I unto her, is not so free as to act with so much prudence: but I am sure my love prompts me to desire a little room in your remembrance: This Madam, methinks, is no such unreasonable request, and you may well grant so much unto him who has consecrated un|to you every minute of his life. After Alcionida was a little more recollected, Sir (said she un|to me with abundance of sorrow in her eyes) this your curiosity to discover my thoughts will cost you very dear, if you love me; for I do profess I cannot endure the sight of you, since you know so much of me: Perhaps, if you had still continued ignorant of those thoughts which my heart had of you, I should have let the Prince Tisander enjoy your company, as he desired me: But since you understand my heart so well, and have told me of it, it is absolutely impossible for me to consent unto it: I cannot look upon you without a blush; and perhaps I shall hate you, out of fear only of loving you too well, and because I cannot be indifferent enough to|wards you. Alas, Madam (cried I out unto her) what injustice is this which you do me? Injust Prince, replied she, what reason have you to tell me of any such things, as I cannot hear without a crime, and which I will never hear after this day? That is long enough, said I unto her, for I beleieve I shall not live much longer: Be therefore so good as to tell me, that you should not have hated me, if Fortune had done as much for me, as she has done for Tisander. Alcionida, Sir, was so full of modesty, that she could not consent unto this desire: But in con|clusion, being moved thereunto by my sighs and tears, I confess, said she, that of all the persons I know, you are he whom I had the greatest inclination to esteem; and if it had been the pleasure of the Gods, I should have thought my self very happy in contributing to your felicity; yet since it is not, but that I am wife unto a Prince who doubtless deserves all my affections, I will use all the means I can to root out of my heart that tenderness and opinion which I had of you, and which yet, whether I will or no, remains in it. Oh Madam, I conjure you by all that's sacred, said I, not to do so; and I will promise you never to importunate you any more as long as I live, so you will promise me some little room in your memory: Let Tisander solely enjoy you; let your beauty and your heart be only his; and reserve only for me one of those secret and solitary thoughts which useth to beget a pleasing melancholy in those who ad|mit of it: Think sometimes, most divine Lady, that all the while Tisander enjoys his happi|ness, the miserable Thrasibulus endures as many torments, as that fortunate husband tastes felicities: Alas, Madam, it is no unreasonable demand, to ask three or four minutes in a day in re|embrance of a man who as I told you before has devoted every minute of his life to think on you. Those three or four minutes which you desire, is too much for my honour to grant; and you may assure your self, that if I could, I would banish you out of my memory as well as my heart, but one cannot command ones memory as one will; and perhaps, said she, and blushed, you will forget me, and I shall remember you whether I would or no. Alcionida pronounced these last words with so much charming confusion in her face, that I kneeled to render thanks; but she repenting of what she had said, and did so seriously forbid me ever to speak any more of my passion unto her, and never desire to have any private conference with her, that I saw very plainly it was her real and resolute mind to have it so: and I obtained yet one quarter of an hours audience longer, during which time I could hardly move her to return any answer unto me, and during which I did nothing but sigh, and look upon her, and conjure her not to forget me; I had the comfort to see some signs of sorrow and tenderness in her eyes, and had some hopes of remaining in her memory whether she would or no: In the mean while we were come so near the Port, that all I could do was to reclaim my mind, and fit it for such company as would discourse of nothing but joy. I shall not relate, Sir, all the pas|sages of this Ceremony; for I had no share in this publique Joy, but was rather a very trouble unto Tisander, who was most really sensible of my sorrows, and was a Partaker of my mis|ery, especially when he saw I was resolved to depart from Lesbos, and stay there no longer. He Page 176 set the Prince his Father upon me, to use all his perswasions and motives to cause my stay in Mitilenes, until such time as it pleased the Gods to afford me some ways to reconquer my Domi|nions: but all was in vain; and I departed not well knowing whither to go, as soon as my ships were furnished with all manner of necessities, and as soon as two ships of his which he would needs give me were fit to put to Sea. Since my own miseries did teach me how to compassionate them in others, I would not suffer Leosthenes to follow my fortunes; but I left him with Alcionida's Cousin with whom he was in love, and recommended him unto the Prince Tisander, as a man of good quality, and much merit.

I shall not trouble you, Sir, with any relation, of how I parted from this generous Rival, who shed tears that his good fortune should be my misery: for it would be impossible, but I should blush for shame in relating unto you the obduracy of my heart towards him, though he had obli|ged me by a thousand sweet expressions of love unto me; nor shall I relate what adieu I bad unto the fair Alcionida, since I had not so much as the consolation to see her charming eyes in taking my leave of her, because she kept her bed that day, and since there was many in her Chamber, I did see her but one minute, and in much disorder: so I departed without this sad satisfaction, and imbarqued with unequalled despair. My most tormenting thought was, that Alcionida was enjoyed by one whom I was obliged to love; for had he been my mortal enemy, I should not have been so extremely miserable, since then I might have had some comfort in revenge. But the merit of the Prince Tisander did most extremely grieve me also; for I thought it impossible, but Alcionida must love him, and I wished with all my heart, that she had married a man whom she hated. Indeed, there was not one phantastical, melancholy, violent, or extraordinary thought, which love did not infuse into my heart. After this, ambition became no torment unto me; for since I cared not for my life, I never valued a Scepter: so that without any thoughts, but of my misfortunes, and of the fair Alcionida, I wandered up and down the Seas, until driven by a tempest, I came to Sinope, when the King of Assyria was there with the Princess Mandana; and there remained until you came and found me on your enemies side without any designe of mine to be so. After this, Sir, you know my life, and that nothing observable has befallen it but your own goodness in a thousand testimonies of affection to me, whereof I am most unworthy.

But Sir, in the fight the other night, at the bottom of the Mountains, I came unto a place where I saw a man courageously defending himself against ten or twelve Souldiers, who pressed upon him; I made all the haste I could up to them, to prevent his being killed; who knowing me, cried out, That Tisander wil• yield himself unto none, but the Prince Thrasibulus: you may well imagine, Sir, that this name did much surprize me, and that I no sooner heard it, but forbidding the souldiers to fight any longer, I went unto him, but found him so wound|ed, that presently after he fell, and I was forced to hold him up. I knew another prisoner also whom the souldiers had taken to be Leosthenes, whom I left at Lesbos, and who was not wounded: so that promising to pay those souldiers their ransom, for those two prisoners whom they had taken, I caused the Prince Tisander to be brought hither, who expressed so much affection unto me, that I were not worthy to live, if I were not moved with it. Mean while, I understood by Leosthenes, how reports going, that Craessus King of Lidia, would fall upon the Islands, the Prince of Mitilene, went unto him, intending to dissuade him from that deisigne, as indeed he did: so that Pittacus taking his side, left the Prince his Son, and Leosthenes at Sardis, where they made as great preparations of war, as if Craessus would conquer all Asia, though none knew what his designe was. I understood also that this Prince had a desire to engage the Milesians to his party, but the wise Thales did oppose it: I understood also from Leosthenes, that the Prince Tisander knowing that Craessus would send unto the King of Armenia, desired that imployment, and obtained it, chusing rather to travel, since he must needs be from Alcionida, then to stay in a Court so gallant as it was. So that coming to Artax|ates just as you came thither, he was shut up in it; and was forced to follow the King of Ar|menia into the Mountains, conceiving he might more easily escape from thence, then out of Artaxates, if he stayed in it. And indeed, his designe was to escape at this time, when he was so dangerously wounded, and to go and render an account of his negotiation unto the King of Lidia. Leosthenes told me further, that the Affairs at Milete had much changed faces: for Anthemius, who never set up Alexidesmus, but only to ruine him, had brought his designe <◇> pass, having stirred all the people against him: so that he was forced to retire to Phoc <...> with his mother, his wife, and Philodicea: So that now Milete, was as a free Town, whe <...> popular Government was begun to be established: Notwithstanding Thales, and all my friend• did resist this new alteration, yet Leosthenes told me, the fear was, that if the people were Page 177 once accustomed unto liberty, they would never receive any Master again; and he told me al|so, that in the mean time, the Prince of Phoeceus was combining with all his Neighbour Prin|ces to promote the interest of Alexidesmus. But, Sir, Dare I after all this tell you, that Le|osthenes, who had married her he loved, told me, that Alcionida was never so fair as now? and will you excuse my weakness, if I neglect all my State affairs, to discourse of such things as only concerns my love?

Cyrus seeing Thrasibulus had no more to tell him, did express much grief for his misfor|tunes: and resolved to apply all expedient remedies for the satisfaction of his ambition: for as concerning matters of love, my dear Thrasibulus, (said he unto him) it must be the same hand which wounded, must cure you: And though Tisander be your Rival, yet I find him so worthy of assistance, that I extreemly commend you for your cares of him. As Cyrus was adv|singing Thrasibulus of such expedients, as he thought best for the recovery of his Dominions, Leosthenes entered into the Tent very hastily. Sir, said he to Cyrus, who understood all lan|guages, I ask your pardon for my bold interruption: but the Prince Tisander being at the last gasp, I thought it fit to advertise the Prince Thrasibulus of it: At the last gasp, replied Cyrus, Yes, Sir, replied Leosthenes, for having a great desire to write, notwithstanding all my endeav|ours to dissuade him: as he ended his Letter, all his wounds opened, and he lost so much blood, that he fell into abundance of weakness, and swooning, is not yet come unto himself. Thrasibulus did then ask leave of Cyrus, to go and assist his most faithful friend, and Rival, whom he could not love in one respect, nor could not hate in another. But Cyrus calling to mind the high valour of this Prince, would also go himself: As they entered into the Tent, the Chyrurgeons had revived him out of his swoond, yet with such small hopes of life, that they told Cyrus, who asked what they thought, he could not out-live that day: yet since he had a free mind, and a great soul, he was not at all terrified at the looks of death: and he carried it as one that was worthy to be Son unto such a Prince, who was reputed the wisest in all Greece: He patiently submitted unto the wills of the Gods, and neither asking death, nor life, he prepa|red himself for the first of these with most admirable tranquility of mind, and was contented to leave the other with unparalleld contentedness: he knew Cyrus, as soon as he came in; so that addressing himself unto him, Sir, said he, you see the Gods have punished me for lifting up my hand against so illustrious a life as yours, since it had been much more glorious for me to have died by the invincible hand of Artamenes, then by the Souldiers of great Cyrus. It is also more advantagious to the Prince Thrasibulus, said he, that I die, since then he would not be so miserable as he is. Cyrus answered him with all possible civility, and would have infused some hopes of recovery, notwithstanding all the Chyrurgions said: But Tisander inter|rupting him, No no, Sir, said he, I cannot live, and therefore, I beseech you, let me imploy the last minuts of my life in remembrance of one, who in causing my highest happiness, has made my dearest friend most miserable: In saying so, he turned his head towards Thrasibu|ulus, and giving him the Letter which he had let fall after he had writ it, and which was giv|en unto him again upon his coming to himself. Here, my dear Thrasibulus, said he unto him, take this, and I make you my Executour of my last Will; give it if you please unto our dearest Alcionida: and since I did not murmur, when I heard her bestow some sighs for your mis|fortunes, so I beseech you do not murmur when she bestows some tears in memory of my death: since I shall no longer be an obstacle unto your happiness, let me have the integrity of your friendship: and look not upon me any more as your Rival: I do acknowledge you merit Alcionida more then I, and I will do that which fortune would not, I give up all my interest in her unto you: In pronouncing these last words Tisander blusht, and tears trickled from his eyes; so that Thrasibulus being extreemly moved with the generosity of his friend, and not being able to contain his sorrows, he came nearer him, and taking him by the hand, Live most generous Prince, said he, and be assured that I will never more envy your enjoyment of the incomparable Alcionida: Indeed, I shall ever love her, but it shall be as she is yours without any other pretence unto her: No, no, replied the weak Tisander, that must never be: Live you, and let me die; all the favour I ask, is, that you will sometimes speak of me unto my dear Alcionida: Let me have this last satisfaction, my dear Thrasibulus, and I will leave you an unvaluable Treasure in the Person of Alcionida: for her soul has an hundred thousand more shining beauties, then her face: But in recompence of so rich a Present, promise me here in the presence of Illustrious Cyrus, that you will tell her, I value not the loss of life, or Gran|dure, or kindred, or any thing in the world, but only her: and that I find no bitterness in death, but only my sorrows to leave her: and when you have done this, enjoy her quietly all the rest of your life: and live happy longer then I have done. Thrasibulus was so grieved to Page 178 see his Friend in this condition, that his love, which was wont to triumph over any other thought, was now forced to submit unto his sorrow; and to lie hid in the bottom of his heart without any discovery upon this sad occasion. He promised Tisander then to perform all his Commands in most grieving expressions, and testified such real marks of tenderness, that none would ever thought Tisander had been Rival to Thrasibulas. In the mean while, this weak Prince, growing more feeble upon a sudden, dyed, and desiring to say something more con|cerning Alcionida, he pronounced her name, and left all those who saw him dye in such adm|ration of his Constancy, and so molified with his discourse, that had he been a prime Friend unto every one in particular, he could not have moved more sorrows. As soon as the Prince Tisander had fetched his last breath, and no signs of life appeared, Cyrus carried Thrasibulus out of the Tent whether he would or no, and left Theosthenes to take all requisite orders for Tisanders Funeral, which Cyrus would have most magnificently performed: Having then carried Thrasibulus into his own Pavilion, he took the Letter which was directed unto Al|cionida, and which was open; then with the consent of Thrasibulus he found written these words:

Dying TISANDER to his dearest ALCIONIDA.

I Am so near my Death, that I cannot possibly say much unto you: Let me in a few words conjure you to beleeve, that I did love you beyond all expressions, and that I dye full of the same affection, and fuller then ever any, except the Prince Thrasibulus: You know he is my second self, and so receive him; I give him all my share in your heart, for he deserves it; Love him then for the love of me, and force him to love my memory, for the love of you; and as far as it is possible, let both of you love that Prince in his grave, who whilst he lived loved none but you; and when he dyed, you were the only thoughts of TISANDER.

As Cyrus was of a most apprehensive and compassionate Soul, so his heart was extreemly tendered at the reading of this Letter: And Thrasibulus himself, notwithstanding all the hopes he might conceive by the death of his Friend, was most really grieved. All possible care was taken, to render the last honours of Burial with all Ceremony befitting a man of his quality: Cyrus himself, the King of Phrigia, the King of Hircania, and every Prince in the Army, were Mourners, and expressed all testimonies of esteem unto the honour of Prince Tisander. After this, Cyrus told Thrasibulus, that both the affairs of his Dominions, and those concern|ing his Love, did require his sudden return unto Milete, and unto Lesbos. Then he went to give out Orders concerning the present Affair. In the mean time, the Prince Phraartes return|ing to the King his Father, found all things in a lamentable condition, because their Virtuals would not last above two days, though the King of Armenia to keep up the hearts of his Souldiers did make a shew as if they had enough for a Month, hoping always that Ciaxares would be weary, and draw off from Artaxates. Phraartes then, seeing things in that condition, told the King his Father, that there was a necessity of having recourse unto the clemency of the Conqueror, since force was in vain; and the more to merit his favour, he thought it mst expedient to tell Ciaxares with all ingenuity whether the Princess Mandana and the King of Pont were in his Dominions or no: That as for the Tribute demanded, though it were just to pay what's promised, yet he knew that the principal cause of the War was the Princess Mandana; so that if he had her in his hands, he might easily free himself from the Tribute by restoring her unto the King her father; and that if he had her not, then he ought to make it so apparent, as neither Ciaxares or Cyrus might doubt of it. The King then protested unto Phraartes, that he never knew the King of Pont or the Princess Mandana were ever in Ar|menia; And that the Princess Araminta being in his Dominions, had certainly raised that opi|nion of the Princess Mandana's being here. Phraartes told the King his father, that as he had promised, so he must needs acquaint Cyrus with the truth of all this: But the Souldiers being in a great Mutiny, would needs see all the Magazines of Victual before the Prince Phraartes departed; there was such a great disorder amongst them, that they all forsook their Guards: So that if the most generous Cyrus would have violated his faith, and taken that advantage, he might easily entered the Mountains, and killed all those that fled thither for sanctuary; for it was easie to be discerned from the Plains, how they dispersed themselves in the Mountains without any order, or any Arms: But he did most inviolably observe whatsoever he promised; but looked upon this disorder without taking that advantage, or knowing the true cause of it. Page 179 But in conclusion, the King of Armenia resolved to trust unto the generosity of Cyrus, and put himself into his hands. He sent therefore the Prince Phraartes before, appeasing the Sou|ldiers, by assuring them that he went to make Peace. This Prince returning then unto the Camp, and being conducted unto the Tent of Cyrus, where was the King of Assyria, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Cadusians, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, Aglatidas, and many others; he told him, how extreemly sorry he was that he was not able to tell him any news concerning the Princess Mandana, of whom the King his father had no knowledge: For Sir, said he to Cyrus, to shew you that he is most sincere, I need tell you no more, but that trusting absolutely in the goodness of the Medean King and your generosity, I have perswaded him to descend from these Mountains, with the Queen my Mother, the Prin|cesses my Sisters, the Princess Onesila, wife of Tigranes my Brother, whom heretofore you have honoured with your friendship: You may very well judge by this, Sir, said he unto him, that if he had the Princess Mandana in his power, he would not have done thus. When Cy|rus had well considered upon it, he was most extreemly grieved, that there was no hopes of finding Mandana: The King of Assyria was as deeply wounded as he; yet imagining that perhaps she might still be in Armenia, though this Prince was ignorant of it, a most strict search was resolved upon in lieu of a bloody War.

In the mean while Cyrus sent in all haste unto Ciaxares, to acquaint him with the reports of Phraartes, and to ask him whether he should bring the King of Armenia unto him: But Ciaxares being not well that day, sent him word that he absolutely referred all unto him, and that he should do as he himself thought most expedient. Cyrus having this answer, received the King of Armenia, and all his Royal Family, into his Tent; and observing a discreet me|diocrity in his civilities, there appeared in his discourse and actions all the sweetness of a cle|ment Prince, and all the Majesty of a Conqueror: The King of Armenia seemed a greater Prince in his misery, then he did in his better fortunes; for indeed he spoke with much boldness and generosity upon this occasion: for since Cyrus was much perplexed at the bad news which he received, he could not forbear some expressions of anger, for being engaged in this War, and losing so much time as might have been more advantageously employed in the search of Mandana some other way. This being the condition of things, the Prince Tigranes, who was recovered of his sickness, and understanding the bad condition of the King his fathers affairs, resolved absolutely to trust unto the generosity of Cyrus, and came unto his Tent; where with sorrow he saw the King his father, the Queen his mother, the Prince his brother, the Princesses his sisters, and the admired Onesila his wife, whose beauty did dazzle all those eyes that looked upon her: As soon as he appeared, Cyrus received him with many expressions of civility towards him; yet since he was upon a business of great importance, he held no long discourses, but following his intention, Why Sir (said he to the King of Armenia) did you not return a more clear answer unto the King whom I serve, when he sent unto you to demand the Princess his daughter? and why did you make him think she was in your power? My Reason was, replied he, because I thought he did not believe she was in my power; and that he did but seek for a pretence to colour his War, and thereby move me to pay that Tribute which I formerly payed unto Astiages. But, replied Cyrus, do you not think that Tribute due, and that you ought not to pay it? Yes, answered he; but desire of Liberty, and also to leave my children absolute and free, moved me unto that injustice which would have been glorious if it had succeeded well. If you were in the King of Medes case, said Cyrus, and a Prince your Vassal should have done as you did, what would you have done? If I should act according to the Rules of Policy (replied this Prince without any amazement) I should so disable him from having any power to hurt me, that I would leave him no more but a desire to do it: But if I would merit that Reputation which at this day Cyrus enjoys, and keep it when I had gotten it, I would pardon that Prince; and of a rebellious Vassal, I would make him my grateful Friend. Be then so unto the King of Medes, replied Cyrus, but be sure you be most really so, lest you should find the fury of a puissant and justly incensed Prince. The King of Armenia was so much surprized to hear him speak in that manner, as he was afraid he had misunderstood him: Therefore Cyrus had the leisure to turn towards the Prince Tigranes, and smiling asked him most obligingly in spite of his melancholy, what Ransom he would give to free the Princess Onesila his wife? My life, Sir, answered Tigranes hastily; for since there is nothing in the world so dear unto me as she, I ought to offer no less. Mean while, the King of Armenia perceiving by the acclamations of the people, that he was rightly understood, began to express his gratitude and acknowledgments unto Cyrus; who to let him see that he was at liberty, belgan to treat all these Princesses with wonderful civility, and appointed Coaches to come and Page 180 carry them unto Artaxates. Sir, said the King of Armenia unto him, since you de (...) thus generously with us, I will not only become a Vassal, and a Subject; but I will be so fidele and free unto you, that you shall not only dispose of all my Treasures which are upon yonder Mountains, but also of my life and liberty. Cyrus returned a most generous answer unto this discourse of this Prince, and assured him, that Ciaxares desired no more but that he should observe the same Conditions which his Fathers heretofore had done, and that he should joyn his Forces unto his: We will bring them up Sir, replied the prince Tigranes and the prince Phraartes, and we shall with joy be ready to dye in your service, whensoever any occasions require it. Cyrus then did part from those two Princes most civilly: And the Coaches being come, the Queen of Armenia and the Princesses her daughters were carried unto Artaxates, and into the same palace where the princess Araminta was, because it was more convenient then that where Ciaxares lodged. Thus she who was a prisoner in Armenia received the Queen of Armenia, as if she had been in the Dominions of the King her brother. The prince Tigranes and Phraartes by the permission of Cyrus waited upon the Queen their mother un|to the Palace. All the way as they went, they spoke of nothing but the virtues of Cyrus: Phraartes extolled his valor; the Queen of Armenia, his generosity; the Princesses her daughters, his sweetness and clemency; and Tigranes, who was better acquainted with his Heroique qualities then they, told them a hundred pieces of gallantry which he had performed: But observing that the princess Onesila his wife did not speak at all, and conceiving that Cyrus had not yet been sufficiently commended; Is there any man in the world, said he unto her, whose behaviour and person is more noble, high and handsome, then that of Cyrus? Truly, replied she, I cannot speak of his magnanimity, nor at all of his handsomness, for I did not observe it. Who then, said he unto her, did attract the observations of my Onesila, whilst this generous Conversation lasted? He, answered she, who offered his life for my Ransom, and whom she prefers before all the Universe: So sweet and most obliging answer moved Tigranes to give her thanks; and then he went on with his Elogy of Cyrus, whom since she did not observe, he described him unto her.

About an hour after, Cyrus carried the King of Armenia unto Ciaxares, who since morning found himself a little better: As they entered into Artaxates, never was such loud acclamations in commendations of Cyrus, as upon this occasion: All the Conquerors that ever were, who led their conquered Kings in Triumph, never had so much glory in the Captivity of their Slaves, as Cyrus had, and deservedly, in setting the King of Armenia again upon his Throne; and after he had vanquished him, let him enter into Artaxates, as if this tributary King had never been a Rebel, or himself a Conqueror of him. Ciaxares, at the request of Cyrus, received him very well: So that in less then a days space, there was no more Wars in Armenia; the vanquished and vanquishers were all of one side; and if the princess Mandana were but found, there was then no more to be wished: but since she could not be heard of, the joy was only on the Armenian side. Ciaxares, Cyrus, the King of Assyria, and all those who had any interest in this admired Princess, were never the nearer any satisfaction. A general search through both Armenia's was then resolved upon: for since the King of Pontus his Slave told the princess Araminta when he was dying, that the King his Master was gone into Armenia; and besides that, since Mandana had written as much with her own hand, it could not be beleaved but she was in some unknown place or other. In the mean while Harpagus came from Ecbatan to advertise Ciaxares, that there was a great disposition amongst the people to Revolt, by reason of his long absence; and that it was necessary to send some person qualified with high Authority, to remain there until he came himself. Cyrus received Harpagus with much goodness; remembering that he was in some sort a cause both of his love, and all the glory he had obtained: since if he had not come unto Persia, and had given him that counsel which he did, perhaps he should never have left the Persian Court. But the business, which he came about, being put into Consultation, Cyrus desiring to oblige Aglatidas, did propose to send him unto Ecbatan, and to confer upon him the Government of the Province of the Arasantines, which Ottanus would not accept of; imagining that since he might well hope to enjoy Amestris after the death of her husband, he would not refuse it. It was then resolved upon, that Aglatidas should depart the next morning, and go for Ecbatan; that he should carry Artaban with him; and that he should assure the Medean people, that Ciaxares would make a speedy return. Upon the breaking up of the Council, Cyrus sent for Aglatidas, to acquaint him with this good news, which doubtless he received with as much joy, as Megabises did with sorrow: He thanked Cyrus in such fit language to express his gratitude, that it was apparent his passion was high. He made shew of some sorrows to leave him, and without Page 181 doubt, he was as loath to part from him, as any Lover who was going to see his Mistress could be: He assured him, he should have his dispatches that night, and embracing him, Wish (said he, my dear Aglatidas) that I were as near my happiness and satisfaction, as you are when you go to see your dear Amestris; I wish with all my heart, you may find her as faithful, as you have described her amiable and admirable. Artaban also took his leave of Cyrus, and the next morning these two friends went together to Ecbatan: To cheer up Megabises, Cyrus gave him one of the prime offices in the Kings House which then was vacant: yet this consolation was but weak to divert his mind, since Aglatidas would ere long see Amestris, but since there was no other, patience must be his remedy.

There came news that day to Court, that Craessus was raising a very puissant Army, and did solicit all the people of Ionia to take his part: so that Cyrus seeing so fit an opportunity to help the Prince Thrasibulus, would not let it slip: and the next day following, he moved Ciaxares, that in case Craessus had any designs upon his Dominions, as in all likelihood he had, then it were the best expedient to make a diversion, and to draw the Lidian forces unto more places then one: So that it was resolved, the Prince Thrasibulus, accompanied by Harpagus, who had much experience, having followed the late King of Medes in all his wars, should go with ten thousand men into Cappadocia, where Ariobantes would make new Levies to joyn unto those Troops which Ciaxares left at his departure from Sinope, to keep that Kingdom in peace: That Thrasibulus should be General of this Army on foot; Harpagus commanding under him; and without needing any new orders, he might in the name of the King, and Cyrus, punish, or pardon, as he thought fit. In the mean while, Cyrus had a conceit in his mind, which did much vex him, that Mandana might be any where, since they could hear no news of her: Love, hereupon, which is always very ingenious, made him invent P (...) ts, which he set up throughout all parts where he had made any Conquests; to the end he might in less time, and with more expedition, hear news of Mandana. After Thrasibulus had taken his leave of Ciaxares, the separation between that Prince and Cyrus was very f (...) of tender expressions: for since the first day they fought with one another, they had a most high esteem of each others virtue, and it was impossible but this esteem should tie a firm knot of friendship between them: The Names of Mandana, and Alcionida, were often pronounced at parting, which was in private: Thrasibulus desired Cyrus to pardon him, for leaving him before he heard any news of the Princess; and he assured him, that if he saw any more enemies to fight with, he should never be able to do it: Cyrus did thank him with all expressions of civility, and desired he would excuse him for not going himself in person, to put him in possession of his Dominions, and to perswade Alcionida to obey the Commands of the Prince Tisander: However, since he thought the Grecians would be very willing to assist a Grecian, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas, were chosen for it, and intreated by Cyrus to serve him in the Person of Thrasibulus: They were too gallant to refuse any occasion of war, yet could they not find hearts to part from Cyrus without abundance of sorrow: Thimocrates told Cyrus at parting, that he saw his Destinies did not change, but that absence still must be the greatest torment of his life, since certainly he could not part from him but with extream regret. Philocles did most obligingly complain, that he was no more beloved of Cyrus, then his Mistress, since if he had, he would have kept him with him: And Leontidas suting his complement to his humour, as his friends did to their fortunes, told him, that he did not look upon all those who were to enjoy the happiness of the Princess, with less jealousy, then he did upon the Lovers of Alcidamia. After these first Complements of Gallantry, they expressed effectual testimonies of their zeal to serve Cyrus in the person of Thrasibulus, who had gotten so much love amongst all the Kings and Princes in the Army, that there was not one, who did not with much sorrow bid him adieu: He went also to take his leave of the King and Queen of Armenia, of the Princesses his daughters, of the Princess Onesila, of the Princess Araminta; of the Princes Tigranes, and Phraartes. After all which he departed with his Forces which Harpagus commanded under him: which were joyned unto the Cilician Troops, which Leontidas commanded after the death of the Prince Artabes; with an addition of the Cyprian forces also, whose Body was sent unto the Prince his Brother, with all honours fit to be rendred unto one of his quality, with a desire that Cyrus might be as good as his word, and that his body might be carried to Thebes, and laid in the Tomb with his dear Leonina, Cyrus sent a Letter by his men who were to conduct the Corps, unto the Prince of Cicily, and another unto the Prince Philoxipes, with Orders to pass into Cyprus, and to assure him of the continuance of his friendship, in conducting to Thebes the Corps of the Prince Artabes. Mean while, all searches for the Princess Mandana were in vain: Information was given from Page 182 some fishers in the River Halis, that once upon a time, they observed a Boat full of Souldiers, and some Ladies amongst them, but that was all they could say: so that both Cyrus, and the King of Assyria, did endure all the torments that desperate Lovers could suffer; all the victories of Cyrus could not countervail this horrid absence from Mandana: all the defeats and losses which the King of Assyria had, did not disturb his mind, which was sensible of nothing but the loss of Mandana: All their thoughts were employed about this fruitless search; during which time the Chaldeans, which were Neighbours unto the Armenians, which descended from their Mountains, were much molested by Cyrus, who in four days did quell them, and indeed made them very happy in reconciling them unto the Armenians, of whose friendship they stood as much in need, as the Armenians did of theirs; so that in all places fortune smiled upon Cyrus: every people did yield obedience unto him without any contradiction; and either by his valour, or by his clemency, he was Conquerour of all the world: yet for all that he could not conquer his own sorrows, which never gave him any rest: sometimes he went to lament, and he lamented by the Princess Araminta; and for her part, she did not only complain against her old miseries, but against the new passion of Phraartes, which did every day grow more violent; beseeching Cyrus not to leave her in Armenia when he went away: Ciaxares also did extremely grieve for the loss of his daughter; so that it may very well be said, Never Conquerours had less joy in their victorious Conquests then those. Cyrus did often wonder that Ortaques who went with Martesia, and her Cousin, was not heard of: and he feared some misfortune had happened that amiable Lady: yet though Mandana did take up all his thoughts, yet he was always pleasingly civil and obliging; but always grave, reserved, and melancholy: The King of Assyria, who was of a more violent temper, he was not only sad, and melancholy, but also he fretted, and was full of anguish: and if these two Princes had not yet had some hopes to find Mandana, doubtless they had ended all differences between them, and stayed no longer: for sometimes when Cyrus considered that the King of Assyria was the cause of all his misery, he had much ado to contain himself: also when the King of Assyria considered that perhaps Mandana would not hate him, if Cyrus were not loved: his heart renewed all imaginable hatred, as he used to have unto him, when he thought him only Artamenes, and himself seemed only Philidaspes: However, all intelligence which both of them received from divers parts, did not afford them any knowledge of what they desired: and the small hopes which they had, was almost quite extinct, when the King of Assyria was advertised by a secret Agent, which he had in Susa, that Abradates King of the Susaniens was gone with some Troops, and none knew whither: That he carried the Queen his wife with him, and also a strange Princess, and a Prince which no body knew: and that they went towards Matenes, which joyns upon Armenia, and Cicilia. As soon as this Prince had this news, he rejoiced; but since every one is apt to believe what they desire, he made no doubt but this Princess which was unknown, was the Princess Mandana, and the unknown Prince, the King of Pontus: so that going in all haste to acquaint Cixares, he met Cyrus, who perceiving so many signes of joy in his eyes, could not chuse but ask him the cause: though it went against the hair to acquaint his Rival with such good news, yet he told him what he knew concerning the Princess Mandana, which at the first apprehension did so joy the heart of Cyrus, that he thought to embrace his mortal enemy, and give him thanks; but presently after, some ingredients of grief did allay his jollity, when he considered that Cixares should hear any thing of Mandana from his Rival, and not from himself; for he made no question but it was she, as well because the King of Pontus might think to find protection from Abradates, who always hated the Medeans, as because the River Halis, on which it was known Mandana was, did run that way: Moreover it was known that the Matenes were the Allies of Abradates: So that his thoughts concurring with the King of Assyria's, he told him, that it was fit to acquaint Cixares with it in all haste: and to take horse the very same hour, to the end they might go towards the Frontiers of Armenia, to inform themselves of Abradates his March, to follow him, and also to fight with him. Together then they went unto Cixares, who being as impatient as themselves, after he understood the news, told them, that they should go speedily to deliver the Princess his daughter: so that without loss of any time, they drew out two thousand horse out of the Medean Chivalry which was the best: A thousand of the Assyrian Kings, and a thousand Homotimes, which were the best of all the Persian Troops. Since they received other intelligence, that Abradates had with him but two thousand horse in all, they took but four thousand, that they might the sooner overtake him, and knowing that the March of great Bodies is always slow: nor would they have taken so many, but that they feared they should be constrained to divide themselves, the sooner to meet with whom they sought for: All the Princes Page 183 and Volunteers in the Army were in this party, except the King of Phrigia, and the King of Hircania, who stayed with Cixares. Tigranes and Phraortes failed not; and never were men seen more eager to vanquish then they.

Cyrus and the King of Assyria had eyes which sparkled with extraordinary fury; and they thought themselves so sure to deliver Mandana, that they began already to look upon each other as enemies: Yet did both sides carry it most civilly, and with all sincerity, but their very looks did discover whether they would or no the resentments of their Souls. In conclusion they took their leaves of Cixarrs, and having the acclamations and prayers of all the people for a happy success of their enterprize, they marched with incredible haste to the Frontiers of Armenia, and as far as the Matenes Country, who were in League with all their Neighbors, and notwithstanding all the Asian Wars, lived in a secure Peace: When they were arrived there, they understood that Abradates was already past, and was gone towards a corner of Cicilie; they understood also that there was many Coaches full of Ladies which those Troops conducted: So that this news renewing their zeal, they consulted upon the best expedient: for all the way Abradates went there was a River, along which he must necessarily go; but since they could not exactly tell on which side he went, and on which side Mandana was, because they were informed that Abradates had divided his Troops, one party going over a Bridg, and the other stayed on that side on the left hand; therefore they resolved to divide themselves also. So that Cyrus, generously giving half of his men unto his Rival, drawing lots which party he should have, and which side of the River he should take, Cyrus had that side which was furthest from Armenia, and the King of Assyria the other: But before they parted, they both of them renewed their promises to each other, not to take any advantage by delivering the Princess until they had fought: So after this new promise of mutual fidelity they parted, each of them wishing in his heart to be happier then his Rival. Cyrus in all impatience to find his dear Mandana went in the head of his men, and would very often be a long way before them, to enquire of all he met whether any Chivalry and Coaches passed that way: some told him, Yes, some again, No; and according to their several answers, the Soul of Cyrus was either glad or sad: he sent upon the left hand of the River, for he himself was upon the right, sometimes Araspes, and sometimes Feraulas with some horse, to enquire in the Villages what they could hear; and by all reports, he was ascertained that some Chivalry passed that way. As for the Coaches full of Ladies, some said there was such, and some said there was none at all. He was told at a place where he passed, that the Chivalry which he followed had left the River, and took upon the left hand: so that he went in all haste the same way, and he came unto a place where the ways were sandy, and where he could trace the horses feet freshly printed: Then did he march on with much joy for ten hours, until he came to a Bridg where he stayed, not knowing which sides those he followed had taken, for now the ways were not sandy, and no prints were to be seen: He being now at a terrible dilemma, he passed over the Bridg to the other side; he sent out divers men to several places, but all in vain, for they found many houses, but none in them, so that he knew not what to resolve upon: yet at last he thought it best not to be on the same side of the River which the King of Assyria was; so that going back again to the Bridg, he marched along the other side: After some thirty furlongs march, Feraulas, who was a long way before, did meet a man, who told him, he saw a great fight on the other side of the water within this hour, and within twenty furlongs from the place he was. Cyrus knowing this, with a mind extremely inflamed that his Rival should be more happy then he, returned speedily to the Bridg, and passed over, going straight towards the place where the Paisant said he saw the fight. He had not gone above fifteen furlongs, but he found some horses and men dead; and going a little further he saw a field covered with dead and dying men, and a Coach which was overturned and broken. This object did infinitely move him: he searched and looked all about; and in the end found a Persian amongst those that were wounded whom he knew; and being able to speak, he no sooner saw Cyrus, but he called him, Sir, said he unto him, the King of Assyria has delivered the Princess, and put all those enemies to flight which are not killed. Has the King of Assyria delivered the Princess? (said Cyrus in a great amazement:) Ah my friend, dost thou know what thou sayst? Yes Sir, replied he, and has carried her away in her Coach; for this which you see here broken is another, and those women which were in it are all in the same Coach with the Princess: Since I was wounded after the fight by one of my Companions, who would needs have a horse from me which I had gotten, I saw very well how the King of Assyria did address himself unto her in her Coach with all humility, and honored her; that was the reason why the Commander in Chief of the Enemies was not taken, for the King of Assyria no sooner saw that Coach in his power, but he neglected Page 184 all else, and took care of her. Cyrus hearing this news, was both joyful as possible could be, and also as sad as any true Lover could think himself: He rejoiced that his dear Mandana was delivered, but since it was by his Rival, he grieved excessively. Moreover, he understood the King of Pontus was escaped, and therefore had a good mind to follow and fight him, yet he could not think that Mandana was in the King of Assyria's power, but he must needs haste after him: so that leaving his design of following an unfortunate Rival, he went after him that was the fortunate one. He went immediately unto the Rendezvous which was appointed of at parting, but went with a mind so infinitely enraged, that he was not master of his own thoughts: The night coming fast on, did augment his melancholy, because he could not make haste enough; but was forced to stay, for having left the River side, intending to go a nearer way, his Guides lost their aim in the midst of a great Forrest full of Cypress Trees, and in the obscurity of the night: so that in lieu of coming nearer Mandana fearing to wander further off her, he resolved to stay there till break of day: moreover, his horses were almost tired, halving had no rest a long time: he therefore made a halt, and lighted from his horse, sitting down at the foot of a Tree, as if he would rest himself, but indeed it was to persecute himself with the violent agitations of his mind: Sometimes his resentments of joy would get the predominacy; for said he in his heart, Mandana is delivered, she is in a place where I shall shortly see her, and her Deliverer shall not long enjoy that glorious Title, unless my courage betray me in this last and principal occasion. But oh ye Gods, said he, why must my Rival deliver my Princess? and why do you put me to the necessity of hating her Deliverer, and grieve for the liberty of Mandana, which I did so ardently desire? I cannot purely relish her deliverance, for doubtless my Rival has already spoke of his love unto her, and she has thanked him for what he hath done; and perhaps this last piece of service which he hath done her (which did not cost him one drop of blood) will work more upon her heart, then all the Combates I have fought for her; then all the battels I have won, and then all the wounds I have received. Oh my divine Princess (cried he out) be a little more just, and look upon the service which the King of Assyria hath done you, rather as an effect of his good Fortune, then any extraordinary testimony of his affection: But after all this, he hath delivered her, said he; and methinks I see the Princess bestow upon him a thousand expressions of acknowledgment: Yet were I assured that this divine Princess did wish in her heart that it were I who had done her this good office, I should be satisfied; but liberty is so sweet, that it is most difficult not to love the hand that gives it. Oh ye rigorous Destinies, said he, why would you not let me have the honour of breaking her Chains asunder? Had ye been so propitious unto me, I should have thought my self the most happy Prince upon Earth: But now, though I have won so many Battels; conquered so many Kingdoms; nothing resisted me, all obeyed me; the King of Assyria himself thrown out of his Throne, and compelled to yield unto the fury of my Fate; yet this unfortunate Prince is now a thousand thousand times more happy then Cyrus, who has been reputed the greatest Favorite of the Gods of all men living. How dare I appear before my Princess? and how can I contain my impatience to see her in his hands? When he was in Babylon, he was less dreadful to me then now; for then Mandana looked upon him as her Ravisher; but now the case is altered, and he is her Deliverer, and all that ever I did for her was not so advantageous to her, as this act of his at this time: Yet I am much to blame to grieve, now my Princess rejoiceth, and yet were I mad to rejoice at the glory of my Rival. Perhaps I am deceived, and my adored Mandana is most just, and will remember, that though I did not deliver her when I returned from the Messagettes, when I saved the life of her Ravisher, yet it was because I knew him not; and that though I did not deliver her in the taking of Babylon, it was because the King of Assyria did take her away the second time; and though I did her no service at Sinope, it was because the Prince Mazares to his own misery and mine did carry her away: Therefore when she considers that the King of Assyria has been her Ravisher and Detainer whole years together, it may be this last adventure of his will have no great operation upon her heart. But no, no, said he presently after, let me not flatter my self; past services are small in comparison of those which are at present; and a thousand good intentions are nothing equal to one real good office effectually done, though it cost him who did it but little; and therefore unhappy man that I am, I may in all reason fear, that the King of Assyria hath this very day gained more upon the heart of Mandana, then I have done in all my life. Afterwards when he began to consider, that in drawing lots which side of the River either should take, all his wisdom and prudence could not keep him from murmuring against Heaven: What have I done, O ye just Gods, said he, to merit this misfortune? Have I not, during all the Wars that ever I made, preserved your Temples and your Altars? Have I not offered Sacrifices Page 185 and Oblations unto you? Was I ever unjust, cruel or bloody? I loved Mandana it is true, but I loved her with unparallel'd purity: I loved her most passionately I confess; but since you made her so highly accomplished, and made me know it, it had been a sin to do otherwise, and I could not possibly love her less, and yet you inflict upon me as severe torments, as those who are most culpable could be punished with: I would gladly cease my murmur, but I cannot: Fury doth command my mind; Jealousie disturbs my Reason, and I cannot endure that my dreadful Rival and my mortal Enemy should be Mandana's Deliverer. After this, being out of all patience that it was not yet day, he rose up; and taking horse, maugre all persuasions to the contrary, he would have them march; and because he would be exemplary to the rest, he was the first that groped through the thick of darkness, having in his mind a more gloomy melancholy then the obscurity of the night, which was so dark, that no objects could be discerned in that great Forrest.

The End of the third Part.

ARTAMENES, OR CYRUS the GREAT. The Fourth Part. BOOK. I.

After a long and blind March, day did by little and little appear. And Cyrus came to the River side, where the Guides being within their aim again, conducted the Prince to the place where he desired to be; at the last he came to a place where he discovered Coaches, and Soldiers, going before him: This sight seemed something strange, and made such a mixture of joys and sorrows, love and jealousy, hopes and fears in his heart, that he knew not what to think on it: He looked upon Feraulus, and pronouncing the name of Mandana, shewing him the Coaches, and doubling his pace: Come, Feraulus, said he unto him, let us go and enjoy the happiness to see our Mistress, or at the least disturb the joys of my Rival: putting on then very fast, he overtook some horsemen, which were two hundred paces behind the Coaches and Troops, and knowing them at the first to be Meades; Is the King of Assyria, said he unto them, with the Princess Mandana? We know not that, Sir, replied they; for presently after the Combate yesterday against Abradates, when he perceived that in lieu of delivering the Princess, he had only taken the Queen of Susiana, he turned all fury, and took another way with part of his men. How, said Cyrus, is not Mandana in this Coach which I see before me? No, Sir, replied they, the King of Assyria had intelligence that she was on your side of the River: so that desiring to come unto you, and share in the deliverance of her, he took a nearer way which his Guides did shew unto him, and thereby stop the King of Pontus's way, after he had passed the River at a place, the name whereof we have forgotten; hoping also to overtake Abradates, and meet with you. But since we see you here, we know neither where he, nor the Princess Mandana is, especially since it appears you hear nothing of him, but return without meeting with him. Cyrus was so astonished, and sad, that the Princess Mandana was not delivered, and to know that if he had followed the way he first took, he might have done it: and that his Rival might perhaps be fighting for her at Page 188 that very time whilst he was speaking on it, that not staying any longer there, nor going to the Coach where Panthea was, he faced about in all haste, sending Araspes to have a care of that Queen; he returned then unto the first place where he might have pass over the River: and marching almost as fast as if he had been alone, he was so much transported with anger against himself, that he had much ado to contain himself within the limits of reason: he wished that the King of Assyria had met with Mandana, and he desired also quite contrary: and since he could not compose his discordant desires, he suffered intolerable torment of mind; especially when it came into his thoughts that in all probability the King of Assyria had already delivered Mandana, or which was worse, that neither of them could deliver her: After a long March without any intelligence, he met with some horsemen, which the King of Assyria hearing that he had passed over the River, did send unto him, to tell him, that he would still pursue the King of Pontus, and also to advertise him how he understood, that he had left the River upon his left hand, and went as fast as he could unto another, which he must needs cross over, before he could be in Cilicie. Cyrus upon this advice, doubling his diligence, though his horses were very weary, at last he overtook the King of Assyria, and out of a phantastical humour of love, and jealousy mixed together, he was both sad, and glad, that he had not delivered Mandana: These two illustrious Rivals rendered an account unto each other of their actions: and being forced unto it by necessity, they gave half an hours time unto their men to take a light repast, and bait their horses at the next Village they came unto; after which, they went together with more haste then before, in pursuance of the King of Pontus, who could not make any great speed because of the Coach which carried the Princess Mandana: At last after a March until the Sun was set, they discovered this other River, which I spoke of before: But that which did most extremely perplex them, was to see a wooden Bridge, over which they were to pass, quite broken down: and casting their eyes upon the other side of the water, they discovered in a great Meadow, about four or five hundred paces off, about fifty horses only, and a Coach, which they did conclude to be that of the Princess Mandana, whom they were in Quest of; for this broken Bridge was a strong argument of it: Then were they at a Dilemma, to comprehend why they had only fifty horses, and what was become of all the rest; however they made no doubt but that it was the Princess Mandana: Since this River was very deep and impetuous, and also very broad, there was no possibility of passing over: Cyrus, and the King of Assyria, yet would make a trial, but all was in vain, and both of them were in danger to be drowned: And it was a long days march unto any Bridge; then to return as far back again; for there was no other between that place they were on, and the Sea, in to which this River did empty it self: nor could they pass over in Boats, because indeed there was none upon the River which was not navigable by reason of the swiftness of its current; neither was it full of fish which caused few fishers Barcks to be upon it. Thus not knowing what course to take, the sight of this Coach which still went further and further from them, did drive the souls of these two Princes into a great horrid purgatory: The breach in the Bridge was so broad, that any planks would not be serviceable if they had them: Thus being at their wits end, and not knowing what to do, they looked upon the Coach, which still was more remote, until the Sun being set, and it entered into a Wood of Cedars, upon a hill beyond the meadow, they lost the sight of it, and almost their lives; since all hopes of relieving Mandana was lost. For when they considered how near they were their Princess, and wear not able to get any nearer, but were still at a more dire distance, their sorrows were insupportable, though they testified not any visible signs of it: But though both of them were in one and the same miserable condition, yet had they not the consolation to condole together, but contrarily, the sympathy of their sorrows did more separate them, and make their miseries more violent: and had they not both been as highly generous, as they were highly perplexed, it had been absolutely impossible for them, to transact together as they did: yet notwithstanding, Cyrus was much more sad then the King of Assyria, who having some confidence in the Oracle which he received at Babylon, did never despair of his happiness: But Cyrus, who had no such Cordial in his miseries, was all fears, and no hopes. The Prince Tigranes, and the Prince Phraartes, with all the rest of quality in the Army, did use their best endeavours to cheer them up, especially Cyrus, who had the affectionate hearts of all the world, but yet alas, all was to no purpose. Since these Princes conceived, that those Troops which had left the King of Pontus, on that side of the River, might chance not be far off, therefore they still stood upon their Guard, and marched in good order, unto this Bridge over which only they could pass the River. In the mean time, love which prompts all Lovers unto Heroique Actions, moved Cyrus, and the King of Assyria, (who could not endure so flow a March as the Body Page 189 of their Troops was to keep) to take an hundred horse only, and went before: commanding the rest to keep the Bridge, lest Abradates, hearing they were following after Mandana, should sieze upon it. All the rest of the Princes did follow in this adventure, and made as much haste, as possibly they could unto the Pass over the River: They were forced to rest their horses for an hour or two; and then continued their March until the morning at the break of day they passed over this River: and then hoped nothing could stop them from overtaking Mandana. Cyrus thought it convenient to send Feraulus unto Tarsis, to the Prince of Cilicie, and to acquaint him with the business, beseeching him to send unto all the Ports in his Country, that no strangers might be suffered to imbarque: after which he continued his pursuit, and took that Rode which he imagined the King of Pontus to have taken. But since night approached, they took up their Quarters at the first Village, and there rested themselves till break of day: Then they sounded to horse, and marched not only till night, but until the next day at noon, without any intelligence of what they were in Quest after. Since Cicily in that part was not large, they were near the Sea, when they saw two horsemen coming towards them, who being far off were unknown; but drawing nearer, Cyrus knew the horse of Feraulus, so that not speaking a word unto the King of Assyria, who followed immediately after, and prompted by his passion, he spurred on towards him, and upon a sudden stood amazed to see that the other who came with him, was Ortalques, the same man who had Orders to convoy Martesia, and had been so long before he returned: since he imagined that Ortalques could tell him no news but only of Martesia, but thought Feraulus might happily hear something concerning Mandana, though he had an high esteem of wise Martesia, yet at the first he did not enquire of her, but looking upon Feraulus, as if he could divine his news; Well Feraulus, said he, do you know yet where the Princess Mandana is? and will the Prince of Cicily do as I desire him? Sir, replied he, I am even desperate in being forced to tell you, that for all my haste I could possibly make, I came four hours too late with orders from the Prince of Cicily, to the Port where the King of Pontus, and the Princess Mandana are imbarqued: How Feraulus, replied Cyrus, is not Mandana in Cicily? No, Sir, answered he, she took ship yesterday about noon: the reason of this misfortune was, said he, because the Prince of Cicily was in hunting when I came to Tarsis, so that I was forced to go after him, which took me up much time; for he was far off: As soon as I met with him, and told him the place where you saw the Coach, in which the Princess was, he did infallibly conclude that the King of Pontus would imbarque at a Port unto which he immediately sent me, with his Captain of his Guard, and with orders to the Magistrates of the Town, to stop all strangers which would put to Sea, dispatching also many others into divers other places with the same Commands: What should I say more, Sir, I came unfortunately four hours too late, but by good fortune I met with Ortalques, who had orders to come unto you from the Princess Mandana. From the Princess Mandana, replied Cyrus, how is it possible he should know any thing? Sir, replied Ortalques, doubtless you will wonder when I shall tell you, that having had the honour of your Commands, to convoy those Ladies which went with Martesia from Sinope, I safely conducted them to the side of the River Halis, where having a desire to rest themselves, and to take the pleasure of the water, they took boat, sending their Coach another way unto a place where it should meet them; and commanding me to come also into the Boat, my two hundred horse was conducted by my Lieutenant along the River side: After we had been upon the water half a day, the Lady who was Cousin unto Martesia fell sick; and so extremely, that we were constrained to stay at a Castle which was built upon the Banks of that River, being come unto that place, where there was no Town within twenty furlongs, I desired to speak with the Commander in chief, but since he saw Souldiers, he was very unwilling to consent unto what I desired of him: He asked from whence I came, whither I went, what I was, and who those Ladies were: But since we were in Paphlagonia, where I knew there was divisions among the people, I dissembled the names of the Ladies, and my own also, telling him only, that I was a Cousin unto them, and had no other designe but to conduct them: he was yet very hard to be perswaded unto my desires; but at last telling me that he never used to entertain any in his Castle, but Ladies, and because it was too much inhumanity, not to assist a sick Lady, if without any danger he could do it, he consented to receive her in, and at the request of his wife, who seemed to be a woman of good parts to assist her: Then I went back to Martesia, and causing her Cousin to be brought in a Chair which the Captain sent us, I conducted these Ladies to the Gates, and afterwards I went to give orders for the quartering of my men at the next Town: yet the next day the Captain of the Castle invited me to lodge with him, but I refused; contenting my self with admission into the Castle, to visit Martesia, Page 190 and her Cousin, who found very good helps from a Chyrurgion, and Physician, which were there, and who would not go away from thence a long time, as I was told at my lodging. Since Martesia was most admirable amiable, she had already got the love of the Captains wife; so that discoursing one day together; she told her, that they were very happy whensoever they found any occasion to assist sick Ladies: and since Martesia knew that her dear Mistress passed up this River; she asked her if she had never any occasions to assist Ladies, till now? She answered her, that about three months since, there was one of the fairest Ladies that ever breathed upon earth, fell sick, and was in that Castle: but presently recovering, she stayed not in it. Martesia being now more inquisitive then before, asked her name, her quality, and where she was: but she answered, that she neither knew her name, nor quality: but yet to tell her truly, she was yet in the Castle; yet if her Husband knew that she had discovered it unto her, he would be extremely angry: she told her farther that the reason why they were so nice to let them enter, was because this Lady was here: yet she was lodged in a Chamber of the Castle far off this she was in, and where none entered but the men which waited upon her, and a woman which she brought with her, who never left her: That there was also a very handsome man, who was even at deaths door with grief, whilst this fair one was sick: Then did Martesia desire her to describe the beauty of this Lady, and the stature of the man she spake of, and by the answer of this woman, she certainly concluded, that the Princess Mandana and the King of Pontus were in the Castle: as she was leaning against a window which looked towards the River, she spied a great Boat, so like that in which she had been with the Princess Mandana, as she asked the Captains wife, whether that was not the Boat in which the sick Lady came; and she answered, yes: Then was Martesia fully satisfied concerning the truth of Mandana's being here; she dissembled her joy until she spoke with me, which the same day she did: It was resolved then betwixt us; so to gain the favour of this Captains wife by presents and good language, that she might let us see this sick Lady: and since she was but very young, she was easily perswaded by such allurements. To be short, Sir, Martesia tampered with her so handsomly, that the next morning this woman unknown to her Husband, carried her by a back stair into a Chamber just opposite to the Chamber of this unknown beauty, and the windows being open, she saw the Princess Mandana, and Ariantia, leaning against the window, and talking together very melancholy: Ah Ortalques cryed Cyrus out, and interrupted him; why did you not release the Princess? Have but a little patience, Sir, replied he and you shall know the reason. Martesia then knowing the Princess, and being extremely surprized without any further reasoning upon the matter, she thrust her self half out of the window, and made so great a noise, that the Princess turning her head, and looking that way, did presently know her, and was no less surprized at the sight, then Martesia was at hers. This Encounter was so full of astonishment, that it was impossible but it should attract observance; but as good luck was the King of Pontus was not then in the Chamber with the Princess, and the Captain of the Castles wife was the only witness of this pleasant surprize in both these Ladies: But yet she was so astonished at it, that she would not suffer Martesia to enjoy the pleasure any longer: then Ariantia hearing the door of the Princess Chamber to open, made a signe unto Martesia to retire her self: At last, Sir, when we saw Mandana was in the Castle, I desired permittance from Martesia to deliver her by force: yet she would try first whether or no she could speak with the Princess, but all was in vain: for the Captains wife had no credit at all with them who were Mandana's Guard. Then we being resolved to hazard all for the Princess delivery, I found means to get Ladders, I caused our Boat to be ready: and by a place of the wall which was possible to be scalled, I designed to attempt it the night following. But as ill luck was, the King of Pontus, while the Princess stayed in that place sick, had sent unto Abradates to desire a retreat in his Court, and also a convoy unto Matenes, which the River Halis separates from him; As ill luck was, I say, there came four hundred horse from Susiana, to guard the Princess: so that the King of Pontus no sooner saw them, but he resolved to depart the very next day, which being known unto Martesia, she acquainted me with it. And notwithstanding the inequality of the number, I resolved to fall upon the King of Pontus in his March, there being no possibility of forcing the Castle, since so many were in it. However, Martesia, who was resolved to follow her dear Mistress, though she could not deliver her, went confidently by the same back stairs unto the Chamber of the Princess, and called Arianita as loud as she could, and told her that if her Mistress would not obtain permission that she might speak with her, she shall be absolutely desperate: Arianita made signes unto her to be patient, and afterwards we came to know, that just at the same time when Martesia was speaking unto Page 191 her, the Princess was telling the King of Pontus that she was here, and that absolutely she would have her with her, which the King consented unto, not knowing that I came from you, but supposing rather that some odd disaster or other had stayed her about this River, as sickness did the Princess: At length, Sir, Martesia and her Cousin, who was much minded, and all the rest of the women went unto the Princess, who received them with abundance of joy: In the mean time, it was resolved, Sir, we must depart from thence, and to take boat until they came to Mantiana, where Coaches would meet them: But to be short, Sir, upon the next morning I fell upon the King of Pontus his Convoy, and since the number was so much unequal, all my company almost perished, and I my self wounded in four places, not being able to hinder the King of Pontus from carrying away the Princess, who however had this consolation added, that she had Martesia with her: But as for Martesia's Cousin, since she was married, she obtained so much favor from the King of Pontus, as to send her back unto the place where her Coach waited for her, and he desired the Captain of the Castle to be her Convoy; for my part, though I was much wounded, yet I followed after some horsemen with my Sword drawn, but there came two with orders from the Princess, that they should not kill me, but to carry me unto the Castle, with desires unto the Captain to use me well, and have a care of me, which indeed most civilly he did: Whilst I was with him, I understood that he was born a Subject of the King of Pontus, and as fortune would have it, was married in that Country, and at last was made Governour of that Castle, which was situated in Paphlagonia, where the King of Pontus was forced to stay that very morning, when Martesia and Orsanus were left upon the Riverbanks, for the Princess was so exceedingly grieved at it, that thereupon she fell extremely sick: However, Sir, as soon as I was well recovered, I went unto Susa; where the Captain, whose intimate friendship I had obtained, whilst I stayed with him, told me I should certainly find the Princess; therefore I went, and indeed found her there accordingly: And since the Princess had so absolute a command over the King of Pontus, as, excepting her liberty, he could deny her nothing, I was suffered to be with her, because he thought I was her servant before, and knew not that I belonged to you. In a few days after, I understood that Cressus King of Lydia, had sent unto Abradates, and that some great designe was in hand. Mean while, the King of Pontus fearing, that if you whom he heard was in Armenia, should understand that he was at Susa, you would draw that way; and since Abradates was not able to resist you, therefore he designed to depart: and Abradates would not let him go alone. The Queen Panthea also, was so great a Lover of Mandana; and having a design to visit the famous Temple of Diana, which is in the Matenes Countrey, would conduct her as far as the Frontiers of Cicily, intending to perform her devotions at her return. But when they came unto the River, near which she was taken, as well for the convenience of their March, as for the more security of the King of Pontus: They separated themselves, the King of Pontus conducting Mandana, on that side the River furthest from Armenia, and Abradates on the other, with the Queen of Susania, who continued their March until she was taken by your Troops, for it was the straight way unto that place where she intended to go. As for us, we marched in such great haste, that you hardly would have had a sight of us, as it seems you had, from the other side of the water, if Abradates after his fight and defeat, had not overtaken us, only with fifteen, or twenty of his men: This sight did exceedingly perplex the King of Pontus, for he knew that Abradates had been set upon, and was beaten, but when he understood Panthea was taken prisoner, his sorrows then were in the highest extremity. I then was behind those Princes, so that since both of them were in the depth of sorrows, they took no notice of me; I heard the King of Susa say unto the King of Pontus, that if he would let him have his Troops, he would go after the Ravishers of Panthea. Since the King of Pontus had only a thousand horses, and Abradates, of his thousand, only fifteen, or twenty left; he told Abradates, that if he should do so, he should expose Mandana, and himself in vain, to assault all your Cavalry with so few men: Moreover, said he unto him, never fear the Queen your wife, for Cyrus is the most generous Prince in the world, and since we have the Princess Mandana, he will never treat Panthea ill. Therefore, said he unto him, let me go unto the Bridge, which as soon as I am over, I will break down, and return unto you to perform your promise unto Craessus, and wait for the liberty of Panthea, by the same way which shall give it unto all Asia. At the last, Sir, after much other discourse whereby one might perceive much uncertainty in their spirits, we came unto the Bridge, where Abradates left this Prince, and bad adieu unto Mandana, who when she knew of Panthea's being taken, did assure him, that if she were in your hands, she were safe, conjuring him to move the King of Pontus to restore her unto Cixares, upon condition that he should restore Panthea unto him. Abradates was so full of sorrow, that he did not well understand Page 192 this Proposition: so that the King of Pontus fearing she should repeat it again, and that Abradates would make some reflection upon it, commanded the Coach to drive on, he taking his fifty horses only. When we were over the Bridge, the men of Abradates on his side, and we on ours, broke down the Bridge, and went our ways, that is to say, Abradates towards Susa over the Mountains, and the King of Pontus towards the Sicilian Sea. But when the Princess Mandana, near whose Coach I was, discovered all your Cavalry, on the other side of the River, whilst we were in the great Meadow, I never saw any in my life seem more sad then she: she looked after you, Sir, as long as ever she could see you; for she imagined that you were there in person, and when we were far entered into the Wood, yet she looked still, in hopes of a glimpse; at length, Sir, we came to the Port, where the King of Pontus would needs imbarque in all haste: he found a Ship ready to put out for Ephesus, wherein he was received, he imbarqued the next day about noon, which was yesterday. About two hours before their departure, Martesia called me aside, and did bid me make an escape away, and give you this Letter, which I was coming to bring you when I met with Feraulas, who was coming out of the Town when I came: In saying so, he presented a Letter from the Princess Mandana, unto Cyrus, who received it with as much joy, as the King of Assyria saw it with sorrow: But not being able to defer any longer the reading of it, and it pleasing him to open it before his Rival, he broke open the Seal, and read these words.

The Princess MANDANA, unto CYRUS.

Since I cannot tell whether or no, the King my Father be in your Army, and do not doubt but you are; therefore I address my Letter unto you, desiring you to let the Queen of Susiana be well used; for it was by her, I knew that it was permitted the Illustrious Artamenes, to be Cyrus: and her cares have been so great, to sweeten my Captivity, that I am obliged to render hers less rigorous, as possibly I can. I need not tell you, that I am the most unfortunate person in the world; for you cannot be ignorant of it. But to acknowledge, in my best expressions, the high Generosity, in exposing all the days of your life for my liberty, Let me sincerely tell you, that I am as zealous a wisher of the continuance of your glory, and good fortune: as I am of a period unto the misfortunes of MANDANA.

The Princess added this Postscript.

Since I sent you false intelligence that we were going into Armenia, therefore I dare hardly tell you now, that I think they will carry me to Ephesus.

When Cyrus had read this Letter, he could not chuse but look upon the King of Assyria, whose eyes also were fixed upon him, but with such melancholy, and so many signs of sorrow, that the joys of Cyrus were much augmented by it: yet to keep within the limits of their conditions, nor to make a Secret of any thing which related unto the interest of Mandana. Cyrus did read a loud this Letter from the Princess, which was no small additament of sorrow unto the King of Assyria: for though this Letter was no more then a Letter of Civility, yet it contained in it such civil expressions, especially towards the latter end, that he had much ado to forbear extravagant and violent testimonies of jealousy and despair, he changed colour twenty times; the actions of his head and hands did speak his distempered mind: then lifting up his eyes to Heaven, and afterwards fixing them on the eyes of Cyrus: Come, too happy Rival, (said he, and sighed) let us go unto Artaxates, that we may the sooner go for Lidia, and there see what the Gods have ordained our destinies to be: After this, the King of Assyria went first, and not staying till Cyrus answered, he fell into such a profound pensive study, that it was easie to perceive, his mind was in extremity torment. In the mean time, Cyrus, who would not lose a minute of time, nor go unto Tarsus himself, sent one of his servants to thank the Prince of Cicily, who was then preparing to receive him; and going the same way he came, they joyned with those men whom he left to guard the Bridge, and went to overtake Panthea, at a Castle which was upon the Frontiers of Armenia, where Araspes was Governour. Since she was recommended unto Cyrus by very good hands, he no sooner saw Araspes, but he appointed him to wait upon her with all due respects, fitting her quality: And though he resolved not to see her since Mandana was not delivered, and since it was she only, Page 193 and not Panthea was a prisoner, yet he changed his resolution, and would give her a visit: 'Tis very true, he carried it something closely, because he desired the King of Assyria might not be there, and that he might with more freedom speak concerning his dear Princess: so that as soon as he was within the Castle, he went unto the Chamber of Araspes, and pretending some business with him, they two were alone together: since it was near the Queen of Susiana's Chamber, he went thither unseen, Araspes and Feraulas only following him. This was it which made all the people say, that Cyrus was so faithful unto Mandana, that he would not look upon this Queen, because she was the most charming beauty upon earth. Yet it is most certain, he saw her, but he saw her only for the love of Mandana: he sent for permission to wait upon her, and this fair and wise Princess received him with all civility, and without any symptoms of any Pusillanimity. Sir (said he unto him) the Princess Mandana had good reason to tell me, that you of all the Princes in the world knew how to use a victory, since though I am a Captive, yet you are pleased to honour me with a visit, and to assure me of the life and health of the King my Lord, and Husband. I would not have you think your self, Madam, said he unto her, at all obliged for so poor and inconsiderable a service: but I beseech you, take the pains to read this Letter, (showing her Mandana's Letter to him) and by it you may see, there are no services which I do not intend to do you: for since the Princess Mandana hath written unto me, I am not Master of my own will, but subject wholly unto hers. I wish Sir, replied Panthea, that I could handsomly divide my gratitude between you both; for you both have highly obliged me.

After this, Cyrus enquired concerning the health and welfare of his dear Princess: and after he had desired her pardon, for taking so much liberty to himself, he conjured her to tell him, how the King of Pontus used her. Sir, replied Panthea, for the satisfaction of your mind, let me tell you, that the King of Pontus is so absolute a Slave unto the Princess Mandana, that it is a very wonder he can retain her as he doth: for excepting her liberty, there is nothing which she may not absolutely command: so that I can assure you, he gives her no cause of any complaint, but only that he will not part with her: for my part, I have used my best arguments to move him unto it: But his answers always were, that he could not: and though he never received other satisfaction, then to prevent all Rivals from enjoying her: he would wander about the world, until he found a safe place of Retreat, and some potent Protector who was able to defend him. Oh Madam, (cried Cyrus out) Certainly the Gods will never protect the Ravisher of so divine and innocent a Princess. The truth is, replied Panthea, we are but deservedly punished for affording him any protection. Cyrus then seemed more civil unto her, then before, and told her, that if he did not depend upon the power of Cixares, he would immediately let her have her liberty: But since the Princess Mandana is concerned, and since the King her Husband had entered into league with her Ravisher; he must needs acquaint Cixares with it before he released her: yet in the mean time he assured her, she should find all due observances rendered unto her. Panthea returned most civil thanks, and both parted well satisfied one with another: And indeed, it is no wonder, that two so highly accomplished, should much esteem of one another: for as Cyrus was in all things transcendent, so Panthea was a most admirable Princess; her beauty was infinitely taking: It did much surprize the eyes, and inspire love; she was of so sweet a Majesty, and so charming a modesty, that whosoever saw her must needs interest themselves in her misfortunes; In the mean while Cyrus com|manded Araspes to conduct her unto Artaxates, leaving him five hundred horses for that purpose: After which, taking horse with the King of Assyria, they made such haste, that in three days they came to Ciaxares: unto whom Cyrus did render an account of his voyage: from thence he went to wait upon the Princess Araminta, where Phraartes already was. Cy|rus did ask the Princess pardon for departing from her without bidding her adieu; assuring her, that for her sake, he designed nothing but to deliver the Princess, and not to ruin the King her Brother: and she told him her fears of receiving some sad consequences of his enter|prize. As Cyrus was with this Princess, news was brought him, that a Post came from Ecba|tan, which moved Ciaxares to go thither: There came also another the same day from Ario|bantes, who sent him word, how he received intelligence, that Craessus sent to consult with several Oracles: and employed in one and the same day men of much ingenuity and honesty, to go unto Delphos, to Dodona, to the Temple of Amphiaurus, to Antredes Triphon|us; to Brachides, which is upon the Frontiers of the Milesians: And into Africa, to the Tem|ple of Jupiter Ammon; to the end he might either be confirmed, or dissuaded from his in|tended designe: Mean while he raised a puissant Army, and solicited his Allies to arm with him. This being the state of things, it was resolved, that in consideration Ciaxares had no Page 194 his health very well, he should return unto Ecbatan, and pacifie all troubles there: and that Cyrus with all his Army should march towards Lidia: as well to procure the liberty of Man|dana, who was carried unto Ephesus which Craessus had conquered: as also to oppose the designs of that Prince: Thus both ambition and love, being the legs of Cyrus, he went with as much zeal as those two violent passions could inspire into a most Heroick and amorous soul. It was also resolved upon, that to keep Abradates within the compass of reason, Panthea must be retained, and conducted into Cappadocia, towards the Frontiers of Lidia: for certain intelligence was received, that this Prince had entered into league with Craessus, which did very strongly confirm what Ortalques had related. Since the Princess Araminta had no desires to remain in Armenia, because of the Prince Phraartes: and since moreover, Cyrus had some hopes in her solicitations with the King her Brother; he was very glad she resolved to go with the Queen of Panthea; who arrived at Artaxates as these resolutions were fixed upon, and who was according to the desire of Mandana, treated with all possible honours. And to that end Araspes received new orders from Cyrus, to have an extraordinary care of it: This Prince telling him with a smile, which in spite of his melancholy did appear in his eyes, that he could not more safely trust the fairest Queen in the world with any, better then with the most insensible man upon earth. The great separation was within two or three days after; for from that day Ciaxares prepared to return unto Ecbatan, with two thousand men, amongst which was Megabises: Cyrus also, accompanied with the King of Assyria, the King of Phri|gia, the King of Hircania, and all the rest of the Princes which were in the Army, began to dis|lencamp, and march towards Lidia, after he had subjected a Kingdom unto Ciaxares: The Prince Tigranes out of his affection to Cyrus, and ingratitude for his so generous leaving the Crown unto the King his Father, would needs follow him in this war: Phraarees also prompted both by his generosity, and also his love to Araminta, would by no means stay behind: so that the providence of that Princess was ineffectual. However, to convey the Queen of Susi|jana, and the Princess of Pontus, more conveniently; Araspes with five hundred horses did begin his journey the day before the Army: which was the reason why the messenger whom Abradates sent, found not the Queen his wife at Artaxates, who was come thither to demand her: but he was answered, that a Prince who was allied unto the King of Medes, and who protected the Ravisher of the Princess Mandana, could not obtain any thing from thence. Before depar|ture, Cyrus went to bid adieu unto the Queen of Armenia, and to condole with the Princess Onesila, in parting from her dear Tigranes. After this, having a thousand benedictions from the King of Armenia, and ten thousand applauses from the people Artaxates, he went to wait upon Ciaxares some thirty furlongs on his way: This separation, was on every side most tender. Ciaxares spoke unto him concerning the Princess Mandana, in such terms, as might let him know, that Cyrus had as great a share in her as himself: and he conferred such an absolute power upon him, throughout all his Empire, that it could not be greater after his death. The King of Armenia did willingly pay the Tribute which was due, and offered four times more to detract the charges of this War, but Cyrus refused it, contenting himself with that only which was due. Mean while, the remembrance of Madana was his, and the King of Assyria's only thoughts, during the March, and when they were forced to be together, they were always melancholy, wishing they were in private, and had the liberty to think of their divine Princess without interruption: They understood at their arrival in Cappadocia, that the Prince Thrasilbulus, and Harpagus, stayed not there: but Ariobantes adding only those forces which he then had unto those which formerly were given him, he departed in all haste towards the Lower Asia; love and ambition not permitting him to stay for any new Levies.

Since Cyrus had nothing but Mandana in his mind, and since she had written unto him, she was going to Ephesus; to clear himself of all doubts, he resolved to send Feraulas thither disguised, knowing he could not make choice of a man more ingenious, more discreet, or fuller of affection to that employment then he, and especially since his dear Martesia was with Man|dana, it was a double obligation upon him to endeavour the liberty of that Princess. He ac|cepted of that Commission with much joy; and whilst Cyrus stayed in Cappadocia a while, to refresh his Troops, and to be better informed of the designs of Craessus, he went towards Ephesus with one servant only. The King of Assyria also sent thither a very faithful and knowing man for the same purpose: Mean while Cyrus received intelligence from all parts, of great warlike preparations which was made at Sardis: But notwithstanding all their in|telligence, and all their sending, not a word was spoken concerning Mandana, neither any certainty what Craessus intended: Whilst he was in this dubious suspense, some told him, that Page 195 the King of Phrigia was earnestly enquiring for him, because there arrived that morning three strangers unto his Tent, who brought him some news of great consequence, at least as they imagined, by his gesture, and manner of speech: Presently after that Prince came in, and as one whose mind was full of great Concernments, Sir, said he unto Cyrus, It is fit and just I speak concerning your interests, before my own. And that I tell you, I have brought hither a man who saw the Princess Mandana land at Ephesus, and who can assure you, she safely pas|sed over all dangers at Sea. Cyrus transported with joy to hear the name of Mandana, and to hear certainly where she was, asked the King of Assyria, where he was who brought the news? And that Prince causing him to come near, (for he brought him with him) he presented him un|to Cyrus, who received him with such a sweetness, as did not only signifie his love to Man|dana, but his own natural civility to the man: This man who was a Grecian, and named So|sicles, being a man of good quality, and wit, answered Cyrus very respectively, and made an exact relation of all he knew: he told him that as he was at Ephesus, he saw a Cilician Ship come in: That the King of Pontus was in it; that he saw him land, and lead the Princess Man|dana ashore also; whom the Governour of Ephesus did lodge very magnificently: he told him further, that this Princess going unto the Temple of Diana, to perform her devotions there, had placed her self amongst the professed Nuns which dwelt there: that the King of Pontus knowing of it used all his endeavours to get her out from thence, but the people were so much incensed at it, that they would not suffer him: so that he was forced to be contented with the favour of the Governour in placing very strong and strict Guards at all the Ports of the Town, and round about the Temple, until such time as orders was received from Craessus, unto whom he had already sent: and that this was the condition of things when he came from Ephesus. Cyrus asked Sosicles a hundred more questions, after which, thanking him for the pains he took, he fell into private discourse with the King of Phrigia; rejoycing that Feraulas would perhaps send him some happy news, since he was certain to find the Princess there. Since she was in a Maritime place, Cyrus durst not look with his Army that way, remembering the acci|dent at Sinope, but thought it much better to stay until she was at Sardis, there being great probability they would carry her thither; yet notwithstanding his extreme impatience to be nearer her, did almost make him alter resolution, and to march that very hour. But the King of Assyria told him something which induced him to have three or four days patience: and indeed they two speaking low together, it appeared by the countenance of Cyrus, that this Prince told him something which did extremely surprize him, and did infuse both joy and hope. The King of Assyria coming in, Cyrus out of his natural generosity to keep all his promises, told him all he knew concerning the Princess Mandana, and most faithfully acquainted him with the state of things: The King of Assyria was wrapt into as high an extasie of joy as he; But to do the King of Phrigia right, and to wait upon that intelligence which he was to receive from him; before any thing was attempted, Cyrus told that Prince, he desired to know more of that accident which be|el him, and which he would not tell of before; and that it was not just he should hearken only unto things which related unto himself in particular, but also those with reference unto him. The King of Phrigia told him, that Sosicles should satisfie him there|in when he pleased, and make him understand the cause of that Enterprize, the effects where|of he must wait upon. After this Araspes came to Cyrus, to acquaint him, that the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess Araminta, were the last night arrived at a little Village not above forty fu|rlongs from the Camp. Cyrus no sooner knew this, but he sent his complements unto them; and the next day he went himself, only with Hidaspes, and some few others, not car|rying the Prince Phraartes with him, because his passion did but trouble Araminta. But since Panthea did not receive good rest that last night, he only visited the Princess Araminta, unto whom he rendred an account of the state of all things; knowing it would be most joyful news unto her, if possible a happy conclusion could be put unto the War without fighting with the King her Brother. But since she did not well understand the interests of all those who should contrive the business; and desired to know the lives of two illustrious Persons, who would be the foundation of it: therefore Cyrus to satisfie those desires, told her, that he would not be acquainted with it himself, but in her presence; and therefore desired the King of Phrigia to send Sosicles unto him, which immediately he did: he was no sooner come, but Cyrus presenting him unto Araminta, Here Madam, said he unto her, is he who must satisfie both your curiosity, and mine; and acquaint you with things which doubtless are not common: Sosicles, said he, will tell you, and omit no circumstance in <◇> life of a Princess, whose name is as famous for her beauty and vertue, as her Lover is for his courage and soul. After the Princess Araminta had added her requests unto those of Cyrus, Sosicles knowing very well Page 196 that it much imported those persons of whom he was to discourse, that this Prince should affect and protect them, did joyfully obey, and began his discourse thus, addressing his speech unto the Princess Araminta.

The History of the Princess PALMIS, and CLEANDER.

PERhaps you will wonder, Madam, that a Grecian should precisely know all the interests of the Lidian Court: But when I shall have told you, that I was brought thither at ten years of age, and had the honour to be educated in the house of Craessus, amongst the Princes, his children, your wonder will vanish, and I become more credible. But for the better understanding of what I shall relate, I must acquaint you, that my Father by Nation, was of the Isle of Delphos, so famous for the renowned Temple of Apollo, though his Predecessours were originally of Sardis, and one of the chiefest Families in the Town: But the mutability of Fate bestowing upon them a considerable subsistence at Delphos, they have resided there ever since; and my father lived there in a flourishing quality, when a desire to see the Countrey of his Ancestours, moved him to go unto Sardis. Doubtless you will think it strange, I should usher in my relation of the Adventures of a great Princess, which things yet seem impertinent: But yet I must tell you, that if my father had not gone to Sardis, nothing of what I shall tell, had ever come to pass: therefore there was an absolute necessity of knowing what I related: one morning then when he was at Delphos, walking by the Sea side, upon a Tarrass in his Garden behind his house; and delighting to look upon all those Islands which inviron that of Delphos, and which by reason of their situation, are called the Isles of Cyclades: he discovered a Barck, which floated gentle upon the waves, wherein appeared none but a wo|man, who endeavoured to guide it, but could not; for my father perceived that this Barck went one way, and she did strive with all her power to make it go the other: Both curiosity and compassion moving him to see a woman so extremely puzzled, he got some Mariners who were near that place in a Boat, to go and see who it was; which they did, and indeed found none in it but that woman which my father saw; and at her feet, in a Cloth of Gold Mantle, a most admirable fair child about three years of age, who without any cares for his lamenta|ble condition of fortune, smiled upon the Mariners, as soon as they came near it. The extraor|dinary beauty of this child, and its most pleasing features, moved those dull sots to conduct that Barck whither she who was in it did desire; and looking upon the woman who held the Rudder, they asked her from whence she came, and whither she would go? but they were much amazed to find that she was dumb, and could do nothing but shew them Delphos with her hand, as who should say, there it is, I desire to be carried. Since it was my father who sent them out, in lieu of going to the Port, they came to the foot of the Tarrass, where he was walking, and where there was stairs, by which one might go into the Sea: This woman who was very old, was at the first much troubled to see they did not carry her unto the place where she desired, but coming nearer, and seeming by my fathers Garb, how he was not like one that would wrong the child, she was well satisfied, and made an hundred signes of God knows what, seeming as if she had much to say: sometimes she shewed the child: sometimes did lift up her hands and eyes to Heaven, and neither being understood, nor understanding what was said unto her, she moved extream compassion: she shewed unto my father a paper, in which was written in Greek, in a very bad Character, and no better Orthograply, This Child is recommended unto that God, which is adored at Delphos.

My Father seeing this child so fair, so amiable, and young; and seeing also the woman so sad, and seeming without any other designe, but to leave it unto the providence of the Gods, and seeing she had no subsistence for this child, and her self, he resolved to pity and take care of both: This Mute also shewed him a Picture of one most admirable fair; dressed, as Venus is used to be, sometimes lying upon a bed of Roses, with this difference yet, that she was clothed with a glorious Mantle, and shewed no lower then her breasts naked: close by her was Cupid presented with his Quiver and Arrows: under all were these two verses written, The Mothers eyes does deeper wound all hearts, Then Cupid can, with all his bows, and darts.

This dumb woman, shewing this Picture to my father, made signes for him to keep it carefully: yet he no sooner viewed it, but he observed that the Cupid there represented, was Page 197 the Picture of the Child which was in the Boat; so that when he had read the inscription, he concluded the Venus there pictured was the Mother of it; and that the picture was not a meer phan·as·m: so that conceiving something extraordinary in the adventure, and compassion also tender in his heart, he made signes unto the woman, that if she would dwell in the house with this child, he would take care for it, and her; and since she knew no better course, she consented unto it. Since my father was a Widdower, and had no children but my self, he took this child as a companion for me, for at that time I was but five years of age. He then took this woman, and this child into his house, and dismissed the Mariners, who had the Bark for their pains. Mean while, my father endeavoured to discover the truth of this adventure, but could be no better satisfied: for the more signes this woman made, the less he understood her: he carefully locked up the Picture and Letter which this woman gave him, and put the Cloth of gold Mantle in a place where it might be safely kept, giving her others in lieu of them, and hoping that hereafter these things might come to knowledge: he carefully observed the prattle of this child, who already began to pronounce some words, yet he could not collect any thing which might lead him to the knowledge of his Countrey. A while after this mute woman died, recommending this child unto my father by so many sad signes, and tears, that he resolved to have as much care of him, as of me: since he imagined that the Barck in which the child was found, considering the shape of it, did belong unto some of the Cycladean Isles, he sent it off thither in hopes to discover unto whom it belonged: but since there was so many of them, it was no easie matter to make an exact search: he divulged it among the Merchants which traided at Delphos, and enquired all of every one, but all in vain. Mean while, not knowing the name of this child, he called it by a name which he loved very well, which was Cleander, having a Son died a little before, who was of the same. I will not trouble you with relation of my fathers tender care over this Cleander, whom indeed he loved as well as me: but give me leave to tell you, that since this uncouth child was recommended unto the God which was adored at Delphos, who is the God of all Sciences, my father caused him to be educated in all Arts that Apollo himself could teach. So that certainly this child became an absolute Prodigie; and since his fifth year, there was not a stranger which came to Delphos, who was not most inquisitive after this young Cleander. For besides his admirable beauty, he was owner of such <◇> vast memory, and sharp wit, that he passed for a miracle. All this while we lived together like brothers; my father, as I told you, making no difference between him and me, telling every one he discoursed with him, that both of us were given unto him by the Gods, and therefore he ought not to make a distinction between us: Cleander might then be about eight years <...> Id, and I ten, when there was found in the earth an old plate of Copper, on which was engraved an ancient prophecy, which speaking to Jupiter, said, I shall make Delphos shake, as immoveable as it is.

Then Madam, questionless you know, that every one conceived this Island was a long time overflown with waters; and that they believed it never to be firm land, but since Latona did <...> e in there of Apollo, and Diana: so that this Prophecy made all the people believe, this Isle <...> ould be overflowed again as at first; and many Inhabitants thought to dissert the Countrey: my father used his best endeavours to perswade the minds of men to the contrary, but could <...> t! and it was above a whole year, before this terrour could be dissipated.

Since at that time, there arrived at Delphos, an Embassadour from Craessus, who came to <...> ing offerings unto the Temple of Apollo: and since my father whose name was Timocreon, received Letters by some of his Train, from some of his Cousins, who dwelt at Sardis, as inviting him thither, he resolved to go thither with this Embassadour, as well to satisfie his earnest <...> ires of seeing the ancient Countrey of his Predecessours, as to dissipate those fears out of the habitants of Delphos, which had spread almost throughout all the Isles of Cyclades: and del <...> ing the favour of passage from this Embassadours of Cressus, whose name was Menaceus, <...> e embarked in his Ship. During this Navigation, a great League of friendship grew between <...> y father, and this Embassadour: for certainly, (if it be lawfull for me to say as much of him who gave me life) Timocreon, was no common man. But the wonder was, that Menaceusnd such charms in the beauty of young Cleander, that he would never suffer him to be out sight: and he only was all the diversion of the voyage: At the first, Menaceus took us both <...> brothers, but my father undeceiving him, and relating how he came to him, his admiration is the higher, and he could not sufficiently wonder at the divine Providence in many acc <...> us: And since naturally the minds of men do most affect strange and new things, MenaceusPage 198 loved Cleander more then he did before he knew the manner of his coming to Delphos. When we landed at a Town in Ionia, where this Embassadour had occasions we went afterwards by land to Sardis, where my father was received by his Allies with all possible civility, and testimonies of joy: The next morning, after our first arrival, Menaceus sent my father word, that the King would have him come to Court, and to bring Cleander, and me with him. But Madam, before I further wade into my recital, it is expedient I acquaint you in what condition the Court of Lidia was at that time: Be pleased therefore to know, that Craessus had two brothers, the one called Antaleon, and the other Mexaris, who both were yet but young: Moreover, this Prince had two sons, and one daughter, the eldest called Atis, some eleven or twelve years of age; the second was dumb, and called Myrsiles, about nine or ten years old: and the Princess Palmis his daughter about five or six years of age; but yet already a very miracle of beauty. Since the Court had but newly left off their mourning for the Queen of Lidia, it was long since any publick Diversions were used, only a Horse-race that same day Menaceus presented my father unto the King, and brought me also with Cleander unto him. Since questionless, you Madam, are not ignorant of the immense riches of Craessus, not of all his vast magnificence; I shall not relate unto you the sumptuosity of his Pallace: let me only tell you, that Cleander and I being of that age, when all that glisters in the eye pleaseth the mind, we were extreamly charmed with the sight of so much Gold, and so vast a Riches, as we saw in all the Chambers through which we passed. Craessus at the very first was ravished with the beauty of Cleander, his Grace, and his boldness, but much more of those pleasing answers he returned unto all questions: for when Craessus asked him, what he thought of his Palace? This bold and ingenious child answered, that he thought it beautiful enough for a Temple, but much too beautiful for a house, since he conceived it not just that Apollo whom they worshipped at Delphos as a God, should not have so much gold as he had who was but a man, unless it were so, that you had more vertues and more power then Apollo had. This answer so amazed Craessus, that he had him come nearer him, and he carried him into a Gallery, out of which he might see the Horse-race in a great Plain under it, in which was all the glory of the Court, the young Princess, and also the little Princess Palmis, whom Cleander eyed very attentively. Mean while, Craessus being much delighted with the answers of Cleander, asked him an hundred questions, and amongst the rest, whether he took delight in seeing this horse-race? To which he answered, that he should take more pleasure in riding himself, then looking on. But, said Craessus unto him, what would you do with the prize, if you won it? and what on the contrary would you do, if you did not win it? If I lost it (said he without pausing) I would even die for anger, and if I won it, I would present it unto the Princess, your fair daughter, who stands by you. To be short, Madam, what should I say? Cleander so pleased the King. that it was his pleasure both he and I should continue with the Princes his children, and also knowing the abilities of my father, he would needs engage him in his service. So that he was induced to give order for transportation of all his portable estate from Delphos, to Sardis, and to set up his rest in Lidia.

To relate unto you Madam, the childish years of Cleanders life, would but abuse your patience, and would lose time which would be better employed in relating his hero·que acts: yet let me say thus much for his infancy; that never any did employ it better then he, nor more improved himself in all exercise of body, or Arts of mind, wit, and judgment. The Prince Atis, unto whose service he was particularly devoted, and who certainly was one of the sweetest Princes in the world, did love him with most extraordinary tenderness: And the Prince Myrsiles, though dumb, yet expressed all signes of possible affection that could be wished: for Maldam, this imperfection did not proceed from any defect in the ear, but tongue, and he did understand every thing which was spoken, it was not impossible he should express an affection unto Cleander. But though Atys and Myrsiles were both most admirably handsome, yet it must needs be confessed that Cleander had a kind of air in his countenance above them: and though he seemed to be below them both in his quality, yet his physiognomie spoke him much above them both. In a very short time he got the love of the people: the admiration of all compleat men, the inclinations of all the Ladies; the favour of the Princes, of the Princess, and of the King: But that which was observed most admirable in Cleander, was, that he seemed to be infinitely above all his greatest favours, not in scorning, but in using them well, and not seeking for them by any base and unworthy wayes, he enjoyed them without all pride or vanity and also did impart them unto such as were meritorious, with as much generous liberality, <◇> if he had been a King. In the infancy of his illustrious servitude, as oft as Cleander went from the Princes upon any complement unto the young Princess their Sister: This little fa·o <...> Page 199 asked him an hundred questions: sometimes whether he was not weary of Sardis; sometimes whether the Temple of Delphos was more magnificent then those he saw in Lidia; and by many other pretty questions, so as it was easily observed that Cleander pleased this young Princess: for when these Princes sent any others which were educated with them, she onlly returned answer unto the message brought her, without holding any long converse; though it is true, that seldom any but he was employed upon such business, for when he saw any such designed, he would desire the honour of the service, insomuch as he saw her almost every day: The great disproportion of years between Cleander and the Princess Palmis, was the reason that her Governess permitted her to speak longer with him, then any other: so that as long as Infancy lasted, he was the most happy in the world, since nothing did oppose his delights. Thus did we live until his sixteenth year, when some Subjects of Craessus began to rebel, so that now we went to War, wherein Cleander did things beyond belief of all but the illustrious Cyrus, who knows it not impossible to be both young and gallant: So that Cleander appeared so high in the eyes of all the Army, that every one no less extolled his courage, then before they did his beauty, wit and handsomness: He received a slight wound upon the left arm, in assaulting an enemy as he was striking at the King, which accident did double the favour of Craessus towards him: so that when we had subdued the Rebels, and returned unto Sardis, Cleander was no longer looked upon as a pretty child, but as a compleat and gallant man: for though he was very young, yet since as much wisdom, judgment and discretion appeared in him, as in all reason could possibly be expected from his age, he was not dealt with as others who first go into the world, but on the contrary at our return from the field, the young Cleander was treated as a man of high and exact Reason: the Princess her self, who then was thirteen years of age, began to hold discourse with him in a more reserved way, and less familiarity, though always with the same sweetness. At the same time the Prince Atys, who then was about nineteen years old, fell in love with a Lady in Court called Anaxilea, and since Cleander was his dearest Favorite, he made him the only Confident of his passion, discovering the very bottom of his heart unto him. This Lady was without dispute most fair, but her condition was so much inferior to the quality of a Lidian Prince, that he imagined Craessus would not approve of his open profession to love her. Therefore he endeavored to disguise his thoughts, and to appear both more civil and more courtly to all Ladies in general, that thereby he might conceal his true affection from his father: Cleander then was for a while much troubled about it, but yet that business was not his greatest torment: for Madam, be pleased to know, that at the Kings return unto Sardis, the Princess of Lidia appeared so admirably fair in the eyes of Cleander, that she charmed him anew, for certainly had he never seen her before, he could not have been more surprized: and indeed there was reason for it, since during the ten Months which the War lasted, her beauty was so prodigiously improved, that all the people were forced to acknowledg, never eyes did see so perfect a beauty: since therefore she had no less spirit then beauty, it is no wonder if the Soul of Cleander was not able to resist a passion which had so moving a cause; and indeed it was so high, that he began to love without hope, and love did so absolutely command his heart, that it was impossible for him to resist. At the same time there was a Prince at Sardis, named Artesilas, who was in love also with the Princess Palmis, but his passion was stuffed with ambitious thoughts. Thus it may be said that Love did take his original from the Wars: for at our return from it, the Court did put on another face, and nothing but Feasts and Gallantry were seen in it, which for a certain time did render it most delightful: but towards the end of Winter, a fresh War was talked on against the Missicans; and the Spring no sooner budded forth but Craessus took the field: An entire Summer was spent in two Sieges, and two Battels; wherein Cleander did so eminently carry himself, that as he went from Sardis only a Voluntier, so he returned Lievt[nant] General under the Prince Atys, who commanded the Army, towards the end of the year, in the absence of Craessus, whom some indisposition of body moved to leave the field: I understood since by one who belonged unto the Princess, and who was my Cousin, that she was much joyed at the good fortune of Cleander; telling every one that she always foresaw he was no ordinary man: After then the Misseans, the Chaliibes, and the Mariandines were vanquished, we returned again to Sardis, where Cleander began again to be looked upon with other eyes: For though he was the very same he was before, yet according to the common weakness of almost all men who put a difference between virtue unfortunate, and virtue in prosperity, not only the heard of people, but also men of parts lived with him after another manner: and he himself also did lead another course of life, for since he was every day faster in the fetters of Love, because the Princess every day became more fair and amiable, therefore he Page 200 was much more melancholy. Since I did plainly perceive this melancholy alteration, and saw no reasonable cause for it, I desired him to acquaint me with it: I took this freedom upon me, because the alteration in his fortune having no influence upon his heart, he loved me as well as he did before; yet notwithstanding he would not open himself unto me as I desired him: sorrow must extremely sad his Soul, before he can confess he loved, and loved the Princess Palmis; and then all came out: I did extremely chide him for entertaining a passion, which in all reason would never permit him any hopes, considering he was ignorant of his original: I used all my endeavors to cure him of that disease, which pleased him, though it did extremely torment him: I told him a hundred times, that since if he pleased he might be happy, it were meer madness, voluntarily to render himself miserable: But though he acknowledged I had good reason for what I said, yet he could do no otherwise, and in lieu of resisting his love with violence, he cherished it with care: For he saw the Princess as oft as he could possible; and discoursed with her upon all occasions; he rendered her all the services he could devise; and fettering himself, he groaned under the weight of his chains, not daring openly to complain; and though he was very happy in appearance, yet he was in reality most miserable: for when he considered, that he knew not what himself was, and for ought he saw never should, his melancholy became so insupportable, that he was not Master of his own reason, and related such a miserable story of himself, that I was no less grieved then himself. In the mean while the Prince Atys, whose quality was not less considerable with the fair Anaxilea, then his merit and affection, was so kindly treated, that a most great League of Amity grew betwixt them; and his greatest care was to hide this secret Correspondency, not only from the eyes of Craessus, but also from all the Court. This Prince conceiving he had an absolute power over the mind of Cleander, did think the best way to deceive all the world was to move him to counterfeit being in love with Anaxilea: So that sending one morning for him, and entertaining him in private, My dear Cleander, said he unto him, I can never be happy without you; and unless you help to hide my real passion, by your seeming to love Anaxilea, I shall never be able to hide my hap[piness], which you know will be ruined as soon as discovered: Therefore I conjure you, to court her as if you were desperately in love; and so that all the Court may believe it: which if you do (said he and embraced him) I shall be the most happy man alive: for not only all the Court will easily believe, that my thoughts are not upon her; but the King, and the Princess my sister, will believe you to be in love with her: So that in desiring this office from you which will be honorable, I hope you will not deny it: If you were in love with any, then I should not desire you to undertake it; but since I could never observe you engaged unto any in the Court, I shall not doubt of this favor. Sir (replied Cleander in a wonder at the Prince's words) I am so bad a dissembler of my own thoughts, that I am afraid I shall discover in lieu of concealing yours: and how do you think (said he hoping to turn it into a Rallary) that a man whom yourself says never was in love, should easily perswade others that he is so: believe me Sir, to beget such an opinion, it were requisite to testifie the being so upon other occasions, and I do not think there is a man in the world so very unfit for this employment as my self. You have so much ingenuity and eloquence, replied the Prince of Lidia, that you would act it most admirably well: for the truth is, there is nothing requisite, but to discourse often with Anaxilea, principally when much company, and when the Princess my sister is present: since her society is very pleasant, and since you will discourse of my Love who loves you, I hope you will not be weary of her conversation. But my dear Cleander, to the end it may the sooner be divulged, and come quickly unto the Kings ear, I beseech you let my Sister perceive as soon as possible you can your addresses unto Anaxilea. Cleander blushed at the Prince's words, and speaking more seriously then he did before, I know Sir, you are not ignorant (said he unto him) that I would with joy dye to do you any service, whensoever any occasion presents it self; but I may without any crime or offence say it, I do not think I am able to perform what you desire of me. Why Cleander, replied the Prince in a little amazement, can you not for my sake discourse often with the fairest Lady in the world? Is it because you are afraid to be fettered with the chains of Love? No Sir, answered he, my respects which I owe you, would prevent that danger: But I have so strong an aversion against any dissimulation, that if I should undertake it, I am perswaded I should do it very ill. However, try, replied the Prince, unless you will lose me, or at least tell me ingenuously your true reason why you will not; for since I am fully perswaded you love me, and knowing you to be of no phantastical humor, there must necessarily be some secret cause which moves you to deny me this favour. Truly Sir, replied Cleander, I have no other excuse then what I have already told you. Was I not much mistaken, said the Prince, when I thought you loved no body? and is there not Page 201 some Beauty or other whom you love, and fear to make jealous? If it be so, said he, tell me sincerely: for if you be upon such terms with her as to trust her with a secret, I will consent you shall acquaint her with mine, and so by that course you may colour your own passion as well as mine: for I make no question, but if you love any it is such a one as hath a reasonable Soul, and will be perswaded unto that toleration: But if you be not upon such terms with her unto whom you are devoted, then tell me as much sincerely, and I have done. Cleander then was extremely non-plust; and if some had not come in which broke off this crabbed conversation, I know not how he would have answered such pressing questions, without vexation to the Soul of the Lidian Prince. But Artesilas coming in upon a visit, Cleander had some time to think upon an answer, especially since the prince Atys had not any leasure all that day to revive the discourse: so that Cleander looking me out, and carrying me to walk in the Palace Gar[dens], he acquainted me with all the passage; and described his vexation of Soul, whilst he was discoursing with the Prince of Lidia, in such sad expressions, that my Soul also was much sadded in his behalf: For consider, said he, the crossness of this adventure, that I should passionately be in love with one to whom I dare not shew the least sign of my affection, and also that I should be required to express a thousand testimonies of affection unto one whom I love not: And that which is the most odd of all is, that I must do this, to the end that she whom I adore, should think I am in love with her with whom I love not; and one whom he who puts me upon it would oever have me love: Ah Fortune, cryed he out, is it not misery enough to love a Princess, whom I dare not acquaint with my affection, but that I my self must perswade her that I love another. Since it is so, replied I, that you dare not acquaint her with your passion, and in all likelihood never will, I conceive it need not much trouble you what ever she thinks of you. Ah Sosicles, said he, certainly you know not what love is: for you must know, that though a captivated and amorous Slave do love a Queen, he loves her yet with this incontinent wish, that she should guess at his passion: and since I must discover the very bottom of my heart unto you, this, my dear Sosicles, is the very period of all my desires. I know very well (continued Cleander) that unless I absolutely lose my Reason, I never ought to acquaint Palmis with my Love, yet I know also that unless she lose the sight of me, she must needs in time guess at my thoughts: which if once she did, my dear Sosicles, I should think my self most happy; and yet it is desired by this, that I my self should be the only obstacle unto my chief felicity: for how should ever the Princess guess at my love of her, if she think me in love with Anaxilea? Ha, no, no; I cannot obey the Prince; and though I should promise him, yet I am not able to keep my word. But, said I unto him, do you not consider that if you should incense him, he is brother unto the princess Palmis, and not acquainting her with the true cause of his complaint against you, perhaps he will speak unto her in your disadvantage? What would you have me do? answered he. I would confess unto the Prince (said I unto him) that I am in love, and never name with whom. But, replied he, do you not apprehend some fears that Atys would discover that passion, which I desire the princess Palmis should guess at? As long as you conceal the name of her you love, said I, you hazard nothing. I shall hazard all, replied he, for considering the manner how I adore this Beauty, I shall no sooner confess that I am in love, but shame will blush the secret in my face; and will, in spite of my resolution, let him see the image of my adored Palmis imprinted on my heart: For the Prince knows by his own experience, that one may love one below himself, and may as easily think it possible for one to love above ones quality as below it. Moreover, would it not highly offend him, that I should conceal my love from him, who so very confidently discovered his to me? In a word, whatsoever I know, me thinks, he ought to know it also, and to trust him but by halves, seems dangerous unto me. Then, said I unto him, I would play a little false with him, and name some other Lady in the Court. Then Sosicles, answered he, how can the Prince think I love that Lady, when he sees I never talk with her? and if I should often talk with her, how should the Princess ever imagine that I love her? After much debating upon this odd adventure, we parted without resolving upon any thing: and the next morning Cleander was as far to seek for an answer unto the Prince, as if he had not any time of preparation for it. So that since Atys could not penetrate into the depth of Cleanders heart, he grew angry that he could not move him to act as he desired; not but that Cleander used the most tender expressions to excuse himself: yet since he saw he was in love, and would not impart it to him, he took this refusal very unkindly, and valued not his verbal excuses. Atys then would press him no further, but kept at a distance, and treated him much more coldly then ordinary, so that it became the Court discourse. Since the princess Palmis did very much esteem Cleander, she asked the prince her brother the reason of this change; but he gave her such ambiguous Page 202 answers, that she could not comprehend the cause: So that Cleander coming to her about an hour after, she did so press him to tell her what was the business between the prince and him, and that so urgently, as he was no less puzzled for an answer to Palmis, then he was to the prince of Lidia; he told her that he knew not the cause of his disgrace, but contented himself with being certain he never failed in any due respects unto that Prince: yet was she far unsatisfied with this answer: The business went so far that Craessus heard of it, and asked the prince his son, why there was a greater distance between him and Cleander then formerly?

The Prince making no answer unto this question, because he durst not acquaint him with the cause, Cressus did read him a long Lecture against the inconstancy of them, who alter their opinions upon causeless grounds, commanding him not to continue any longer at a distance with him. However it chanced so, that the Prince Atis and Anaxilea fell at odds; and this Prince being of a violent disposition, did abruptly cast her off, and resolved to leave her for ever: and the Prince had no sooner broke off with her, but he had a great desire to relate this adventure unto his Sister the Princess Palmis, and the rather because indeed he knew not whom else to open his heart unto, as he never had done unto any but Cleander, unto whom he did not yet so freely speak, as usually before. So that he being one day alone with the Princess Palmis, and falling insensibly into talk of his change, he related unto her his fondness of Anaxilea, and the cause of his coldness towards Cleander: and wondring in himself at so great a change in so little a time, I did not think, Sister, said he unto her, that I should ever have disclosed my follies so freely unto you, when Cleander denied to faign a love of Anaxilea, and returned such slender excuses for it unto me: but since it is so now, that I dare open all unto you, I confess my anger of mind against Cleander begins to die, and in lieu thereof, I love him dearly: yet since I do well understand what reason he had to resist me so obstinately, I confess, that I can hardly speak unto him concerning that business which puts us at such a distance. I do conceive (answered the Princess, not suspecting Cleander was in love with her) that you ought not to think the worse of Cleander, because he refused that office: nor do I think him so culpable as you imagine him; and he would never have denied it, but because he is in love himself; for I am certain he is as much devoted unto your service as possible can be: so that I must consequently conclude, he never would have opposed the will of his Master, but out of fear he should be put to nominate his Mistress. But since I named mine unto him, replied the Prince, why should he hide his affection from me? Because, replied she, and smiled, perhaps he is a more discreet Lover then you are: and to speak truth, because it is more ordinary and safe for a Prince to trust his secret unto his Favourite, then it is for the Favourite to trust his Prince. But Sister, answered he, If Cleander be in love, how is it possible that none should perceive it? Since, I am certain, added the Princess, he is infinitely impatient to be re-invested into your favour, it is expedient I propound unto him, to become his Peace-maker, upon condition he will sincerely tell us, who it is he loves; or at the least, acknowledge unto us, he is in love with some or other. After the Princess had said so, and being indeed very desirous to know whether Cleander was in love, and with whom, she went into her Chamber: So that there being willing to divert her selfe, to satisfy her curiosity, and restore Cleander unto the Princes favour, she called for him; Cleander, said she unto him, I found the Prince my brother so disposed to remit you into his former favour, that I desired speedily to acquaint you with such news as I supposed would be very welcome unto you: But in this reconciliation, there is a condition to be added, which I conceive you may without any difficulty observe: I shall never revoke, Madam, replied he, that Doome which you have pronounced: and I do esteem my self so unhappy in displeasing that Prince, for whom I would willingly have died, that to expiate my crime, there is no punishment which I would not suffer. That which at this time I desire of you, (said she, and blusht against her will) is, That you confess before my brother, and me, whether the cause which moved you to deny him that favour of counterfeiting love unto Anaxilea, was not, because you feared to make some beauty or other jealous? How Madam, (answered Cleander with wonder) are you acquainted now with that secret which the Prince would have concealed from you with so much care, at that time when I was unfortunately constrained to refuse his desired employment? Yes, said Atis, and interrupted her, she does know it: and by this you may be assured, that I shall never reveal your secret unto any; for since I have imparted it unto her, it is a signe I do no longer love Anaxilea; and since it is so, you may be assured that there is none upon earth but the Princess my Sister, unto whom I would impart a business of this nature. Sir, replied Cleander, after he had well recollected himself, I am most glad that this discourse which I hear from the mouth of the Princess, does enable me to answer sincerely, and assure you, that I never feared making any one jealous by Page 203 fainigng love unto Anaxilea. Your answer, replied the Princess, I do believe is more modest, then sincere: and therefore tell us more precisely, whether you are in love with any or no; if you will not tell us who it is whom you adore.

Madam, replied Cleander, Is it not sufficient to justify my self in the opinion of the Prince, that I protest before you, I should never have disobeyed him, but because it was an absolute impossibility to do otherwise? No, answered she, it is not sufficient, for if it were, he must then do you the favour to pardon you, and to treat you as one that is culpable: whereas on the contrary, if you do as I desire you, you will justify your self as innocent, and needs no pardon. But Madam, replied he, Suppose I should be in love with none; yet how durst I confess my self to be so insensible here at Sardis, where all that can be called beauty in the world is to be found? And suppose it true, that I were in love with any one, how do you think I could tell that unto two at one time, which perhaps I never told unto her who is the cause of my passion; and which perhaps I never shall tell her? If it be only the number of confidants, which hinders you from declaring it, replied the Prince, and smiled, I am contented you tell your secret only unto my Sister. No, no, said the Princess, I am not so indulgent as you and I expect that Cleander should acknowledge as well unto you as my self, that he is in love, otherwise I pronounce him guilty and culpable both to you and me. I would it were the pleasure of the Gods, Madam, (answered Cleander, with much confusion in his face, and looking upon her in a most passionate, but respective manner) that you could look into my heart, and there see my most secret thoughts, since if you could do so, you would there find, that I speak but what I ought to do: Truly Sister, said the Prince of Lidia, Cleander moves my pity, and I beseech you press him no further; for when I call to mind my own vexation, when any did but suspect what I desired to conceal, I cannot chuse but be sensible of his: You are all goodness, replied Cleander, and more indulgent then the Princess. I do confess it, said she, and smiled; and that which does most exasperate my severity, is, to see you do not think me discreet enough to trust me with a common secret, for to tell me that you are in love, is not to tell me all your adventure and story: Well Madam, (said Cleander, even transported out of himself) if there need nothing but that to satisfy you, I do confess it, but I most humbly and heartily beseech you, ask me no further: for I had rather die a thousand deaths then tell any more. When you are fallen out with your Mistress, replied the Princess, and smiled, as the Prince my brother is with Anaxilea, we then shall know all your Gallantry, as now we do his. I do not think Madam, answered Cleander coldly, that I shall ever be so far in favour with my Mistress, as to fall out of it. Time will tell us all, said she; in the interim, I pronounce you innocent, and beseech my brother to receive you so. I know not Sister, replied Atis very pleasantly, whether after you have reconciled Cleander and me, it must not be his office to reconcile us; for you have railed so bitterly against my weakness, that I know not how I should take it. Your reason is now at too much liberty, answered the Princess, to take exceptions without a cause: but as for Cleander, since he is in love, we had need be circumspect how we speak unto him, for I have heard say, that melancholy Lovers are soonest angered. By that mark, said Atis, you came to know the Prince Artesilas is in love with you. You are very apt to revenge, replied the Princess, to retort such an angry piece of rallery unto so mild an answer: Atis could not reply unto this, because Artesilas would have heard it, if he had: but since the Genius and conversation of that Prince did not please him, and since his visit had already been very long, he went away, and carried Cleander with him, who was sufficiently vexed to leave his Rival in that manner with his Mistress: he was all the rest of that day with the Prince of Lidia, who treated him according to his wonted affability and freedom; but at night, when he was at liberty to confer and open himself unto me, I perceived by his discourse, that he was sick of such a disease which nothing could cure but death. Am I not most miserable, said he? for I did not deny to saign affection unto Anaxilea, but only out of fear, that the Princess whom I adored should not think that I was really in love with her: and by consequence could never imagine that I loved her self: yet now I see that my denial of the Prince Atis to do so, hath perswaded the incomparable Palmis that I am really in love with her, or else some other in the Court, as I was forced to confess; were she not thus perswaded, she would not have been so pleasant as she was, but certainly if she had any suspicion of the truth, I should have seen more signs of anger in her eyes. It seems, said I unto him, by your discourse you would have thought your self happy in her anger: Cleander made a pause at this, and after a while consulting with himself, I think, said he unto me, that rather then I should die, and leave her ignorant of my love, I should be contented to see her angry: That is a favour, (replied I, and smiled) which you may easily obtain. Ah cruel friend, said he unto me, I still find you more ignorant in matters of love. But since I must open all my secrets unto you, Page 204 know, that at one and the same time, I wish things which are quite contrary to one another; and that I no sooner say I should be contented to see her angry, upon condition she were acquainted with my love, but I repent of it, and had rather die then displease her. But how were you able, replied I, to tell her that you were in love? I know not that, replied he, but I know that I had no sooner acknowledged it, but I wished that I had not: for had she apprehended my real thoughts, I should have seen her eyes full of indignation: yet to my sorrow I saw she thought me in love, but never suspected it was with her self: so that I endured most miserable torment. Ask me not, Sosicles, what I would have her think, when I confess I am in love with her; for I know not my self: but I am sure of this, that to be less then a King, and love the incomparable Palmis, is the greatest folly in the world: However, that I do not know so much as whether I am the son of a Free-man, or no, yet I love her, and shall do eternally: and I cannot brook the affection of the Prince Artesilas. This being the state of things, abundance glorious and pleasant Company came to Sardis; for the Prince Abradates, second son unto the King of Susiana, who then reigned, and son unto a sister of Cressus, whom that King had married, came thither; And at the same time also, the fair Panthea, daughter unto the Prince of Clasomenes, a tributary unto Cressus, came to dwell in the Court of Lidia, with the Prince her father: so that their arrival revived all manner of diversions. There came unto Sardis also at that time a Brother of the King of Phrigia, named Adrastus, who, as it was said, had killed another of his brothers against his will, and desired to be purged from that crime by that Laws of that Countrey, which between the Lidians and Grecians is small difference. Since this Prince was admirably handsome, and of much spirit; and since his banishment was rather for a misfortune then a crime, Cressus received him very well, and according to the custom of Lidia, he was purified in the Temple of Jupiter, and then appeared in the Court as a strange Prince, whom every one did honour. Cressus allowing him a subsistence, befitting his quality, and promising to endeavour a reconciliation between him and his brother, the King of Phrigia. It may be said of Cressus, that he heaped up a greater Mass of treasures together, then ever any did, and was more magnificent then any Prince upon earth; being therein much different from the young Prince Mexaris his Brother, who was not less rich then he, but was more covetous then another of his brothers, named Antaleon, was ambitious, or Cressus liberal. The Court being then so glorious, as I have described, Esope so famous for his ingenious fables, which contained solid Morals in pleasant fictions, came thither also, and notwithstanding the ugliness of his face, and deformity of his composure, yet the beauty of his wit, and greatness of his soul, shined so at Sardis, that he was wonderful welcome: And that this renowned Town might have men of all qualities, Solon, so famous for his Laws, came thither also, who was entertained by Cressus with all imaginable honours: So that it may be said, and rightly, that Sardis was never so full of illustrious persons as then; for every one that had any excellence in Arts throughout all Greece, either came themselves, or sent their works thither: so that which way soever one turned his eye, he might see something for his instruction, and diversion. But though this Court was the most glorious in the world, yet Cleander was there the most unhappy Lover upon earth: for though he was adored by all the Court, yet since the Princess Palmis was ignorant of his love, and he durst never acquaint her with it, he lived a life extremely melancholy: and whilst the Prince Atis, Antaleon, Mexaris, Abradates, Artesilas; and all the rest of that illustrious Crew, were high in all delights, solitary Cleander sighed in secret, and wore only melancholy in his eyes: The Prince Mersiles, by reason of his imperfection, was also very reserved and solitary: However, this conversation did much delight the Princess, who not suspecting Cleanders love to her, was only curious to learn with whom he was in love: but with such an odd kind of curiosity (as I understood by my Cousin, who since did tell me) that not knowing any reason for it, she was really as fearful to know whom Cleander loved, as in appearance she desired it: for this Cousin told me, that the Princess discoursing one day with her concerning his passion, and bidding her to enquire concerning it, she began to reckon up all she could think upon, who might in likelihood be the cause, and though she named all the beauties in the Court, yet she could not find one who her mind did think fit for it; so that this Cousin of mine, whose name was Cyleneis, and who was much in favour with the Princess, began to laugh; Madam, said she, you would either have Cleander not in love at all, or else you would have him fix his affection much above or much below himself, for I named all the Ladies who in reason are fit for him, considering the present condition of his fortune to fix any thoughts upon: 'Tis very true, said the Princess Palmis, and blusht, but I do not look out a Mistress for Cleander, proportionable to his quality, since he knows not what it is himself; nor suitable to his fortune, which is no more then very mean, Page 205 but according to his virtue and merit, which is most extraordinary; and this is the reason why I cannot guess who it is he loves, because I cannot find any one amongst all those which you have named that is worthy of his affection, and therefore I must needs conclude that he loves one that is below himself.

Thus Madam you see what thoughts the princess of Lidia had of Cleander, who yet was oftentimes much puzzled to find answers unto her questions: for when she remembered that she told him, he would discover who it was he loved, when his Mistress and he fell out with one another, she would always, when any opportunities were offered, ask him, whether he did not yet begin to be out of favor with his Mistress; and whether ere long he would be in an humor to reveal his secret. If I should reveal it unto you Madam, replied he one day, doubtless I should be out of favor with her; but as long as I conceal it, I need not fear her anger. How Cleander, replied the Princess, cannot I know your passion, but you must be out of favor with her? and cannot you tell it unto me but she must know it? No Madam, answered he, I should no sooner confess what you desire to know, but she whom I love would know my crime, by the shame which she would discover in my eyes, and would most cruelly punish me for it. If it be so, said she and smiled, then stay till you jar, and till you be out of any fears to incense her. Thus did the Princess before she was aware give a handsome opportunity unto Cleander to discover his passion, had he been so bold as to have closed with it; yet he was extremely afraid of the disfavor of Craessus upon an odd reason. I think I have already told you, that Solon at his first coming unto Sardis was bid very welcome by that Prince: But since it is the Custom of all Great Princes to love that one should commend their Magnificence, Craessus having shewed Solon all his vast Treasures, and the most prodigious Riches which his House was adorned with, he asked him, whether he had seen any in all his Voyages more happy then he was? Since Solon did not think true felicity did consist in such things, like a man of high wisdom, but a bad flatterer, he answered, that he knew many more happy then he; and amongst the rest he named one Tellus, who winning a Battel, and dying for his Country, said, That none were happy before their death. Craessus thought by this saying of Solons, that he preferred the virtue of Cleander (who was become his great Favorite) before all the King of Lidia's Riches; and that this Prince did enjoy in him a Treasure which he was ignorant of, and which was to be valued much above all the Riches which he shewed him with so much delight. Since nothing does more incense the spirits of men, principally Kings, then to scorn what they esteem, Craessus could not endure this plain-dealing sincerity of Solon, but the pleasant and frolique humor of Easop^d did much better please him: so that this wise Solon went discontentedly from him. As Cleander had a most generous Soul, so he did endeavor to hide this injury as much as he could, and by the orders of the Princess her self had an especial care of this Athenian Law-maker: He conducted him some thirty furlongs out of Sardis, which act of civility did so much incense Craessus, that he could not endure Cleander should be so bold as render any good office unto the man he frowned upon; and this trivial business was like to have brought a great change upon the fortunes of Cleander: but yet the Prince Atys, and the Princess of Lidia, did so intercede, that they did procure his reconciliation. In the mean while Adrastus became so desperately in love with the Princess Palmis, that Artesilas and Cleander themselves could be no deeper wounded then he. Atis also renewed his old love unto Anaxilea, in spite of his resolutions to the contrary: but it was after such a manner, as that he made no secret of it; and although Cressus did not approve of his choyce, yet he expressed a hundred publique testimonies of his passion to her. I think it was about this time that Abradates and Mexaris fell in love with Panthea, yet since that business is not pertinent to the story of the Princess Palmis, I shall omit the relation of it, and only tell you, that at the same time Cleander was most unhappy: Yet had he so much consolation in his misery, as to observe that the Princess of Lidia was very averse against this new Rival: but yet he knew that the Prince Atis did encourage Adrastus in his thoughts of the Princess his sister: For since the King of Phrigia had no children, and resolved never to marry again, Adrastus was in all appearance to be King: So that conceiving this marriage would be advantageous unto the Princess, he became his Advocate to perswade her and Cressus unto it: He pressed the business so very violently in favor of the prince Adrastus, that since she saw that all her reasons in excuse of her coldness to him, would not rid her of his importunities, she resolved to employ that power which Cleander had over the mind of the Prince her brother, being still ignorant of the interest which he had himself, and not knowing that he had already used his best endeavors that way: She sent then for Cleander, and causing him to come into her Closet, after she had used a Complement or two unto him, to prepare his consent unto what she should desire of him. Page 206 and after he assured her she might absolutely dispose of his very life; What I shall desire of you, said she unto him, is not perhaps so easie a business as you imagine, since to satisfie my desires it is to resist with all your power the will of a Prince who you love very well, and who also loves you infinitely: Indeed you must perswade the Prince my brother from soliciting me so earnestly in behalf of the prince Adrastus, and that it is enough he protects him in this Court, without any further importunities upon her: though I know well enough I have no reason for my aversion to him, since I know he is of an illustrious extract; and shall in all likelihoods be a King: that he is handsome, and of a Soul; that he testifies much affection to me; that the King does not dislike his design; that the prince Atis does assist him, and that my Soul is not engaged any other way: But yet for all this, I have so strong an aversion towards him, that being out of hopes to overcome it, nor ever intending to try, I conjure you by all that's dear unto you, to employ that perswasive power which I know you have over my brother, to prevent him from persecuting me any further: since I never opposed his affection unto Anaxilea, which was not very justly grounded; so, do you keep him from opposing my strong aversion to Adrastus, which I do confess also, it is not well grounded neither. I leave you, Madam, to judg what joy Cleander had, to understand from the mouth of Palmis her self, that she hated one of his Rivals: But since he was desirous to hear her express as much against another, Maldam, said he unto her with much reverence, I find the prince Adrastus so unhappy in your hate, that it were a kind of cruelty not to pity him; yet I do interest my self so much in any thing which concerns you, that I must needs tell you, there is nothing (without all exceptions) which I will not do, to deliver you from his importunities. But Madam, if after your goodness to command me any thing in your service, it be permitted me to speak sincerely, I shall tell you, that one thing which most moves the Prince to protect Adrastus, is his hatred of Artesilas; and he thinks he cannot do him a more sensible displeasure, then to be a cause that you should prefer a Phrigian Prince before him. Therefore Madam (if I be not too presumptuous in speaking thus) it is your part, whilst I transact with the Prince, to transact so with Artesilas, that he be no obstacle to my obtaining what you desire. I have already told you, replied the Princess, that my affection is not engaged unto any: So that though there be not such an antipathy between me and Artesilas, as there is between me and Adrastus, yet since I am very indifferent towards him, it will be an easie matter for me to satisfie the Prince my brother in that; provided he let me have the freedom to be rigid towards Adrastus, Artesilas shall have no great cause to commend me for compliance with him. When Cleander heard the Princess express her self thus, he was so exceedingly transported with joy, that I wonder he did not make her perceive his love to her by the delight which sparkled in his eyes. It is very true, this joy did not continue long: for when he began to consider that the Princess did not suspect any thing of his passion to her; and that by all appearances he should never be able to obtain from the Prince of Lidia what he desired, his melancholy did succeed his joy: But yet his certainty to know his Rivals not loved, was such an essential cause of satisfaction, that his joys did overcome his sorrows again; and he appeared before the Princess very well contented that he had dived so deep into her Soul: Yet sometimes when he considered that the foundation of his joy was only because the Princess was not in love with any, Oh Heaven, said he, am I not out of my wits to rejoyce at that I ought to lament? for is it possible ever to be happy, and not be loved? and is there any hopes of being loved, when she that is loved does not so much as know it? It is true, I am assured that the heart which I would be possessed of, is not enjoyed by any; yet I may be certain that it must never be enjoyed by me: so that which way soever I look, there is no hopes of any contentation to be found: The greatest felicity that I can expect, is only to see my Rivals as miserable as my self. However, he began to be obedient unto the Princess; and since the prince Atis was a Debtor unto him for his life ever since the Missean Wars, and moreover since he knew that the Prince was much pleased with his discourse, he used all his ingenuity and favour to dissuade him from protecting Adrastus, but yet all his perswasive arguments could not bring it about: For besides the aversion which this Prince had unto Artesilas, he had another predominate motive to affect Adrastus, which Cleander in the end discovered, which was, because Adrastus was he who had reconciled Anaxilea and him together. So that this Lady being desirous to gratifie so good an office, kept him still in favour with the Prince, so that all the wit, cunning and credit which Cleander had with him, could not alter his settled resolution: he attempted to win Anaxilea unto his design, but it was impossible, for she had a secret grudge to him in her heart, because he refused to counterfeite a love unto her, and so exposed her fortunes unto danger; besides, she did conceive it to be a kind of scorn of her, when he refused that office. Cleander then being out of all hopes to Page 207 obtain any thing for either of them, was in a hundred minds to quarrel with Adrastus, and so rid the Princess of him by a way more violent then she desired him: but knowing she would not approve of that action, and that then he should lose her for ever, he restrained his jealousy and his choller, and suffered an incredible anguish of mind. Whilst he was negotiating this business, the Princess, according as it was resolved betwixt them, did treat Artesilas so roughly, that Cleander would have been infinitely will pleased at it if the bad success of his business had not cooled his joys. However, it was fit he should give her an account of what he had done; and he went one morning with so many signs of sorrow in his eyes, that she knew what his answers would be as soon as he came into her Chamber: I see Cleander (said she, and came near him, lest her women should understand what was spoken) that the Prince my brother prefers Adrastus before my quiet or your prayers, and will not alter his opinion. I am even desperate Madam, replied he, that I am forced to tell you, I have negotiated all in vain; and then he made an exact relation of what he had both done and said to bring his design about: But Madam, said he, Adrastus perhaps has some secret enemy in Court, who would quickly dispatch him, if he were assured it would not displease you. Oh no Cleander, said the Princess, I would not have anothers revenge include mine; and they will extreemly disoblige me, if they attempt any violent act against that Prince: Perhaps I shall find out a way to punish him for his obstinate importunities without the need of any others help; and if what you tell me be true, that the reason why the Prince protects Adrastus is because he hates Artesilas, I shall treat the Rival of the one, and the Enemy of the other, so well and kindly, that perhaps I shall divide the troubles which they procure me amongst themselves. Oh Madam (said Cleander, and was amazed at this answer) is it possible that the wisest Princess in the world should be revenged upon her self, by wishing it upon another? For Madam (said he with a double addition of extream melancholy) did you not once do me the honour to tell me, that Artesilas was very indifferent unto you? Yes, said she unto him, but it is better to choose where one is indifferent, then where one hates. In the name of the Gods, Madam, said Cleander unto her, take up no such resolution, which if I dare say it, will cause you to be censured for one that is not phantastical: for since all the Court has been a witness of your severity to Artesilas, what will they censure when they see you change so suddenly? Certainly there is some reason for what you say, replied she, but I had rather be thought light and phantastical, then be continually persecuted both by the Prince my brother, and by Adrastus: I do confess, Cleander, that this kind of revenge is phantastical, and that I do cross my self as much as others by it; but yet I know not what course else to take. Madam (said he, and interrupted her speech, not being able to consent unto her resolution, using Artesilas kindly) allow me first some few days to consult whether I can contrive some better expedients to do you service. No, no, said she unto him, deceive not your self and me: I have long since discovered, said she and smiled, that you love Artesilas no more then you do Adrastus, therefore perhaps for your own particular revenge you would not have me revenge my self this way: But Cleander, since you are very generous, you must not do thus, but on the contrary you ought to prefer my interest at this time before your own. Your interests Madam, replied he, shall ever be ten thousand times dearer unto me then my own; but upon this occasion I dare tell you, that if you knew all the evil which you do in favoring Artesilas, perhaps I say you would not do it. Cleander pronounced these words with so much confusion in his face, that the Princess was extreemly surprized; and since she understood not the sence of them, I cannot unriddle your words, said she unto him, nor will I trouble my self about it, therefore speak more plainly, if you would have me understand you, or else speak not at all, if you think it fit I should not understand you. I think that it is the latter of these two which best becomes me, replied he, and without any exposition of those words which slipped from me unawares, I ought to thank the Gods that you did not understand them. The Princess blushed at this discourse, and by the disorder which appeared in her eyes, she let him know, that she began to understand his meaning: But since he feared she would treat him ill, if he gave her any time to descant upon his words; Madam, said he unto her, what is your pleasure I should do to give you satisfaction? That you tell me no more of any such things as I neither do nor ought to understand, replied she; and that you keep within the limits which I have prescribed, in doing <◇> that office unto my brother whensoever occasion shall present it self. I shall be most obedient Madam (answered he with a profound reverence,) and then so many infallible signs of his passion appeared in his face, that unless she had no eyes, it was impossible but she must needs perceive it: and indeed she did so clearly perceive it at that time, as she could not sufficiently wonder she perceived it no sooner: for when she called to mind all Cleanders actions, she accused her self Page 208 of stupidity, that she could not see the only reason why he denied the Prince Atis to counterfeite love unto Anaxilea, was because he loved her. Afterwards when she called to mind, with what joy he undertook to prejudice Adrastus, and with what sorrow he heard her say, she would use Artesilas kindly, she was so fully perswaded of the truth, that Cleander could not wish she should know it better. Afterwards when she remembered, how urgently she pressed him to tell her whether he was in love, and with whom, she accused her self of simplicity that she did not understand the secret cause of his passion: yet the great inequality betwixt her self, and him, made her sometimes to doubt of it: For (said she to her self, as she told my Cousin Cylenisa, who after wards told me) if I believe him in love with me, then I must be offended at him; then must I deprive my self of his conversation and sight, which I confess does infinitely please me: Therefore I will not believe it, said she, but in an instant after a thousand passages coming into her fancy, she could not chuse but believe it, and she resolved to receive those respects which the duty of Cleander obliged him to perform in such a manner, that he should never forget it: yet considering after all this, that Cleander had spoken nothing which might justly incense her, she thought that in respect of her honour, it were better, not to let him know she suspected any thing of his passion; so that she resolved to carry her self towards him as formerly she used.

Thus did the business depend for some certain days, during which time she was affable enough unto Artesilas, according to her resolution. But that she might no longer doubt of Cleanders love, Cylenisa came to her in her Closet, where she was retired the better to hide that melancholy which hung upon her soul; and since she saw as much blithness in the eyes of this woman, as she her self had disposition unto melancholy; What is it Cylenisa, said she unto her, which makes you so pleasant? Madam, said she unto her, such an odd accident has happened unto me this day, that if I did not fear it would anger you, I would relate it: Is it possible, said the Princess unto her, that this odd accident which would anger me, can divert you? You shall judg Madam, said she unto her, when you know it. The Princess, who used sometimes to suffer Cylenisa to relate what news she heard, was pleased to hearken unto her, rather out of custom and indulgence, then any curiosity: Speak then, said she unto her, for I see you have so great a desire unto it, that it were pity to hinder you. Since you are pleased to give me leave Madam, replied she, be pleased to know, that one of my companions being sick, and kept her Chamber, I went one afternoon unto her, where I found divers with her, and amongst the rest Esopo: as soon as I came in, you became the subject of our discourse, for you are not ignorant, Madam, that the love of Adrastus, and Artesilas, makes a great noise in the Court: and since these two Princes have both of them many partakers, a hundred thousand arguments and contests do arise thereupon, especially since they perceive you treat Artesilas with more affability than before you used: so that this discourse went on, some said the protection of the Prince Atis would have a crossing influence upon Artesilas, others were of a contrary opinion, and said, your own choice would be the destiny of those two Lovers: some added that the quality of a stranger would be an obstacle to Adrastus; others, that the being a Subject unto Cressus would choke the designe of Artesilas: Indeed every one had his vie, and vented his opinion, divining the success of these two Princes, and their designs. During all this long dispute, Esope leaned upon the table close by me, and said nothing, but had an ear unto what every one spoke, and a certain kind of subtle smile in his face, which moved a belief that he spoke not so much as he thought; so that I turning towards him, How comes it to pass, said I unto him smiling, that Esope who can make the most salvage Beasts speak so well, will not himself speak upon this occasion? He, I say, who is the most sociable and pleasant companion of all men living? This flattery Cylenisa, said he unto me in a low voice, deserves that I tell you after my manner a truth concerning the Subject now in discourse: for if I be not very much mistaken, all your opinions are besides the mark. In saying so, he took a piece of paper, and after a little study where he leaned upon the table, he writ something, and gave it unto me, which I have brought you to read. The Princess then taking the paper which Cylenisa presented unto her, read these words:

The Fable of ESOP.

Two Hunters were told, there was a white Hind in a Wood: they both went out to catch her with all their Nets, Dogs, Swords, and Darts, but making over great a noise they frightened her away, and forced her to flee: and in her flight she stumbled upon a young Shepherd who was asleep, whom she wounded before she was aware: The Shepherd awaked, Page 209 and pursued her with his staff, but much better than the rest, for he followed her by paths more close and covert: we shall one day know whether he has taken her. But for my part Cyllenisa I wish he may, and hope he will.

As soon as the Princess had read the Letter, she blushed, and looked upon Cylenisa, Well Cyllenisa, said she unto her, what do you understand by this fable? and what did he mean by it who composed it? Madam, replied she, I had no sooner read it, but all the Company was desirous to know what it was, with such earnestness as every one used to have for any thing that came from Esope: but he told them it was for me alone he writ it; so that seeing it was absolutely resolved not to shew it, they were at quiet: and I began to read what now I shew you: After I had read it, I confess, said I unto him, that the beginning of this fable is very pleasant, and easie to be understood; for I conceive the white Hind does represent the Princess, and the two Hunters, Adrastus and Artesilas; that the Nets, and Dogs, and the Swords, and Darts, and also the great noise, does signifie the actions of those two Princes, who with all their ingenuity, policy, force, and magnificence, endeavour to obtain their desires, yet doubtless they are very stupid: I understand also, by the Hind which flies away, you mean the Princess will not be taken by those two Hunters who court her: But as for this young Shepherd who was asleep, whom the Hind wounded before she was aware, and who followed her with the rest, but, as you say, much better than they, I do confess, I know not whom you mean: But you do know him very well, said he, and smiled; upon this the Prince Myrsiles came in, Esope no sooner saw him, but he would needs take the paper from me: but I was so resolved to shew it unto you, that I would by no mean part with it. The Prince Myrsiles, who observed the action of Esope, and who imagined it to be some fresh production of his wit, came towards me, and making me to understand by his ordinary signes, he seemed very desirous to see it; and notwithstanding all the dissuasions of Esope, I gave it unto this Prince, who smilingly did read it to the end, and testified by the action of his head, that he thought it very pleasant, Well Sir, said I unto him, it seems you do understand all this fable, whereas I understand only the beginning of it, I beseech you help out my dulness to interpret it. I had no sooner said so, but the Prince Myrsiles, who you know used always to carry an Inkhorn about him, the better to express himself unto those who were not accustomed unto the language of his eyes and hands, did take the paper; and just in the place where he found these words, But in flying she stumbled upon a grand Shepherd: he writ under these words, named Cleander: and as soon as he had shewed it unto me, he blotted it out again, as you may yet observe, if you will be pleased to look upon it. I do confess Madam, that I was amazed, to see that Esope who was a meer stranger, and a Prince who could not speak, should tell me Court news. For indeed Madam, said Cylenisa and smiled, if I be not much mistaken, this fable does comprehend that truth. I see you are easie to be perswaded, said the Princess unto her, since a man whose profession is to tell lies; and another who cannot be very well instructed with news, can in so short a time perswade you of a thing which is never like to be: the Princess Palmis spoke this so faintly, that Cylenisa knew some angry thoughts did trouble her; and since the Princess did always love her: Madam, said she, I am afraid I have committed a fault in troubling you with trifles and follies, at a time when perhaps you had more serious matters of importance in your mind: but the honours which you have often done me, in trusting me with your most secret thoughts, made me believe you were not very serious, since I knew it not: The Princess who was so full of disquiet thoughts, that her heart could not contain them, resolved to make Cylenisa, her Cabinet confident: so that she acquainted her with all her thoughts concerning Cleander's passion. However, said she, since I do esteem him very much, and since I believe in respect of my honour, he would not have me know his folly, I am resolved to live with him as I used to do, and as I have already begun: But yet for all this which I have told you Cylenisa, there is something more to be considered; for since strangers and dumb men can perceive it, many others will shortly do the like, therefore it is good to begin in time to carry my self so, as there shall be no suspicion that I contribute any thing unto the extravagancies of Cleander, if it come to be known. Madam (said Cylenisa, after a little time of consideration) I do less wonder then I did before, that the Prince Myrsiles and Esope should sooner discover things then other men; for besides that both of them are more ingenious then others are, they have also more leisure to observe the actions of others; one as a stranger who has nothing else to do in the place where he is, and the other nothing else but to hearken and observe. However Cyllenisa, said the Princess, they do know it, and they can make others know it also; besides how can I know but that Esope composed this fable by the appointment of Cleander, who I know Page 210 has sent him many Presents. This cannot be, replied Cylenisa, for he could not guess when he came into the Company, what things would be discoursed upon, which would give him such a subject to work upon as this. Moreover, Madam, you see this fable is not historical, since he speaks towards the end of it, as if he knew perfectly that Cleander should one day win your heart from Adrastus and Artesilas. That's it which affrights me, Cylenisa, and offends me both, replied she, for truly I find Esope very bold in daring to think this of a man whose quality he knows not; And I also find him very incomprehensible, said she, and blushed, to see he should penetrate so into the bottom of my heart, as to know that if Cleander's condition were the same that Adrastus and Artesilas is, he should perhaps make his fable as true at the end of it, as the beginning is: but since it is not, I must deceive Esope; make the Prince Myrsiles change his opinion, and cure Cleander, if it be possible. The last of these will be the most difficult, replied Cylenisa. I do not think it, said the Princess, since Cleander has a reasonable soul: He should not be in love if he had so, replied Cylenisa. But from whence comes it, said the Princess to her, that you are so much perswaded of the greatness of Cleanders passion: you, I say, who within this day did not so much as suspect it. The reason is, Madam, answered she, because I could never apply my observations until now: but now, when I call to mind a hundred things which he hath spoke unto me, and as many other things which I have seen him do, I think that I was then blind in not seeing the cause: I remember one night, when my companions and I moved Esope to relate unto us his love of that Beauty which was called Rhodopa, who was with the Philosopher Zanthus, at the time when he dwelt there also, Cleander who was present at that Relation after it was ended, and every one commended him: For my part, said she unto him, I think you so happy to have worn the letters of the fair Rhodopa, that I could envy you: for certainly it is a great misery unto those in love, when they must lift up their eyes too high, when they look upon her they adore; and doubtless it is an infinite happiness to meet the party loved upon equal terms, and where his services may be valued when they are rendered unto the party adored: I do confess, that then I hearkened unto this discourse, and took no notice of it: but now I know the hidden mystery of it, and can apply it: I remember again, one day when the Princess Clasomina came to Sardis, one day I say when you were so admirably dressed, and when all the eyes in the Court were dazzled at your luster, Cleander was very pleasant with my companions and my self, who were speaking of your beauty, and we told him that it was a great happiness for all men of his rank, and for all beauties whose aims were to conquer hearts, that your quality was so much above them, as you would not hinder them in captivating Lovers, and causing them to break their chains to assume yours: And why Cylenisa, said he unto me, do you think there is none but Kings and Princes have eyes to admire what is fair, and that have hearts to love them? I say not so, replied I unto him, but I say, that since the daughters of Kings, must not look upon other hearts then those of Kings; none will presume to offer theirs that are not so. Beauty, said he, makes subjects of all conditions; and as the fair Anaxilea has made the Son of her Sovereign a Slave: so Queens may make their Subjects their Adorers: I do confess, that I heard Cleander then speak, as one that only helped on with discourse, but now I call to mind the Air in which he expressed himself, and now I see his passion, not only in his eyes, but in his heart. I am very angry, said the Princess; and she spoke this after such a manner, as let Cylenisa know, that if there were none but she who could perceive it, and that Cleander would not suspect she had any knowledge of it, perhaps she would not have been incensed against him: But since the Prince Myrsiles, Esope, and Cyllenisa knew it, she could not endure it, but resolved to treat Cleander very severely, though she esteemed him very much, and though doubtless she did already love him more then she thought she did. In the mean while, Cleander, who yet knew not what the Princess Palmis had determined against him, though it grieved him to see Artesilas more kindly treated then ordinary, yet he had some minutes of consolation, to see that after he was so bold as to tell her what he did, yet she did not treat him worse then usual: for though she feigned not to understand the ambiguity of his words, yet she was not deceived; and he thought many times he discovered in the eyes of the Princess, that she did perfectly understand him: but he enjoyed this consolation not long, because since she knew the thoughts of the Prince Myrsiles and Esope, she changed her way of behaviour towards him, and lived with him, in much more coldness and reserved then before; but yet she could never bring her self to that rigid severity which she resolved upon; however as mild as she was, Cleander did so resent it, that he thought he should have dyed with sorrow: Mean while, Adrastus having still the Prince of Lidia's protection, and also gained the consent of Cressus; the marriage between the Princess and him, was talked on, as a thing almost absolutely done; it was not openly reported, but every one Page 211 whispered it in the ear. Indeed it might be said, that it was one of those publick secrets which are often in Court, whereof every one makes a mystery, yet none are ignorant of it: so that Cleander and Artesilas were not a little puzzled as well as the Princess, who could not by any means resolve upon this marriage. During which time Cylenisa did often ask Esope in a rallery, whether he thought still the Shepherd would take the Hind: I know not well yet whether he will catch her or no, answered he, but I know very well the Hunters never will. Things standing upon these terms, and Cressus loving the Prince Atis so very well, that he did not so much oppose his marriage with Anaxilea, many prodigious signes did appear, which signified that this young Prince should die by a Dart. Cressus also had a dream, which passed for an Apparition amongst those who professed knowledge in such things, which shewed him the boldy of his son dead, and run through with the point of a Javelin, with so many other such sad and frightening objects, that this great and wise Prince was astonished at them: so that all the Court looked sad upon the matter, yet the soul of the Prince was not at all dismayed, neither did it interrupt his Gallantry: every one was busie in divining which way this disaster should happen; for peace flourished throughout all the Kingdom, and the Prince was hated by none. Those who knew the ambitious humour of Antaleon, Brother of Cressus, did apprehend some close conspiracy, and for many days nothing else was spoken of but these disastrous predictions: Cressus caused all the Arms, Darts, Spears, Javelins, to be taken out of his Palace; and he was as vigilant as many men are, who by their own prudence think to prevent the predestinate will of the Gods, he forgot nothing which he thought fit to preserve the Prince his son, whom he looked upon as his only Successour, making no account of the Prince Myrsiles, because of his imperfection: a long time passed on, and no misfortune befell the Prince Atis, so that all cogitations of danger were hush'd, except the mind of Cressus, who was so extremely possessed with apprehensions of fear, that he began to think of marrying his son immediately. But the grand difficulty was to chuse a wife, for none but Anaxilea would please him, and Cressus would have chose another. Yet notwithstanding the Prince Adrastus began to stagger a little in his mind: my father did him very great service at the request of Cleander, who thought it would be advantageous unto him, to give an example of unequal alliance; to lessen the value that was set upon Adrastus, and to satisfie the Prince Atis.

In conclusion, Sir, this marriage was solemnized with much magnificence, but not with much joy unto any, except the two Lovers, and Adrastus: Cressus did but give half a consent; The Princess Palmis was much unsatisfied to see the daughter of an inferior to sit above her: Antaleon and Mexaris who should not have been very glad that this Prince had married a Queen, could not be glad to see him marry his Subject: Artesilas and Cleander, who conceived this marriage would authorize Adrastus were angry at it, for Cleander did but serve him out of cunning, and because he could not help it: The Prince Myrsiles was ever melancholy for his own misfortune, so that a far more illustrious alliance then this could not rejoice him. Abradates only and the Princess of Clasomenes were absolutely unconcerned, and took no part, only as Lovers of the Princess Palmis. But Cleander was he who had greatest cause of sorrow, for it was talked aloud, that the marriage of Adrastus would presently be solemnized. About four or five days after the marriage of Anaxilea, the Missians sent to advertise Cressus, that they had in their Country about the Mountain Olympus, a Boar of an extraordinary and prodigious greatness, which wasted all their corn, and made their fields even desolate, beseeching the King to send some courageous men, with all fit accoutrements for the Chase, to deliver them from this terrible Animal, which might pass rather for a fearful Monster, then a Boar: Cressus consented to their desires, but as he was speaking unto his officers about it, the Prince Atis who heard of the business, came in: Adrastus, Artesilas, Abradates, Cleander, and many others followed him; Atis told the King his father, that he intended to be at the Chase: Cressus, who still was possessed with his old fears did oppose against his designe with much obstinacy; but since the Prince could not endure to pass in the opinion of his people, for one that never would hazard himself in any dangers, was resolute, and would needs go. Yet he had hardly prevailed with Cressus, had he not bethought of one way which convinced him. You say Sir, said he, my death is threatened with an arrow, but I go not unto a place where any will be thrown at me: Had the prediction been, I should have been pulled in peace by a wild Beast, then you had reason to prevent my going unto the Chase: but since it is not, what cause of fears have you? The Prince Adrastus, said he, and smiled, will not kill me, no more Artesilas, Abradates, or Cleander; so that since there is none to fight against but a wild beast which throws no Darts, nor has any Arms, but what nature gave him; Me thinks, Sir, you should not command me that thing, which would be obeyed, but against my will. What will your Subject Page 212 say, Sir, when they see, I dare not go unto a poor hunting? Can they ever think I dare fight and win battels, when I dare not so much as fight with a poor Animal? At the last, Madam, Cressus did consent; and every one prepared for this Chase: But when the Prince was ready to depart, the King took Adrastus aside, and told him, that since the Prince his Son was his Protector, so he desired him to be his upon this occasion. Sir (said Adrastus to him, extremely rejoicing at this confidence which Cressus put in him) if I do not safely bring back the Prince, and victorious, deny me all the favours that ever I shall ask, or can hope for from you. After this Madam, they went unto this hunting, in the most magnificent manner that ever was seen in Lidia: Cleander went to take his leave of the Princess Palmis, but there was so much company present, that the adieu was not private, nor any thing passed which was observable: The Prince Myrsiles, and Meaxis also, went unto this Hunting: and as Esope saw them depart, Cyleneisa asked him again, whether the Shepheard was amongst the Hunters? Yes, said he unto her, but they go not to hunt the Hind, though it were much better for them they did: When this gallant Troop of Princes and Grandees, which disserted the Court, came to the Mountain Olympus, they began to be in Quest of this Boar, and when they had discovered his Den, they compassed him about on all sides, and every one strove to get the first blow at this terrible Beast, which by his monstrous greatness did affright all Beholders: they came near him, and threw all their Darts: That which the Prince did throw did miss the Beast, so likewise did the Darts of Adrastus, Meaxis, Abradates, and others, but Cleanders Dart did hit him, and mortally wounded him; whilst he was drawing his Sword against this wild beast, Adrastus being envious of Cleanders honour, and missing his aim at that time did throw a second Dart, which as all Asia knows, pierced through the heart of the Prince Atis, who had changed his place, since Adrastus looked upon him: The fall of this Prince caused all those who saw him to cry out: so that Cleander (who was busied with the Boar, and by giving him a great blow in the body, which made him fall, turned his head, thinking the cry had been for joy of his victory, but discerning better the doleful tone of those sorrowful voices, he left his fierce enemy rowling in his own blood, to go where the rest of the company were: But he was extremely dismayed to see the Prince Atis dead, and Adrastus so furious and desperate, that never sorrow was seen comparable unto his; Cleander hearing it was Arastus; which killed him, and being transported with grief, went towards him with his Sword drawn, but seeing that all the rest of the Princes who were more interested in the loss then he was, did pity him, he did pity him also, and indeed to speak the truth, Adrastus was in a condition fitter to move compassion then choller; for I never in my life saw one in a more sad and lamentable condition: he had such a furious sorrow in his countenance, and so many signes of despair in all his words; that his pitifull estate is neither expressible, nor imaginable: The truth is, Madam, he offered several times to kill himself, and they were compelled to take away his Sword, and watch him. They sent to advertise Cressus of the accident, and we all followed the Coach which carried the Prince of Lidia's Corps: never return from hunting was more sad then this: nor never accident more mournful and amazing. Cressus was so grieved, no man could be more; he called upon Jupiter the Expiator for help; He invoked the Gods of friendship and hospitality, whom Adrastus had violated: he complained that ever he should receive into his Court the Murderer of his Son, thinking he had entertained a grateful Guest: he invoked the God of friendship, because he met with his most mortal enemy in him, to whom he trusted his Son, and to whom he would have married his daughter: The Princess Anaxilea, and the Princess Palmis, were exceeding grieved: in the mean time we brought the Corps of the Lidian Prince to Sardis: Then did Cressus see it come into the Court of his Palace, the man who killed him following, for he would never be out of sight of it: At this sight Cressus resented more sorrow then can be told or thought: The conditions of Cleander and Adrastus were quite different, Cleander had killed the Boar which was the cause of the hunting, and would have destroyed the Province: Adrastus killed the Successor of a great King, the Son of his protector, and his protector himself: and which was most dismal of all, the Brother of that Princess whom he loved, and hoped ere long to have married: he had so much sorrow, so much rage, and so many several confusions in his eyes, as I never saw the like; They would gladly have kept him from the sight of Cressus, but he escaped from them that would have restrained him, and ran to present himself unto that prince, but in such moving language, that he melted the hearts of his very Rivals: he asked what punishment he would appoint him? he desired him to pronounce that which was most rigorous, and conjured him to make haste, and he spoke indeed as if he did really desire death; he called upon the name of the Princess amidst his complaints against himself, and without any designe at all Page 213 to live, he said as much as possible could be to move Cressus for a pardon of his crime, which indeed was not a crime, but a most sad misfortune, and worthy of pity: Cressus himself was moved unto compassion, and like a great and generous Prince did pardon him, desiring him only to leave him at liberty to lament his misfortune.

Adrastus then did leave him, and was conducted unto his lodging, where they guarded him: but the next morning, he understanding that they would carry the Corps of the Prince Atis unto a stately Tomb, which Alliaeate had caused to be built upon the banks of a Lake, called the Lake of Giges, he stole from his guards the night following, and run like a mad-man to this magnificent Tomb, where he was no sooner come, then he got up unto the top of a pinnacle which was amongst the Statues, and fell from thence with open arms upon the point of his sword which he had taken with him, in the sight of those which followed him, who there overtook him just at break of day. Thus punishing himself, he deserved the laments of all them who had greatest cause to accuse him for their misfortunes: Cressus considering his Royal birth, his repentance testified by his blood, and his extraordinary misfortune, caused his Corps to be layd in the stately Tomb with Prince Atis, with an inscription suitable to so strange an adventure. After this fatal accident, Cleander began to grow in favor with Cressus, who looked upon him as the only man who was fit to establish the Scepter after his death, in the hands of the Prince Myrsiles. Antaleon opposed these thoughts; for this ambitious Prince, in prejudice of his Nephew, pretended to the Crown. However, since there are no sorrows so sad but time does cure them, or at the least mitigate them, every one began to cheer up himself for the death of Atis; and Cleander having now no more Rivals, was something less unhappy then before. Moreover, the Princess Palmis, having no thoughts of revenge for her brother the Prince Atis, or scorn for Adrastus, began to treat Artesilas as at first, that is to say, with much more rigor: but since she had used much coldness towards Cleander, she knew not what to think, or could she contrive it handsomely how to bring her self unto the same terms with him: she saw him so infinitely respective unto her, that she could not in justice accuse him; nor had any desires of using him rigorously. In the mean while, the several Interests of Cressus did beget him several causes of War against the Ephesians, and he raised a puissant Army, whereof Cleander was Lieutenant General: For since Abradates could not engage himself, not knowing when the King his father would call him back, and since the prince Myrsiles, by reason of his imperfection, was not fit for that employment, the illustrious Cleander had the honour; the King for divers secret reasons of State, having no mind to employ either Antaleon, or Mexaris, or Artesilas, who did extremely murmur at it. But how great soever this honour was, Cleander did but imperfectly enjoy it, when he considered that the Princess did not yet certainly know that he was in love with her; or if she did suspect some such thing, she neither would nor could approve of it; he knew not well whether he should dare to take so much boldness upon him, as to discover his mind a little more plainly unto her; and he was very much unresolved upon it, when Esope, who loved him extremely well, came to see him, and to shew him in private before he departed all the story of the Court, which he had composed in Fables with Morals upon them; for though this work was his Master-piece, yet he had shewed it unto very few, because since it contained all the Privacies and Gallantries of the Court, he did not think it fit to expose it unto publique view: Esope then being come to shew Cleander this pleasant work, as esteeming his approbation above all the Court besides; after he had read over many ingenious Fables, relating unto several passages, Cleander found that which Esope had made for him: and given in a paper to Cyleneisa, and since he understood it not, he asked the meaning of it; Sir, said Esope unto him, I do not think it so difficult; for some who come short of your wit, and who have not so much knowledge of the things it represents, have perfectly found out the mystery of it. Cleander became much more inquisitive then before, and did so urge him to the interpretation of it, that at the last he moved him to tell the true meaning of it, and all the passages: yet he no sooner knew it, but having no power to dissemble his thoughts, Oh Esope, said Cleander, what have you done? I have done that, replied he, which perhaps you never durst do. I do confess it (replied Cleander, who after he had recollected himself, would have disguised his thoughts) for I do not know so well as you, how to disseminate a truth, and I have no mind to tell a lye: However Esope, said he, if Cyleneisa did believe you, and acquainted the Princess with your Error, into what a condition have you brought me? But Sir, replied Esope, if perhaps it be so, that you really are in love with the Princess Palmis, and did never acquaint her with it, nor ever would, what condition were you then in? was it not a happy turn for you, that Esope was so bold as to discover that which you your self never durst? No, replied Cleander, for such a man as I, who knows not what himself is and who Page 214 has nothing but what is in the hands of Fortune, may very well suppose, that the Princess Palmis will think <◇> cannot love her without a most manifest wrong unto her. Believe it Sir, <◇> Esope unto him, that <◇> never wrongs a fair Lady in loving her, of what quality soever she be, and of what quality soever he be that adores her, provided he go no further then love her. But, answered Cleander, Esope by his own confession did love one that was only a Slave. But, replied he, Cleander in loving a Princess, loves a fair Princess, and whosoever is fair, Sir, is certainly one whose greatest delight is to be thought and respected so: Yes Sir, I will maintain, that a fair Queen does always prefer a slave of her beauty, before all her subjects which birth only gave her; and a Conquest gotten by her eyes, will be a thousand thousand times more dear unto her then all the victories she can get with a hundred thousand men: therefore Sir, though I have made Cyleneisa believe you were in love with the Princess of Lidia, and though she hath perswaded her of as much, yet I warrant you, you will never be worse in her esteem. Yet I perceived, said Cleander, that about the same time you say you composed this Fable, the Princess did treat me with more coldness then ever she did before. That is a sign, answered Esope, you are more in her heart, then ever you thought of: for if she did not fear you, and if she did not indeed fear her self, she would never fly from a man whom she esteems very much. I pray think Sir, said he and smiled, that since I have taken so much pains to find out the natures of Foxes, Tygers, Bears, and Lions, I am not altogether ignorant in the physiognomies of fair women, which are a million of millions of times more delightful objects then any wilde Animals; and therefore be assured from me, that she hates you not, and that my Fable will one day prove as true in the end as in the beginning of it. Though Cleander knew very well that Esope was both wise and subtle, yet he never had power to confess unto him that he loved the Princess: he only desired him not to shew this Fable unto any, not to speak any more of his errors, lest he should perswade others to believe them. As they were thus in discourse, I came in; and as soon as Esope was gone, Cleander acquainted me with all their Conference; and told me, that certainly he was the cause of the Princess being so reserved and cold towards him: he was extremely desirous to know the truth: for though her coldness to him was an intolerable torment, yet if he were once certain she knew his passion, it would be some ease unto him; for yet he observed she used neither any incivility nor any scorn of him: So after he had well consulted with himself; he resolved to go and take his leave of the Princess, at such a time as when few were with her, and to be cleared of his doubts: he was so circumspect to enquire the fittest opportunity, that indeed he found her alone: After the first Complements, which related only to his Voyage; and after the Princess had recommended the person of the King, and the person of Myrsiles unto his care; Madam, said he unto her, doubtless you will think me most presumptuously bold, in beseeching you to honour me so far as to tell me, whether ever I committed any fault against those due respects which I owe you, and which moved you to lessen your obliging goodness, wherewith heretofore you were pleased to honour me withall. It plainly appears, replied she, that I put abundance of confidence in you, since I have recommended unto your care two persons whom I esteem most dear of all the world. Without all doubt, Madam, I am infinitely obliged unto you for it, replied he; but Madam, since I am perswaded, that he who loseth an inestimable Jewel, and never misseth or complaineth of his loss, seems that he did very little esteem it; and I think you cannot in reason be offended, if I lament the change which I observed in my happiness: yet in all my complaints and lamentations, I do not accuse you of any injustice, but do most humbly beseech you to tell me, what crime I have committed, which might merit that misfortune? Cleander has so much wit (replied she, and both smiled and blusht) that if he have committed a crime, doubtless it was with his own consent, and by consequence not easie for him to repent of it, or necessary to accuse himself: But, said she, with a more serious countenance, I do not know that ever you did me any ill offices; and if you did observe any alteration in my humor, it was only since the death of my brother, when I could not have the same dispositions to any joys, as before I might have. Madam answered Cleander, my misfortune did precede that of that unhappy Prince: Then perhaps, replied she, I had one fault more then I knew of; and this may be added unto the number of my others, that I am of an ill humor. The Gods preserve me said he, from accusing the most accomplished Princess upon Earth, of the least imperfection; No, no, Mdam, you do not, or will not understand me: for I do not accuse you of any thing; but if you find me culpable, I conjure you to accuse me, that I may repent and correct my self, and that I may ask you pardon for it. Truly Cleander, replied she, I do not think there was ever any so earnest and desirous to be thought criminal, as you: but for your satisfaction and mine both, take notice of one thing I pray you, which is, that if I do not tell a thing the first time that any one asks me, they ask me ever after in vain, for I will Page 215 never tell it. Then Madam, answered he, shall I never know my fault? Search in your own heart for your satisfaction, said she, and not in my words: If you be innocent, rest quiet, for I never do any injustice; if you be not, repent and correct your self, but howsoever let us talk no more of it; and be assured, that whether you be innocent or culpable, I heartily wish you may bring back the King my father victorious over his Enemies, and that your honour may every day grow greater. Since there never shall be any thing more dear unto me then to obey you, replied he, command me something, I beseech you, wherein I may do you service. It is enough, answered she, that I desire you to have a care of the King my father, and the Prince my brother: if it be not, I conjure you further to have a care of your own person, and not to expose it unto too many dangers, since it is so dear unto them. The Princess upon these words rise up, and Cleander was forced to leave her, not having any power to speak more plainly of his Love unto her: yet had he so much consolation from this visit, to know she understood his passion, and to find her much more affable then ordinary. He departed then with as violent desires to merit the esteem of this Princess by his high actions, and to render his life as glorious, as his birth was obscure, that it is no wonder he performed such gallant things in the Ephesian War. I shall not make a Relation unto you, Madam, of all the passages there: for all Asia knows, that many Battels were fought, wherein Cleander had all the glory: That afterwards he went to besiege Ephesus; and though the Inhabitants thought themselves most safe by a superstitious Ceremony of drawing a Line from the old Town to the Temple of Diana, as putting themselves under her protection, yet they were compelled to render themselves, maugre the stout resistance of a courageous stranger who was in the Town. But certainly, to relate things as really they were, the taking of Elphesus was so particularly the act of Cleander, that Cressus had no share in the honour of that Conquest; for he being fallen sick, it was Cleander who did all at this siege, which was one of the most memorable acts that has been heard of: Artesilas neither had the good fortune to be there, because he was much wounded at the first Battel which was given unto the Enemies: Cleander only had the glory of it all, whereof Cressus himself sent to advertise his daughter in a very advantageous manner for him: But as the time of keeping the field was almost at an end, and as he was in hopes to return unto Sardis, to reap the sweet fruits of his victories in the favorable looks of the Princess, the Misseans, the Dorians, and the Pamphilians did all confederate together against Cressus, who resolved to prevent them: He sent then to the King of Phrigia for aid; but since he was engaged at that time with the King of Pontus he denied him, so that he was forced to go upon his own legs. But Madam, the valor of Cleander was become so terrible unto all these people, that he ended this War as happily as the other, though it was in the Winter time. Since Cressus saw that Fortune smiled upon him, he would not stay there: but whilst the King of Phrigia was busie with the King of Pontus, he entered at the beginning of the Spring into the Dominions of that Prince, presently after those two Kings had lost two Battels in one day. So that the King of Phrigia with his broken Troops was constrained to return for defence of his own Kingdom, and leave that of his Allies. As this Prince was very gallant, Cressus found greater resistance from him then he did before, and the valor of Cleander did find a glorious subject to work upon. Since Phrigia is not very full of Towns, almost all this War was performed in Schirmishes and Battels; but they were so frequent and so glorious for Cleander, that Cressus could not chuse but admire how extremely he was obliged unto Mineceus and my father, for giving him a man of so heroicque a courage: The King of Phrigia did fight in person with Cleander, who thought once to have killed him, but as he lifted up his arm a thought came into his mind, which made him change his blow, and turned it upon another next the King of Phrigia, whom he killed at that blow, saying in himself, Perhaps I am born a Subject unto that King. In short Madam, after the King of Phrigia was forced to retreat into Apamea, and the season of the year growing very bad, Cleander, after he had put his Troops into their Winter quarters, returned unto Sardis, after a compleat year since he had been there: 'Tis true, Renown did speak so high in his behalf to the Princess Palmis, that she could not forget him; yet she would not admit of his passion, and I know not whether or no she had some kind of fears that absence had changed his heart. Cressus was received with high magnificence, and Cleander was looked upon as the Conqueror of many Nations, and in that posture wherein he came to Sardis, there was none could come in competition with him, but every one esteemed himself happy in his favorable looks. But Madam, in the midst of all these Triumphs, Love did triumph over the heart of Cleander: And he was more terrified that day he was to see the Princess, then he was in all the days of Battel: for he went to fight in hopes to overcome, but he exposed himself unto the looks of his Princess in certainty to be overcome, and in uncertainty of being kindly treated. The first address unto her was in the presence of the King, who in favor of Cleander Page 216 told the Princess his daughter, that she should regard him as the only Conqueror, and as the greatest stay of his Empire: Cleander answered unto this with much modesty, and the Princess did second the King her father with many obliging civilities. But the next morning Cleander were himself alone to wait upon her, and she entertained him, neither with her former freedom, nor her latter coldness: As she was grown more fair, so he more amorous; and as victories does elevate Souls, and infuse a kind of handsom boldness, which is very much becoming if it be mixed with modesty, so Cleander was grown incomparable more amiable then ever he was; and on the contrary, Artesilas, much less, for his envy at Cleanders glory, did make him of so bad an humor, that every one shunned him: so that he coming unto the Princess as Cleander was with her, she did so palpably perceive the difference between them, that she could not chuse at night, in speaking unto Cyleneisa, but wish, that Cleander had the birth of Artesilas, or that Artesilas had all the good qualities of Cleander. However, though she saw he was infinitely honored by all, and Cressus esteemed him exceedingly, the Prince Myrsiles loved him most tenderly, and thought he was adored by all the world, yet for all this he esteemed himself very unhappy: for when he began to consider, that he knew not who himself was, and that in all likelihood this uncertainty of his birth would be an invincible obstacle unto an happy success in his passion, he grew past all consolation, and all additaments of honour did rather increase then diminish his sorrows. But Madam, these great favors upon Cleander eclipsing Antaleon, that ambitious Prince, who thirsted after the Crown did secretly treat with Artesilas, unto whom he promised the Princess Palmis his Niece in marriage, if he would help him to kill Cressus: and the Prince Myrsiles. This Conspiracy was so horrid, that I will not trouble you with a particular relation of it: for when I consider that a brother would murder a brother and a Nephew, and that a Lover should embrew his hands in the blood of a Father unto his Mistress, I apprehend such horrors, that I must needs pass them over very slightly, and tell you, that Esope, who was yet at Sardis, having smelt out this Conspiracy, did acquaint Cleander with it, who went so prudently to work, that he did not only discover the whole Plot, but also quasht it: Antaleon was forc'd to fly for refuge to the Phrigian King, but he never reached so far, for in his going thither he fell down a Precipice, and so hurt himself, that within a few days after death became his sanctuary: for it seems the Gods would defer no longer the punishment of so black a Crime. As for Artesilas, nothing could be proved directly against him; and though afterwards it came to light that he was of the Conspiracy, yet he staid in the Court as if he had been innocent: 'Tis true, he durst not any longer shew himself openly as a Lover of the Princess, for if she would have harkened unto any professions of love, Cleander would have been near his happiness: For Cressus thought himself so infinitely obliged unto him for this last piece of service, that he esteemed all his Treasures too mean a recompence for it: The Prince Myrsiles for his part, being a debtor unto him for his life, thought him worthy of all things; so that though he knew Cleander was in love with the Princess his sister, yet he would never take any notice of it. In the mean while Cleander, not being able to live and not have liberty to publish his love to her who caused it, did lead a most melancholy life; and the Princess also, not being able to forbear an expression of too high an esteem of Cleander, was extremely troubled: For said she one day to Cyleneisa, |Though this esteeme do me no other hurt, but to hinder me from loving him whom my Father would have me marry, is not that too much? and ought I not to wish that I had never seen him? As I think, said Cyleneisa, that would be an unjust wish, and Cleander perhaps has more reason then you, to wish he had never seen your beauty. You know Madam, that the King is his Debtor for many victories, and you your self do owe him for the lives of two Princes who are most dear unto you; but as for him, I do not see, that he is obliged unto you at all, for truly you use him very coldly, because you are obliged to him, and you wish you had never seen him, because he is very handsome and amiable; there is not much reason or justice in these wishes. I beleeve, said the Princess, and smiled, that Esope has suborned you to help to make his Fable true; As Cyleneisa was about to answer, the Captain of the Guard unto Cressus, who always loved Antaleon very well, though none perceived it, and who by that consequence had not over-much love for Cleander, came to the Princess to tell her a piece of news which he thought deserved a recompence, though perhaps it would not be pleasing. Madam, said he unto her, I beg your pardon for coming to tell you a thing which doubtless will much trouble you, but since by knowing it in time you may perhaps find a remedy, I therefore no sooner knew it but I came to acquaint you. The Princess thinking it to be some new Conspiracy, thanked him for his zeal unto her service, and desired him to speak the business. Madam, replied he, the business is so strange, that I dare hardly tell you, for truly I was told by an Officer of the Kings house as a very great secret, that the King has a design to marry you unto Cleander, to the end he may assist the prince Myrsiles. Page 217 to support the Scpter after his death: he seemed to be fearful you would not consent unto it, because the original of Cleander was not known; this refusal of yours he said would anger him very much, but he would never force you unto it. Therefore Madam, conceiving you might prevent so great a misery by a courageous resistance, I came in all haste to tell you what I knew concerning this strange design, for knowing your great Soul as I do, I beleeved you would never consent unto such a thing as would be so dishonorable unto you, as this. The princess Palmis, being extremely surprized at this mans discourse, and not knowing what to think of it, thanked him for his zeal, and told him she would see he was recompenced: but she conjured him to observe two things; the one, not to speak unto any one whoseoever of this business which he told her; the other, not to accustom those who are under his charge, to dive into the secrets of Kings, or at least not to discover them; that in the mean time he might beleeve, she would carry her self in the business, as reason and vertue required. Here Madam, may be admired the capricious humor of Love, especially in the spirits of the wisest persons. The princess Palmis did infinitely esteem Cleander, and perhaps did love him with tenderness enough: Yet as soon as she understood that Cressus would have her marry him, the obscurity of his original did so much trouble her mind, that she knew not what resolution to take: She would not have Cleander leave loving her, and yet she would not have him tell her that he did love her; and she could by no means consent to marry one that was not known what he was: Yet his vertue is so transcendent and apparent (would this Princess say) but his birth is so obscure, that he himself knows not what it is: For all that Madam (would Cyleneisa say) you know he is worthy of all things; he is owner of as many virtues as the greatest Prince upon Earth can wish to have; his valor has set him above all the King your fathers Subjects; if all his Conquests were really his own, as all the glory of them is, he would be one of the most puissant Princes in all Asia: The first Kings Madam, said Cyleneisa, perhaps were not extracted from so good a house as Cleander; for truly, I have heard say, he was found in a most rich Mantle, made of the purest Cloth of Gold; the Picture of his Mother and himself was set in a most magnificent Border, which are strong arguments his original cannot be base. He may perhaps be born of parents rich enough, replied the Princess, yet that is not enough to satisfy me: I know Cylenisa, that birth and death is alike to all, both Kings and Subjects; and that the vanity to boast of Predecessors, has but a bad foundation; but yet for all that, this illustrious Chimera, which flatters up the hearts of all men, is so universally established throughout all the Earth, that it is not contemptible. But yet Madam, said Cyllenisa, it must be confessed that birth only is not very considerable: for if the son of the greatest King in the world were in love with you, and suppose he had all imaginable faults, and not one good quality, certainly you would never love him: all the Grandure of his illustrious Grand-fathers and all their virtues, would not invite you to esteem him. 'Tis very true, said the Princess, I should scorn him and hate him more than another who had not the same vices, yet upon some reason of state I could marry him; yet Cleander being so accomplished as he is, does doubtless merit my esteem, but yet being no Prince, nor knowing so much as whether he be of a noble Race, I could not chuse, according to the common Maxims of the world, but allow some place in my friendship, yet never should have any thoughts of marrying him. I know Madam, said Cylenisa, that all the world thinks as you say; but you Madam, who has a Soul above the vulgar reach, and who can see things as really they are in themselves, not as the multitude looks upon them, what do you think? may you not well imagine that Cleanders virtue and the Kings command will prevent all blame, when you obey him without resistance? Ha Cylenisa, said she unto her, what questions do you ask me? and how do you think I shall answer you? My heart and my reason are at such odds, that I need some time to consider which of these two I should satisfy; therefore for the present I cannot tell you which I shall chuse, or what I shall do: for truly Cylenisa I do not know my self. This was the Conference between them: for though Cylenisa did not make me her Confidant concerning the interests of her Mistress, yet being my Cousin we were very friendly one to another, and she bore a particular affection unto Cleander for my sake, because she knew that my Fortune and Timocreons did inseparably depend upon his, and therefore he rendered in common between us both his liberality, and his good offices. Cleander also though he knew it not, had a good Solicitor of her to the princess Palmis, and her advise was always in advantage of Cleander, in so much as her coldness towards him, which was his greatest torment, did insensibly lessen, so that flattering up himself, by this happy change, the cause whereof he was ignorant his hopes began to revive and comfort him; and presently after, growing more bold in the business, he rendered his Compliments unto the Princess with less circumspection, though ever with equal respect: he visited her very often, and talked to her with less fear: yet I do not think that he would ever have been so bold as openly to declare Page 218 himself unto her, if the illustrious Cyrus, who at that time was only Artamenes, had not given him an occasion, and thus it was. Cressus, knowing all the passages of the Ponteon and Bithynian War, and all the glorious Acts which the famous Artamenes did there, he had also a greater desire to enquire of what Nation a man of such extraordinary valor was. Those who had this Commission, told him, that it was not known; and further told him, how he caused the King of Pontus to be released; and how the Princess Mandana was carried away by a stranger called Philidaspes, who was unknown as well as Artamenes, and who also was very gallant; adding further, that it was said this Philidaspes was son unto the Queen of Assyria, and discovered by a Letter which he had written unto one of his Intelligence, which Letter was intercepted. Cressus told all this unto the Princess Palmis, as news which was something pleasant, speaking unto her with much admiration of all the great things done by the illustrious Artamenes. As soon as he was gone from the Princess, Cleander came in; and since her mind was full with what the King had told her, she began discourse with him, and asked him many particulars, which she had not asked the King: Conceiving that he was present when all this news was told unto the King; For my part, said she, I wish this Philidaspes, though he be said to be the son of a King, were punished for the violence he hath done; and I would have Artamenes, though it be not known what he is, recompensed for his virtue. Methinks, Madam, said Cleander, I ought to thank you for him, being unknown as he is, and I conceive this conformity ought to interest me in what concerns him. His condition (said the Princess) is not equal with yours, for as I understand by the relation made unto the King, he known where he was born, and you neither know where you were born, nor what you are. Cleander sighed at this discourse of the Princess, who fearing she had incensed him, made haste to speak again. No, no, Cleander, said she, grieve not so much at your misfortune; for though you do not know your quality, yet all the world knows you deserve the highest: And I wish to the Gods, for the honour of our house, that you were my Brother; and I am sure the Prince Myrsiles will not be offended at my wish. It would be most glorious and obliging for me, Madam, replied he; but for all that, Heavens forbid it should be so, for I had rather be as I am, then be Brother unto the adorable Palmis. Do you know what you say? replied she; and do you not fear to offend me? Yes, Madam, I do fear, and fear it much more than you have reason to do: But truly, since I am resolved to be ingenious, I must needs confess unto you, that I had incomparably rather be all my life a Slave unto the divine Palmis, then to be her Brother, or to be the greatest King upon Earth; Yes Madam, I think those fetters which enchain me so sweet and glorious, though heavy, that I would not change them for all the glistening Diamonds of the Universe. Cleander, said the Princess to him, it seems you know me no better then you do your self, for if you knew who I am, you would not use such language. Pardon me, Madam, I beseech you, replied he, I know you are the daughter of a great King; that you are the fairest Princess in the world, and the most virtuous; but I know also that I am the most miserable man upon Earth, because I am the most amorous. If I did not think you were besides your senses, said she unto him, I should treat you after another manner. No Madam, said he, do not deceive your self, the love which I have to you permits me the use of my reason, and my senses clearly, and I know most certainly that I ought to hope for nothing, nor do I ask any thing but a little compassion; for I dare not be so bold as to ask that which would be a remedy unto my misery, but that only I ask which would comfort, not cure me. The King my Father, said the Princess unto him, is so much your Debtor, and I also, that I am resolved not to argue against you, though in reason I ought to do it: but let me tell you in less anger then I could, that if what you say be not true, though your boldness deserves I should forbid my self ever speaking with you again, yet I will forget your crime, and pardon you; but if to your misfortune there be any truth in your words, I shall not treat you so favorably. How Madam, replied he, will you punish me more severely for telling you an insolent lye, then for telling you a most respective truth? I shall do more than that, answered she, for I shall punish my self for your crime, though I am not accessory to it. Alas Madam replied he, if I am culpable, you have made me so, but in the name of the Gods Madam, do not condemn me upon so slight a ground; You have heretofore had so earnest a desire to know whether I was in love, and whom I loved, when the Prince Atis told you that I would not feign affection unto Anaxilea; that I did not think it so great a wrong to tell you the truth once in my life: Consider Madam, I cannot in justice be accused of what I now discover unto you; for can it be a Crime to be overcome by one who is able to overcome the whole Earth? You ought at the least to hide your defeat, replied the Princess. I hide it from all the world, replied he, knowing well that my misfortune is so great, that it is a shame unto my illustrious Conqueror: but for you Madam, I do confess I had a great desire to discover Page 219 it unto you: But Madam, if I can obtain so much from your goodness, as to pardon me this first crime, I will promise you to regulate my life so for the future, as it shall please you, and to shut up the violence of my love in my own heart. Do so then, said she unto him, and be sure, that not one of your actions, words, or looks, may ever call into my memory the fault which you have committed this day: and I am resolved to forget and forgive it, if you will do as I would have you, and as I shall appoint you. I shall do the utmost of my endeavours to obey you, Madam, replied he; but in the name of Heavens do not treat me as one that is innocent, but as one that was criminal, and you have pardoned him.

The Princess not being able to tolerate this conference any longer, took her leave of Cleander, being not less incensed against her self then against him, because she thought she had not spoken sharp enough unto him: Since he does not know, said she, that the King has a design in his advantage, what will he think of me? for hearkening unto him with so few signes of anger? And have I not some reason to fear that my over indulgence has blotted out that esteem which he had of me? Yet, said she, and reprehended her self, I being his debtor for the King my fathers life, and for my brothers, it were not just to be so severe unto him as his boldness deserved: but indeed, said she further, whosoever is Cleanders father, perhaps he may be of such a quality, as would make me blush for shame, if I knew him, that he should be so bold as to tell me he loved me, and I not banish him for ever: Ah my heart, cried she, thou hast betrayed me. For the truth is, I do love Cleander more then I thought, or ought to have done: But since it is so, I ought to learn by my own experience, that Cleander is not so much to blame; for since I cannot hate him when I would, he is excusable, if he cannot leave loving me, when I desire him. Let him love me then, said she, so he love me in secret; and tell me no more of it: but yet though she was not well reconciled with her self upon this point, yet she was so ingenious as to confess as much unto Cylenisa, unto whom she related all her thoughts, when they were together. The truth is Madam, the illustrious Cleander did carry it so judiciously, and with so much respect and discretion to the Princess all that Winter, as indeed she was constrained to let her heart yield unto that innocent passion, which would needs command it; yet she did not let it appear unto Cleander, but under the notion of solid and sincere friendship: always telling him, that it must be always carried so; because there was an invincible obstacle unto his happiness: for (said she to him one day, after he had obtained a revocation of that cruel Sentence, to speak no more of his love) if you did meet with no other hinderances of your good fortune, but because I do not esteem you, or but because I esteem another more then you, or but because I am insensible, time might very well alter all these: for I do ingeniously confess, that I find in your person, and in your mind, all that is requisite to obtain my esteem: you have rendered me an hundred thousand services in the person of the King, and in my own; I am perswaded that you love me: my own inclination is not to hate you; and every thing except one only, contributes to fasten our friendship: But Cleander after all these, all Asia knows, that you know not who you are, and it were a miracle if you ever did; therefore we must engage no further, but keep within the limits of friendship; not that I esteem you less, or thinks that your original deserves not to be high, but I do acknowledge unto you my weakness: Since all the world is not of my mind, I can banish out of my spirit some fears of being blamed, if it should come to be known, that I reserve a private room in my heart, for one that is not known who he is? Therefore Cleander in regard unto my honour content your self with my friendship and esteem: Love me in the secret of your heart as much as you will (said she and blush*) but never expect any more from Palmis then offices of friendship. I find so much reason in your expressions Madam, replied he, and so little satisfaction to my self, that I know not how to answer: for as concerning my original, Madam, I have no Index to find it out, but only a most strong perswasion that it is not base, because I am so bold as to love you, and to love you without any manner of scruple. Yes, divine Princess, I find in my soul such a kind of noble pride, as perswades me, that I may adore you, and do you no wrong, yet since this proof is only convincing unto my self, I ask no more, then what you are pleased to consent unto; and as long as you do not forbid me loving you, I shall never complain: for Madam, the esteem which I have of your merit is so great, that though I were the Son of a great King, I should not think my self worthy to ask your affection but upon my knee. Things standing upon these terms, although the Princess did carry her self towards Cleander with extream reservedness; yet talking with him oftner then usual in private, and love being of such a nature as cannot be long hid, especially where there is inequality between the parties, Artesilas began to perceive, that there was some alteration between them, and within a few days after, he did not question, but Cleander at the least* was in love with the Princess Palmis, since Page 220 himself was but coarsely treated: Jealousie did rowse up his heart in a very violent manner, he kept the business close, because he would first clear his suspicions: But after an observing eye upon Cleanders actions, and assuring himself that he was his Rival, conceiving also that he was the only cause of the Princess her scorn upon him: he began to have a most strong aversion to Cleander, and intended to put affronts upon him, and to quarrel with him upon the first occasion; That which was a quicker spur unto his design, was, because he knew Cleander would ere long go to command the Army, and finish the Phrigian war: but how hot seever he was to quarrel, yet for some days he could not bring it about, because Cleander was feldom with any but the King, or the Princess, unless sometimes with the Princess of Clasomena. As he was one day coming from her, Artesilas met him, & speaking very coldly unto him, I have sought you several days, said he, but I could never meet you, unless with the King, or Princess, in whose presence you are continually. Had I known your intentions replied Cleander with the same coldness, though very civilly) I should have come to you to know your pleasure. Perhaps if you had known it, answered Artesilas, you would have been so far from coming to me, that you would not have come to the Princess of Clasomena. Since I do not use to shun either my friends or my enemies, answered Cleander, I know no reason you should speak in that manner unto me. I know less reason you have, replied Artesilas, to carry your self as you have done of Page 221. Since I have ever followed the rules of reason, answered Cleander, I do not know how I have misbehaved my self. When you came first unto Sardis, replied Artesilas, it was not easie to foresee that your frequent visits of the Princess would afterwards prejudice me, or that a man of your quality should be so bold as to oppose such a one as my self. My quality (replied Cleander, much incensed) is indeed unknown to me; but I had rather be received by the Princess for my own virtue, then for my quality only, though it were higher than yours. You may do well to think of your own, replied Artesilas, and let mine alone: if you do not, I shall find out ways to remember you; therefore let me find you no more with the Princess, if I do—How Sir, said Cleander, and interrupted him, force me not to lay aside those respects which perhaps I should have paid unto your quality, and remember that men of carriage cannot brook to be threatened by any but the Gods only. But you shall suffer the threatenings of a man, replied Artesilas, and perhaps find such effects of it, as shall not please you, unless you correct your self. Provided that our Swords be equal, replied Cleander fiercely, the inequality of our conditions shall not hinder me from preventing you; But Sir, do not prophane the name of the Princess in such an occasion, as she ought not to be introduced: if you have any secret hatred to me, revenge your self generously: and do me the honour to tell me with your Sword in your hand, whether it be nature or fortune which puts a difference between us. You shall know that presently (replied Artesilas, and drawing his sword, as well as one servant which was with him) so that Cleander having but his servant with him also, the fight was upon equal numbers, though with unequal success: for Cleander being animated by his love, by his jealousy, and by the angry language of Artesilas, did fight with such fury, that this Prince, as gallant as he was, had a hard task to resist him: since Cleander feared, lest some should come in to part them, he dallied not; but driving blow after blow upon his enemy, without any defending himself, he pressed so hard upon him, that he lost his judgment, and could neither defend himself, nor assault his foe: Not that Artesilas wanted any courage, but because the miraculous valour of Cleander surprized him, and put him into disorder: he was wounded at the first in two places, without any touch upon Cleander; who after he had given him two other wounds, he closed with him, threw him upon the ground, and took away his sword; Then after he had disarmed him, Do you acknowledg, said he, that you have some cause <◇> think my birth is not inferior unto yours? or do you not at the least confess, that if there <◇> any difference between us, it is fortune only which made it? Artesilas was so wounded, and ashamed at his defeat, that he had not power to answer. At the same time some women which belonged to the Princess of Clasomena, spied them out of a window, at the beginning of <◇> Combat, and sent some men to part them. But they came not in till all was done; Cleander's servant wounded the servant of Artesilas, whose sword was broken. Abradates came in also, who caused the Prince Artesilas to be carried unto his house, and who went with Cleander unto his lodging: not letting him go unto his own until he knew the cause of the Combat, and how the King would receive the news: Since Cressus loved Cleander very well, and never loved Artesilas at all, it was no hard matter to persuade him, that Artesilas was the Challenger, so that he seemed to be much incensed against him for affronting one who was so <◇> and high in his esteem: The friends of Artesilas did sweeten the matter, and told the King that the answers of Cleander did exasperate him, and since neither of these two Rivals did name Page 221 the Princess; some scornful words which Artesilas spoke concerning the birth of Cleander, passed for the ground of the quarrel.

In the mean while all the Court came to visit him, excepting the kindred of his Enemy, and some of them also forsook him, and offered themselves unto Cleander, whom the Princess sent privately to visit and rejoice that he was not wounded, not knowing yet what was the cause of the Combat, every one thinking that it was because Artesilas did treat him as an unknown man from whence he had his original: Nothing else was talked of; Those who had heard a hundred times how he was found, still enquired and related it: The Princess her self desired my Father to make an exact relation of it; How he saw him floating in a Boat with one woman could not wield it; how he sent Sailors to succor him; how he saw the Child in a Mantle made of Cloth of God; how she who was with him was dumb; how she held in her hands a Picture, where this Child was represented, as Cupid is used to be drawn, and with him a fair Lady, which seemed to be his Mother by those Verses which were written underneath; and how this dumb woman dyed: The Princess, who never durst ask to see this Picture, did prevail with the opposites to her curiosity, and desired Timocreon to send it unto her, which he did, and it was I who carried it, unknown to Cleander, for he stayed with Abradates, until such time as it was known whether Artesilas would recover of his wounds, one of them being very dangerous. The Princess blushed when she took the Picture, not being able doubtless to receive the Picture of him she loved without confusion, though it was only the picture of a Child, yet a Child pictured like a God: As she was always used to admire all beautiful things, so she admired at this Picture, which indeed was very admirable, and observed how Cleander still retained a great resemblance of what he was then; but she was charmed with the beauty of the Mother, whom she commended with less scruple than she could the son, though she could not commend the one without the other, because there was a most perfect resemblance: she thought the invention of the Picture and the Verses very pleasant; and I observed, that she looked upon the magnificent Border of that Picture with much delight, because it was an infallible testimony that the birth of Cleander was not mean; and always extreamly commending the Limner who drew this Picture, she asked me whether Timocreon would trust her with it for a few days, that she might shew it unto some of her friends? You may imagine, Madam, that I denied her not, and that it was not long before I acquainted Cleander, that the Princess desired to keep his Picture; But he answered me, that he should think himself much more happy if she would give him hers, since the one was only a bare effect of her curiosity and the other would be an argument of her affection. Whilst things stood upon these terms, News was brought that the King of Phrygia was drawing into the field: So that Cressus commanded Cleander to prepare himself for a March; which he did the very same hour, sending his Train before him; The King by virtue of his supreme Authority did reconcile Artesilas and him the next morning. At the same time, a Phrygian man of good quality who was an Exile came unto Sardis to treat concerning the Ransom of a Prisoner of War, and since his name was known, and that he was a man of spirit, Cressus received him very well, and assured him that if ever there was a Peace made between him, and the King of Phrygia, he would make his particular with that Prince.

Thimettes (for that was the Phrygians name) had not been long at Sardis, but he went to present his service unto the Princess; and coming to her one day when she was in her Close, whilst they went to acquaint her he desired to see her, he saw upon the Table in her Chamber this picture of Venus and Cupid which I told you of before: yet he no sooner saw it, but taking it up he seemed to be extreamly surprized; he read the Verses; he observed the Border, and looked upon it most precisely; and having no power to leave it, he asked Cylenisa who gave this Picture to the Princess? She, knowing it was not a thing to be made a secret on, told him the whole truth in few words, whereat he seemed much moved: But Cylanisa imagining that his surprize was only at the novelty of the adventure, she made no reflection upon it: Thimettes contenting himself also with telling her that this Picture deserved to be carefully kept: When he was told the Princess was at leisure, he went to see the Princess, but his visit was not long: As soon as he came out from her, he went unto Cleander, who was returned to his own Lodging since Artesilas grew better, and since they were reconciled: yet he could not go so soon as he intended, because he met with a man in the way, who acquainted him with great news, as afterwards we came to know: but after his business was done with this man, he went to Cleander, who imagined that Thimettes came to visit him only as the Kings Favorite; and when he desired <◇◇> with him in private, he supposed it was to speak with him concerning his interests with the King of Phrygia, knowing that he was the next day to go unto the Army: As soon as they were together in private, Sir, said Thimettes unto him, I have such Page 222 strange news to tell you, that I know not whether I shall be beleaved at the first, though I do assure you that the illustrious Cleander, as unknown as he is unto all the world and to himself, is yet the son of a great King. Thimettes (said Cleander, much amazed, and not daring to believe him) If I should credit my own heart. I ought to give credit unto your words; but if I look upon all appearances, I must needs doubt of what you say. It is most certain though, replied Thimettes, that you are Son to the King of Phrygia, and as certain as I am his Subject. How, said Cleander, am I Son to the King of Phrygia whom I fought with, and whom I am going to fight with again? Yes Sir, answered he, you are so; and so certainly, that you shall not doubt of it, if you will but take the pains to hear me. Speak then Thimettes (said Cleander hastily) for you tell me such welcome and such strange news all at once, that I cannot too soon know the truth, and that I may know whether joy or sorrow be my Fate. Sir, replied Thimettes, I cannot utter such great things as I have to tell in few words, and the Crown which I bring you may well allow me a quarter of an hours patience: Be pleased to know then Sir, that the King your father who reigns at this day, who whilst the late King lived was called the Prince Artamus, being desperately in love with a Lady whose name was Elsimena, who was of a Noble blood, but not a Princess; and he used all his endeavors to make his affection acceptable: But since this Lady was as vertuous as fair, and yet as fair and fairer than any in either High or Low Phrygia, she refused the passionate addresses of this Prince with much constancy, ever telling him, that as his love was vicious, so he should find her rigorous. I shall not relate unto you Sir all the particulars of this love; only tell you, that the Prince Tydeus, brother unto the King your father, and unto the Prince Adrastus who dyed in this Court, though then at that time a child, was his Rival, and were obnoxious one unto another, and this Lady behaved her self with so much prudence between them both, that her wisdom was admired by all the world: I had then the honour to be in favor with the Prince Artamus, and to be the Confident of his passion. I happened one day to be with Elsimena, who was then at Apamea, when these two Rivals were both there, and when without any dissimulation of her thoughts she told them, that he whom she would prefer should doubtless be him who gave her the best testimonies of a vertuous passion; which they might have time enough to do, since both of them told her, that they could not marry her during the life of the King their father: However, since she loved the Prince Artamus, better then she did the Prince Tydeus, she made a vow to send offerings unto Delphos, if it would please the Gods whom they adore to inspire him with a design to marry her: so that whether it was the virtue of this vow, or that the prince Artamus grew more in love, he resolved to marry her secretly: and I was a Witness of the Marriage, with four others of quality who lived there: It was solemnized in the same Temple where the Gordian Knot is kept, this amorous Prince resolving that this union should be more indissoluble then it. The business was very secretly done, and the Sacrificer was absolutely gained, that no rumors of it should be divulged: and Elsimena treated the Prince her husband before the world, as if he were not so much as her Lover. But to free her self from the persecution of the prince Tydeus, and to enjoy in more freedom the conversation of the prince Artamus, who was much more amorous after marriage then before, she went to dwell with her mother at a Castle on the Sea side, whether the Prince came often unto her, unknown unto any, faining divers small Journeys, or Huntings, to colour his absence; and I often went with him. Never was passion more violent then his, nor better grounded, for certainly Elsimena was a miracle of beauty, wit, and virtue. But Sir, ere long this Princess was with child, and presently after gave you life: The prince Artamus was overjoyed to have a Son: Some reports went about the world of his marriage: The prince Tydeus had two or three fallings out with his brother about it: The King had heard of it, and absolutely forbid Artamus from seeing Elsimena, so that he could not visit her without much difficulty; for he had so many watching eyes upon him that he was not Master of his own actions. However Sir, you live, and have such a perfect resemblance of the Princess your Mother, that I never in my life saw two faces more like, that were of a different Sex and age. Since the prince Artamus could see Elsimena but very seldom, he appointed me to procure her picture, so that carrying an excellent Painter unto the place where she was, she would send him the picture of her Son as well as of her self; The device of the Drawer was to paint a Venus and a Cupid, the one to resemble her, the other you: The conceit did so please the Princess, that she caused two to be made, intending to send <◇◇> unto the Prince and to keep another her self: but since the Prince was still a Lover as well as a Husband, he caused those Verses which you have seen to be written at the bottom of both pictures: The Verses were writ in Greek, because the Princess then learned that language, which was much in use among the Ladies of quality in Apamea, who had any reputation of wit. Page 223 Mean while the King of Phrygia dyed, and the prince Artamus, being elder then either the prince Tydens, or the prince Adrastus, succeeded in the Throne, and was in a condition to crown Elsimena his Queen: As soon as the Funerals of the King his father were solemnized, he published his Marriage, and magnificent preparations were made to receive the Princess at Apamea; to acknowledg her Queen before all the people, and by consequence to declare you his legitimate Heir and only Successor. This great Feast was so near, that the stately Coach which was prepared for the Princess at her entry was gone unto her; and I sent every thing requisite, and neglected not so much as a Mantle made of Cloth of God, in which you were to be wrapped that day of his Ceremonies; but alas Sir, the day was pitifully disturbed: for two days before her departure, since all things were in readiness for her stately entry, and the King your father joyed beyond all expressions, being gone towards the Princess, to testify his satisfaction unto her, I met upon the way men who came to advertise, the King, that some had surprized the Castle the night before; had carryed away the Queen your mother and you, and also all which was of value in that place, where there was things of great consideration, for all the Jewels of the Crown were there, Artamus having sent them unto his dear Elsimena, since he was King: I leave you to judg Sir, how I was amazed: Since I was not far from the Castle, I went unto it; and I understood by the Mother of Elsimena, who dyed for grief within a few days after, that men in Arms who were unknown had surprized it, and had carried the Princess and you, with all the rich Booty, into a Ship, but none knew which way these Ravishers went, because it was night, having plundered the Castle so clean, that they left almost nothing in it: However, this sad news must be carried unto the King, who received it so sadly, that I thought he would have lost both his Life and Reason: he caused a most strict search to be made every where, to see if it could be discovered who were the Actors, but all in vain: He sent several Ships at random to seek about. He much suspected the Prince Tydeus, both as his Rival and as an ambitious man, who had in one day taken from him his Successor, and the person whom he loved as well as he did: but having no proofs against this Prince, who never had stirred from Court, nor so much as any pregnant conjectures, he could not accuse him: Tydeus seemed to be much troubled at the loss, and the King your father was forced to endure a misery, without having so much consolation as to know whom he should be revenged upon, nor of whom to complain. After this he still made a diligent enquiry, and continually grieved for his dear Elsimena, never giving ear unto any that motioned him to a second Wife, and having no other comfort but in the picture of his dearest Elsimena. However, he could never have any confidence in the prince Tydeus since that time; who often left the Court; made many journeys, and at the last went to dwell in the Lower Phrigia. I shall not tell you Sir, how the prince Adrastus going to visit him had the misfortune, as he was shooting in his Park, to kill him with an arrow, without any design of it, for I know you are not ignorant of it; and thus the Justice of Heaven, which sees that crime no man could see, did punish him in such an extraordinary way. But give me leave to tell you, that some of my enemies, with much injustice falling upon me in the Kings presence, and procuring his displeasure, I was forced to absent my self for some time, and I had not come into this Court, but only to endeavor the liberty of a Nephew whom you took prisoner in the last Battel, and not with intentions to bear arms against the King my Master. Mean while Sir, I no sooner saw you with the King of Lidia, but I found some features in your face which did so freshly revive the image of your Mother in my mind, that me thought I knew you: yet the longness of the time since, and the little appearance of any truth in my thoughts, caused me not make no further reflection upon it: for I had heard you were one whom Fortune had raised, but I never did particularly know you, nor who you were. But Sir, as I was with the Princess, I chanced to see that Picture which I caused to be made, and which that dumb woman gave unto Timocreon; this did so extremely amaze me, that I knew not well what the Princess thought of my odd conversation, my mind being at such distraction at it: At my coming out from her, as if this day were a day of Prodigies, I met an old man who knew me, and who at the first I knew not; he desired to speak with me in private concerning some matters of consequence: after a serious talk upon him, I remembered that I had seen him about the prince Tydeus, so that wondering to see him at Sardis, I gave him hearing. Then Sir, he told me, that since he had already one foot in his grave, and ready to render an account unto the Gods of all his crimes, he would endeavor to merit a pardon by an ingenious confession, which he would make unto me. After this he discovered, that the late prince Tydeus his Master, was the man who caused the Princess Elsimena and you to be carried away, out of some humors of jealousy, rage, ambition, and revenge, finding some sweetness in depriving his Rival of the only person he loved, and much more in taking away from him a Successor, by that means to assure Page 224 himself of a Crown, or at least render himself more considerable in the Kingdom, since he should be looked upon as one who hereafter should be King: for he believed the King his Brother could never forget Elsimena, nor would ever marry again. This man told me then that he was the chief in the Enterprize: That the Prince Tydeus appointed him to go and dwell in one of the Isles of Cyclades which was least peopled, and to keep Elsimena from speaking unto any whosoever, intending to put neither her, nor you to death, because he thought that if his crime should be discovered, he had a most certain way to save his life, being Master of yours, and of the Queen your Mothers.

This man whose name is Acrates, told me then, that obeying his Master, he carried away the Princess Elsimena, and you, and that he took with him all the riches in the Castle, But lest he should be discovered, he took but one woman of the Queens to wait upon her, and placed none about her but a dumb Slave which he had, who was not able to reveal his secrets. He confessed that when he was come unto one of these Cycladean Islands with this deplorable Princess, he sold the Ship in which he brought her: and he remained possessour of all the riches which she had, with three of his Complices. He did protest unto me, that he did not treat her rigorously, but that sorrow did so change her countenance that she was hardly knowable; he further told me, that the Prince Tydeus, seeing he was not accused of his crime, and that in all likelihood, the King his Brother should never know it, he changed his mind, and resolved to put the Princess Elsimena, and you to death, fearing lest in tract of time, that which once he thought would save him, should now ruine him: so that he sent orders unto Acrates to put you both to death: giving all the treasures to him in recompence, and to his three Complices. As for the Souldiers and Mariners which helped to carry her and you away, they were all strangers, and knew not about what they were employed. The Souldiers being of kind of Mastroopers, and the Mariners Pirats; men easily invited to any bad employments without so much as asking what it is. So these wicked Villains, after they had seized upon all which resisted them in the Castle, and brought you to this Isle, they dispersed themselves, having received their wages before they committed the crime, and left none with Elsimena, but a dumb Slave, and these four men. Acrates then having received these orders, did assure me that he resisted his companions as much as he could, yet being but one against three, he could not prevail with them, and could do no more but acquaint Elsimena secretly, that they had received commands to put her, and her Son to death; and that these men maugre his resistance, would ere long execute it: he added further, that this unfortunate Queen being sick, did not take any care for her self, but all her thoughts was to preserve your life: That she took you in her Arms, and after she had kissed you with eyes swimming in tears, she put you into the hands of the dumb Slave, making signes unto her, that she should go and carry you to Delphos, for Elsimena being lodged by the Sea-side, they could see that Isle out of their window: Moreover that she took the picture, which they had left her, and writing some lines upon it in haste, she gave it unto this Slave: he said, that this mute woman, finding a Mantle of Cloth of gold (in which you should have been carried that day on which your Mother should have been crowned) and wrapt you in it: that going hastily out in the beginning of the night, Acrates following her at a distance, she came unto an old fisherman, conjuring him with all her signes to carry her unto Delphos, giving him for this wages a jewel which she had. In the mean time, the unfortunate Elsimena did so grieve at her misfortune, that her Jaylors did not need either sword or poyson to make her die; and she fell into such a mortal passion, that she never revived: The Funeral of this deplorable Princess was the next day performed without any Ceremony, Acrates further said, that the absence of this child did much perplex them: and upon enquiry they could hear no more, but that the mute woman had taken boat, wherein was only an old fisherman to guide it: who being put off a good way from the shore (where the wife of this fisherman stood) he reached to the Rudder so far that he fell into the Sea, and was drowned, because he was too old, and too weak to swim: so that the boat was left to the wind and the waves. Acrates related further, that when his companions returned to the house, and could not find neither the child, nor the slave, they suspected him as accessory to her flight; but he said, he dissembled it so well that they altered their minds; also flattering themselves in their crimes, they believed this Infant would perish in the boat which had no Pilot to guide it: so that after they had divided the treasures, and sent unto the Prince Tydeus, that the mother and the child were dead, they parted one from another, and every one took his several course. As for Acrates, he came to Sardis, where he has lived a most discontented and melancholy life, notwithstanding his riches: he added further, that since the Combate between Artesilas, and you, hearing of the obscurity of your birth, and likewise understanding in what manner Timocreon Page 225 found you, he made no doubt but that you were son to the King of Phrigia; but he said, he could not resolve to confess his crime unto you; yet seeing me, he could not hold, but must needs discover it, to the end he might find the King of Phrigia a Successour, since there was no more of his Family left. So Sir, said Thimettes, I have no more to say, but to desire you that I may have the favour to see the paper which this Princess writ, for I understand that Timocreon hath it. Cleander was so amazed at this Relation, that he could hardly answer him: yet at last sending for my father, and that he should bring the paper which the mute Slave gave him, he instantly came, and gave it unto Cleander, who gave it unto Thimettes. But he no sooner saw it, then crying out, and holding up his hands; Ah Sir, said he, I need not open it, to know whether it be the hand of the Princess Elsimena; for I know this Seal which I see upon it. In saying so he opened it, and reading these words, This Infant is recommended unto the God which is adored at Delphos: he read it over again; Doubt it not Sir, said he, make no question but you are Son to the King of Phrygia: These Characters are so exactly the hand of the Princess Elsimena, that nothing in the world can be more certain, since I know her hand, and her Orthography: for I think I have carried an hundred Letters from this Princess to your father, who was often times pleased to shew them unto me, delighting to see me admire at the wit of Elsimena, who writ admirable well in any strange language. Moreover Sir, I may perhaps shew you one thing which is very strange; be pleased to know Sir, that a while before he married her, since he was pleased to give her some assurances of his affection in writing, he writ upon a kind of paper, the invention whereof was mine, which is not common: for Sir, after that one hath written what one pleaseth, one may cover the Characters with a certain Composition put upon the paper, which will make it seem as if nothing were writ upon it, yet when one pleaseth, one may easily take that off which covers them, and cover it again at ones pleasure: so that if my memory fail me not, it was this paper which I carried unto the unfortunate Elsimena, which contained the first assurance which the Prince Artamas gave her, that he would marry her: since it was her custom to cover again all the Letters which the Prince did write unto her, after she had read them, that she might thereby keep them more safely: It is requisite that I shew it unto you, then going to the fire, he took away, that which hid the Characters of the King of Phrygia's Letter unto this amiable Lady, and he read aloud these words:

The Prince ARTAMAS, unto the incomparable ELSIMENA.

AT the last, Love hath overcome all cruel Reasons of State, which did oppose my happiness: And though I were assured, that by marrying you, I should lose that Crown which I am to wear, yet would I resolve upon it, and bid the other adieu; for I make no comparison <...> you, and all the Crowns in the world: yet I hope the Gods will preserve it for me, <...> may make you a Queen: In the mean time Thimettes hath Orders to ask that Lady <...> gave you life, and is to dispose of you, when it is her pleasure I shall be happy: The Sacrificer of Apollo's Temple has promised me to be secret and faithful: and I do assure you, my dear Elsimena, that the never to be untied knot which is kept there, will sooner be loosed, then that which ties my heart unto your service.

ARTAMAS.

After that Thimettes had read this Letter, See Sir, said he to Cleander, whether you can wish any more to inform your knowledg: look upon the writing of the King your father, and of the Queen your mother, which will remove all scruples of doubt. Moreover (said he in looking upon the paper a little nearer) I perceive some dim line of the Queens own hand, which is discovered in coming near the fire, which doubtless was covered by the same subtle composition, without any intention, which by some chance was poured upon it, and warmed by the heat of the Sun, when the Slave had it in the Boat: And indeed, looking upon that place, where it was written; This Infant is recommended unto the God which is adored at Delphos: there was to be seen following; Who without doubt will restore him to the King of Phrygia his Father. Cleander was so astonished, Timocreon was so glad, and Thimettes esteemed himself so happy, at the discovery of such an important business, that all three knew not how to express themselves. My father caused the Cloth of Gold Mantle to be brought in which the child was found in the boat, and which he carefully preserved; but Thimettes before he saw it, described it so precisely, and all things found so exactly as he said them, that there was no scruple, Page 226 nor objection to be made; and as oft as Thimettes minded the resemblance between Cleander and Elsimena, he wondered that he did not at the first know him to be son unto the King of Phrigia. But Sir, said he unto him, after I have told you your Quality, it is requisite I let you know your first Name; and that I tell you it was your fathers pleasure, to give you the same with himself: so that you must change the famous name of Cleander, for that of Artamas, which is your own.

After this, Cleander would needs see Acrates, and hear from his own mouth the relation of his Crime; assuring Thimettes, and him also, that he would pardon him: However, since there was War between the King of Phrigia and Cressus, it was not thought expedient to divulge the business: And Cleander, who had secret designs, which Timocreon was ignorant of, after he had embraced him, and told him, that he was no less a Debtor unto him for his life then he was unto the King his Father; after, I say, a thousand thankful expressions unto Thimettes and him, he desired them to leave him at liberty unto his private thoughts, not intending yet to treat Thimettes as a Subject unto the King his Father, nor look upon Timocreon but with his accustomed respects. Since I knew not what had passed, I came into the Chamber, when these persons went out, and since he had trusted me with all his secrets, & discovered unto me all his ill fortunes, it was his pleasure I should participate both of his good and bad fortune: So that staying me with him, and after he had in short related all unto me, as I began to rejoyce that he was the son of a great King; Ha Sosicles, said he unto me, how heavy do I th this Crown, though yet it be not upon my head? for truly I see many cross and many agreeable Consequences of it. I conceive, replied I, that since the Princess Palmia can desire no more in you than an illustrious birth, you have reason to be satisfied, and hope to be happy. You do not consider Sosicles, said he unto me, that as soon as I tell I am the son of a King, so soon do I tell her that I am the son of her fathers Enemy: Moreover, do you not conceive that Cressus thinks I ought to depart within these two days at most to go and fight the King of Phrighia? and Sosicles, how do you think I can go and tell him, that I neither can nor ought to go? May I not expect after this, that he will look upon me as Nephew to the Murtherer of the Prince his son? and indeed Sosicles, is there not more cause to fear that this seeming good fortune will cause me real misery, then there is to hope for any end of my miseries? If I go unto the King my father whom I have fought against, whom I have overcome, and whom I thought to kill with my own hands, is there not some reason to think, that he will expect the same valor which has been so fatal unto him, should restore him that which it hath gotten from him? and yet can I so much as think of fighting against my Benefactor, and which is more than that, the Father of the Princess Palmis? Also, knowing as I do, that I am the King of Phrighia's son, shall I stay any longer in the Country of Cressus? May not the King my father disclaim me, and not acknowledg me his son, if I should continue fighting, not only for my Enemies, but also against him? Yet Sosicles, I am put to this cross necessity: Oh, I wish to the Gods that my Princess, who does not hate me as unknown, would not hate me when I am known unto her: But Sosicles, if my Princess cannot find a way to reconcile all these contraries, but shall think that to be her Lover, and the son of her enemy, are two qualities incomparable, I am resolved to renounce the Throne, and without ever assuming the name of Artamas, continCleander eternally. But Sir, said I unto him, as long as you are Cleander, you must fight against the King your father. Ah Sosicles, said he, the Combats already with him, have caused such horror in me, that though I would fight again against him, yet I think my hand would not obey me: Did I not tell you, that I was not so happy as you thought me? Oh most cruel Fortune, canst thou not present me with my benefit, but thou must poyson them? Do but admī <...> my fortune, Sosicles: The King of Phrighia and the King of Lidia never had any Wars between them until within this year: so that if my birth had been discovered at any time then this, I had been absolutely happy. Moreover, do you not consider, my Destinies would needs have me to be the son of that King only, against whom Cressus had declared War? Therefore must it not needs be confessed, that my fortune is very odd and ill, and that it is not easie to <◇> it any better? But whatsoever fall, I shall for ever love my Princess, and shall think, that good fortune consists only in the enjoyment of her heart.

As Cleander was thus thinking, a Messenger came to tell him that Cressus asked for Man, and had received news, that the King of Phrighia was entered into his Dominions. I leave you to judge Madam, how this went against his mind, yet must he go unto this Prince, and did so; but he was so puzzled to answer him, that Cressus perceived something did trouble <◇> mind, and asked what it was, but Cleander did not tell him; for since yet he had not seen his Princess, he knew not whether it would be her pleasure he should: he answered h*m then in Page 227 obscure words; yet since the Phrighian War did wholly take up the mind of Cressus, he took no notice of them; he told him, that he must needs depart within this day or two to vanquish his Enemy, who seemed to have a design to conquer his Conqueror: But Cleander, said he unto him, I would have you remember, it is the last Victory which gives the Prize to all the rest; and for your part, I know you have so much glory and honour to preserve, that you are no less interested then my self in the good or bad success of this War. After this he took his leave of him, and told him, that he would go and bid adieu unto all his friends. Cleander being glad to be rid of a conversation, which was so troublesome, went unto the Princess, who believing that he came to bid her adieu, no sooner saw him enter into her Closet, where she was alone with Cyleneisa, but addressing her self unto him, Though I do not doubt, said she, but you go to overcome your Enemies, since you go to fight them; yet since you cannot do that without hazard of your life, and without leaving me, I cannot see you depart without much sorrow. Madam, answered he and sighed, Victory is such a thing as I ought not to think upon, and when you shall know what I have heard, since I had the honour to see you, I am sure you will be of my opinion. How Cleander, said she unto him, have you offered any Sacrifices unto the Gods which have not been accepted? or has the Gods forewarned you by any sinister presages of some sad accident? The Gods Madam, replied he, have let me know the best and most agreeable news in the world in appearance, since they have let me un|derstand by a marvellous accident of what quality I am: But in the name of the Gods Madam, I do he|sech you, do not hate me when you shall know it. The Princess was much amazed at this discourse, and knew not how to answer him: yet imagining that his only reason was because he had found himself of some mean quality, she answered him in these terms, though in much impatience: Since your virtues are the same still, of what quality soever you are, I do assure you I shall always esteem you the same; and though the knowledge of what you are may make me change my manner of living with you, yet it shall never change my heart. Since it is so Madam, said he unto her, I shall not fear to tell you, that I am son to the King of—How Cleander, said she, and interrupted him, what pleasure can you have in making me sad? Why would you have me buy such welcome news with so much sorrow? You shall see Majdam, replied he, that the business is not so well as you imagine, when you shall understand that the Prince who gave me life, is the same King of Phrighia whom you commanded me to vanquish, and that it is not lawful for me to fight against him. And then he told her in as short a method as he could, how Thimettes had seen the Picture of Venus upon her Table; how Cyleneisa had told him in what manner it was found; and made relation of all he knew from Thimettes and Acrates, and neglected not any circumstance which might justify his quality unto the Princess, who did harken unto him with much attention and joy, though mingled with some unquiet thoughts. After he had ended his relation, As terrible an Enemy as you are, said she unto him, I esteem you so much, as that I would not have you unknown Cleander again, but much rather you were the Prince Artamas: Not but that I do foresee the angry Consequences which this glorious Quality may bring upon you; but yet the King of Phrighia and the King my father may happily conclude a Peace, and then you could not possibly be the son of a King unless you had been born so: But, said she, what do you design? for I con|ceive that the thoughts of the Prince Artamas will not concur with the thoughts of the unknown Cleander. The thoughts of Cleander, said he unto her, are not changed, since he knew he was the Prince Artamas: But I do not know whether the Princess of Lidia's mind be changed or no. Doubtless it is, replied she, for I shall be more civil towards the Prince Artamas, then I was to Cleander. That is not the question I ask (said he unto her) I only desire that you would be pleased to continue the same goodness unto me, as you did before, and that you advise me what to do, for truly I stand in great need of it. They ought to be more prudent, and less interested then I am, answered she, who can give you any good counsel. Then absolutely command me what is your pleasure I should do, said he unto her, for I make no question but that you will have a care of my honour in your Commands; and therefore my divine Princess, I will prescribe no limits unto you, but absolutely refer my self unto your Com|mands: Speak then Madam, I conjure you, and tell me, what is your pleasure shall become of me? How can I disobey Cressus, who would have me go and fight, and vanquish the King of Phrighia? how can I do all this, since I have the honour to be Son unto that Prince? The Gods preserve me, said she, from giving you any such counsel. I expected no less from your virtue, said he unto her, and give you thanks for not putting me unto so dangerous a Test, nor force me to disobey you, nor becoming the most criminal amongst men: And since Madam, you are pleased to consent that I should not fight against the King my father, I am fully resolved never Page 228 to fight against yours. I do conjure you to do so, said she unto him, by the affection which you have promised me. There needs not so strong a conjuration, answered he, for certainly I should never have done it, though I had never promised you: But Madam, I see very well what I ought not to do, but I do not yet see what I ought to do, and yet I must do something, and resolve upon it presently, for the King will needs have me depart within this day or two; all my men are already upon their March: the Troops which I must command are perhaps already in the King of Phrighia's hands; and the least delay may prove fatal unto me. Tell me then Madam, would you have me discover my self unto the King your father? or would you have me go and make my self known unto the King of Phrighia? and that I endeavor to move him unto a Peace, whilst you transact the same with Cressus? Pronounce my doom, I be|sech you, but whatsoever it be, do not banish me from your heart, nor exile me a long time from you. Then said she, and sighed, I must know how to do miracles, since under them there is no possibility of contenting you: for since the condition you are in permits me with more fitness to open my heart unto you, I shall tell you one thing which will make you wonder, and which will grieve you both, which is, that if you had still continued in uncertainty of your birth, at your return from this Battel, it was the King my fathers pleasure, that he who should marry me, should help the Prince Myrsiles to govern after his death, and support the Scepter after his death, and was resolved, if I can tell it you without a blush, to make choyce of you, and engage you unto it by his alliance. Oh Madam, said Cleander, since it is so, let me not be a son unto the King, since I do not wish to be so, but only to obtain that honour. No, said the Princess, and though ways could be devised to prevent your fighting against the King your father, none could be devised to hide your illustrious Birth, Timocreon, Thimettes, Sosicles, and Acrates would never keep that secret which would deprive you of a Crown, neither do I my self desire it: But that which moves me to tell you this, is to let you see it would be in vain to discover your self unto the King my father; for I understand this morning from the same person who gave me the first intelligence of it, that several stranger Princes have made offers of Marriage unto him, and his answers to them all was, that he was resolved, as I told you before, to marry me unto one, who should hereafter assist my brother to govern. How Madam, cried out Cleander, is the quality of a Kings son, which I so much wished, because I thought it absolutely necessary to obtain that happiness which without it I could never hope for, is it then an invincible obstacle unto my felicity? Ah Madam, if it be, then I reject a Crown, and had much rather be Cleander then Prince Artamas. I do not directly tell you, replied she, that this obstacle is invincible; but I say it is a great one: Moreover, since it is permitted me to discover my weakness unto you, I must confess, I could hardly resolve to marry a man whom all Asia thought to be of a mean original: Therefore let us transact as we ought, and leave the rest unto the providence of the Gods. This absolute resignation, replied Cleander and sighed, denotes thus much unto me Madam, that all my affection, all my cares, and all my services, have obtained nothing from you but this, that you permit me to love you, without your hating me: But Madam, if you will with a little more tenderness towards me, consider it, you would find, that it is not so easie a matter to do what one ought, or to know what ones duty is. Yet I think, replied she, that as long as you neither: fight against the King your Father, nor mine, you cannot be much blamed. But Madam, answered he, I do not see how I can do that, unless I discover my self unto the King, and by his consent send unto the King of Phrighia. It would be difficult, replied she, for the King your father to know you are his son unless he see you, especially not knowing you to be in his Enemies Country: Moreover, do you think that the King my father will be contented to lose both the Conqueror and the Conquest in one day? do you not apprehend more probability that he will incline more unto Policy then Generosity in this business? No, no, said she, I will not counsel you to that. What will you then advise me unto, Madam? replied he. Since Timocreon, replied she, knows the state of your fortune, discover unto him the state of your affection unto me also: I know him to be wise and generous; and he will not advise you unto any thing which shall be disserviceable either to the King his Master, or your self.

At the last, after much such discourse as this, Cleander sent to seek my father; and also let the Princess see Thimettes and Acrates secretly; and he shewed unto her the Letters of the King of Phrighia, and the Queen his wife. After much consultation upon the best course, it was resolved that Cleander should depart without discovering any thing unto Cressus; that my father and I should accompany him; that Thimettes and Acrates should go this voyage also; That after one days journey from Sardis, Cleander should send one of his servants unto Meneceus, with a Letter for him, and another for the King, which he should present unto him, Page 229 by which he should discover his birth, and assure him that he will never act any thing against his service, nor forget his benefits: That he should write also unto the Prince Myrsiles, unto Mexaris and Abradates, that they should address themselves to the King in his behalf: That in the mean time they should stay upon the Frontiers of Phrighia, and send Timocreon towards the King his father, to acquaint him with the story, and to beseech his favor unto Thimettes and Acrates, who was as generous in his Repentance, as he was weak in committing his Crime, by the Commands of his Master: That Cleander when he was made known should endeavor to move the King his father unto Peace; and that the Princess as well as Meneceus should on their side endeavor the same with the King of Lidia. After these Resolves, she restored the Letters back unto Timocreon, who loving Cleander no less then if he had been his son, was ready to engage his utmost in his service. Since all these Consults and Meetings could not be, but some Spies which the Prince Artesilas always kept about the Princess would per|ceive it, he was presently acquainted with it. Moreover, since Cleander had not bid his last adieu unto the Princess Palmis, he endeavored to obtain leave to speak in private with her: and in order to that, the next morning at her return from the Temple, Cleander went unto her, and talked near two hours with her, where such passionate discourse passed, and she returned such generous and obliging answers, not derogating from that exact virtue whereof she made profession, that Cleander, as amorous as he was, could not complain, though all he could obtain from her was, that she engaged her self to esteem him as long as she lived. This separation was so tender on both sides, that it was impossible for Cleander to purge his eyes from that profound melancholy which had seized upon him: so that those who observed it by orders from Artesilas, acquainted him with what they had seen. Then he knowing of all these secret meetings of Timocreon, Thimettes, Acrates, Cleander, the Princess, and my self, he conjectured that there was some close design in hand: <...> e employed all inventions that he could possibly devise, to discover what it might be: He suborned one of my Fathers domestique servants with money, and by him he understood that my father was preparing for a Voyage, and carried with him all his best things: Also he found out that Cleander had sent in all haste to command his men back which were gone into the Army: he learned further, that he had layed Posthorses in five or six places which was not the way unto the Army: Indeed, he had gathered so much, as he perswaded the King by one of his friends, that Cleander had some designs to betray him; that my father and I did the same; and that this Conspiracy was plotted by Thimettes, who seemed (as this friend of Artesilas said) to be out of favor with the Phrigian King, that he might be less suspected in this Court, and that he gave out he came only about the Ransom of his Nephew: That it was apparent Acrates, that Phrigian, had some great design in hand, since Thimettes and he were gone from Sardis before he had released his Nephew, which he said was all his business: That Timocreon did not think his goods safe here during his absence: yet Artesilas spoke not a word against the Princess, but acquainted the King with all he could against my father. But Madam, the business was managed with so much subtlety, that building a most apparent Conspiracy upon these grounds. The next morning Cleander being ready to take his leave of the King, having already bid adieu unto the Prince Myrsiles, Mexaris, Abradates, and also Artesilas, and as he was embracing Esope, who came to receive his Commands, Timocreon, Acrates, and my self being in his Chamber, that same Captain of the Guard, who had heretofore advertised the Princess of the King of Lidia's design, came and arrested Cleander, Thimettes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my self. I leave you to judge Madam, how we were all amazed: Cleander desired to be carried unto the King, but it was not permitted; but they carried him with us into the Cittadel of Sardis, lodging us in several Chambers. In this great disorder, my father was so prudent and happy, that he appointed one of his servants, unperceived by any, who carried those things which might be useful for the manifestation of Cleander, and secretly put them into the hands of the Princess: However, the Imprisonment of Cleander was an excellent salve to cure Artesilas, who began to stir abroad within few days after. I will not insist upon relation of the great amazement of the Princess, or of Cleander: Nor will I tell you the wonder of Cressus, that he should believe a man so generous as Cleander was, and one unto whom he was so much obliged, should betray him. But I shall tell you, that Cleander, enquiring of those about him, what crime would be layd unto his charge, understood how the reports in Sardis were, that he intended to betray the King; to forsake his Country, and revolt unto the King of Phrigia. Knowing then what the Crime which would be charged against him was; and knowing also that his innocence could not be known, but by acknowledging the truth; and since he could not deny a great part of those things which would be charged against him, he resolved upon it, and Page 230 sent word unto the King by him who commanded the Cittadel, that he beseeched him to send some person unto him whom he might trust with a business of importance: Cressus conceiving it advantageous for him that Cleander should repent and confess his crime, sent Meneceus unto him, supposing he would discover all the particulars of his design unto him more freely then unto any other.

Since Meneceus did ever love Cleander, and in spite of all the Glosses which Artesilas and his friend did put upon their accusation did never think him culpable, but was fully perswaded of his innocency: Cleander did justify himself, and related all the truth; he discovered unto him his birth, and acquainted him with all circumstances, not mentioning any thing of the Princess. And when Meneceus asked him where the Picture and Letters were, and all other things which might justify what he said; he acquainted him that Timocreon had them, and he desired him to ask him for them. After this Meneceus returned to Cressus, and related unto him all that Cleander had said: but since this Prince had a prejudicated opinion, he gave no great credit unto Cleander's words; yet at the solicitation of Meneceus, he appointed him to go unto Timocreon, for the Letters especially which he spoke of, because Cressus had heretofore seen two Letters under the King of Phrygia's own hand, and by comparing them together he might judge better of the truth. Meneceus went out to find out Timocreon, who was then forced to trust him, and confess that the Princess knew something of Cleanders design: for thinking that he unto whom he had given all those things to carry unto the Princess, had doubtless not failed, he was forced for the justification of Cleanders birth unto Cressus, to intreat Meneceus that he would go unto the Princess Palmis for them, and to tell Cressus that it was a Domestick Servant belonging to Timocreon, had given them unto her. Meneceus who loved my father very well, promised him he would, and kept his word: but he was extremely surprized when he came to the Princess, that she never saw nor heard of this domestick Servant, and consequently never received any of those things, which should have been delivered unto her. Meneceus sought out for this man with all care, but all in vain, for none could tell what was become of him: so that not being able to produce any thing of what he had promised to shew unto Cressus, he would not permit him to speak concerning Cleander, as Son to the King of Phrygia, but looked upon it as an imposture, and a lie, expressly charging Meneceus not to speak of it unto any, so that no reports of it went about the Court. You may imagine in what a sad condition my father was when he had lost that which would not only have justified Cleander unto Cressus, but which should have made him known unto the King of Phrygia. When Cleander heard of it, he was extremely grieved at it: and the Princess was so full of sadness, that she could not possibly hide her melancholy. However, Artesilas being recovered of his wounds, triumphed over the miseries of his Rival. The Prince Myrsiles, and Abradates, did verily believe that Cleander was not culpable, but there was so much obscurity in his justification, that they could not perswade Cressus he was innocent. As for the Prince Mexaris, though he did not think him criminal more then others did, yet it was thought he was not sorry for his disgrace, by reason of some ambitions thoughts; for he imagined that if Cleander were in disfavour when Cressus died, he might more easily exclude Myrsiles from the Throne, and get the Crown himself. There was none then which openly transacted in the behalf of Cleander, and us, but Meneceus: the Princess not daring to be seen in it, only doing her best in secret, and by clandestine ways. Esope yet must be excepted, who always spoke with boldness worthy of much commendations. Thus you see, the unfortunate Cleander (guilty in appearance, but really innocent) the most miserable man alive. But what sorrows soever he had to see he had lost all hopes of making himself known unto his father, or of ever coming out of prison, the absence of his dear Princess tormented him above all: and when he thought sometimes how near he was unto her, and yet to have no possibility of seeing her, he was not able to support his misery with patience: However, Artesilas who desired that punishment might follow imprisonment, and who was of their mind that stood in fear of chained Lions; did every day invent imposture upon imposture to ruine Cleander, and such scandalous and unworthy reports were spread up and down the Town, that the Princess were strangely alarmed at them. She conceived that if she had so good a heart as to tell the King she had seen these things, which would justify the birth of Cleander, it might do some good in the business, but since she could not do so unless she discovered that innocent League which was between them, she could not resolve upon it: but for all that, seeing his enemies were not satisfied with his imprisonment, but aimed at his life; she overcame her self, and resolved to do it. But then the difficulty was how to advertise Cleander of her intentions to speak unto the King, in case he should put it to the last extremity; for she feared, that if Page 231 he were not acquainted with it, he might contradict what she should say, and so be himself an obstacle to his justification: so that consulting with Cylenisa upon this Subject, that Lady seeing her Mistress in such a well grounded quietness; after she had a while thought upon it, told her ingeniously, that the Son of him who commanded the Cittadel in Sardis, had a long time shewed himself one that was far from hating her; and therefore she verily believed that if she desired him to do her any good office, she should find him very well disposed unto it, what danger soever there might be in the attempt. The Princess at the first did make some difficulty on it, to trust a young man, and a lover; but at last since she knew no better expedient, she consented to employ him. Since Cylenisa was my Cousin, I must be the pretence of that service which she required from her Lover; and since I could not be justified unless Cleander was, and every one knew that his interests were mine, she imagined that Tegeus (for that was the name of Cylenisa's Lover) would not think it strange she should desire to speak with him. The truth is Madam, Cylenisa knew so well how to order the mind of Tegeus, that what difficulties soever there were to speak with Cleander, he would endeavour it, and indeed kept his word: And he came to tell her the next morning, that if she pleased, she might speak with him the night after. At the first Cylenisa could not resolve upon it, but afterwards Tegeus told her the business was not so difficult as she imagined, because the Gardens of the Palace joyn close almost to the Counterscarpe of the Cittadel, there being a back door on that side, and just there she might go and speak with Cleander out of a barred window, and very low, which looked that way, only letting down a Draw-bridg which was over the Mote, and under the window, where she might <◇> with him very conveniently, without being perceived by any, because he himself had the guard of that side. Tegeus having made the matter both possible and easie, Cylenisa agreed with him, that she would walk very late in the Garden with one of her companions; and when it was the just hour which they should agree upon, they would come unto the end of this little bridg: and to give a signe that it was they, she would bring a dark Lanthorn, which will hide the light when they pleased: The way being thus resolved upon, Cylenisa returned unto the Princess, to tell her what she had done, but seeing the designe so near, she repented; yet considering the danger wherein Cleander was, and that if she should neglect this opportunity, she might perchance not have another, because Tegeus might change his Guard, she resolved to send Cylenisa to acquaint Cleander with her intentions to speak for him, and that they might not contradict one another in their tales: But when she began to consider that Cylenisa might not go alone unto that place, she almost changed her mind, because she durst not confide in any other of her women: Madam, said Cylenisa, fear and recompence will make any faithful, therefore I beseech you, let me tamper with one of my Companions; and suborn the Porter of the Garden towards the Cittadel, that after she and I have walked together late there, we may go with a dark Lanthorn through the great Cypress walk close by the gate which is opposite to that bridg, over which I must pass to speak with Cleander.

Ah Cylenisa, said the Princess, your expedient is dangerous: There is no other Madam, replied she, unless you will write, and trust your Letter with Tegeus: yet since I am a Cousin unto Soficles, there is less danger in my speaking with Cleander, then there is in writing unto him. The Princess did grieve extremely, and not being able to consent unto what Cylenisa did propound, she resolved upon nothing. But Madam, said she unto her, it concerns the life of Cleander. But Cylenisa, said she Princess, it concerns my own honour. I do not conceive it concerns your honour, or your vertue either, answered Cylenisa, and I know not why generosity should hinder you from doing a good act out of fear to be suspected for doing a bad one; And the act Madam, though it should come to be known, would rather pass for an act of charity, then a piece of amorous <◇> : and after all this Madam, since you are resolved to speak unto the King, and you know that he would marry you unto Cleander, and that you may well make it known you would save him, I cannot see there any such hazard in the business. The Princess then thought to write her mind, and trust the Letter with Tegeus to give it unto Cleander; but when she considered of the many matters she had to say, and that if by any misfortune this Letter should be lost, she might prejudice both her self, and Cleander, she gave ever that designe, and would neither write, nor let Cylenisa go, but remained extremely perplexed: But Esope coming to see her, and telling her, that so much ill was spoken of Cleander, as he took upon him so much boldness as to beseech her, she would protect such an illustrious man as he was; and after this he went away but ill satisfied with her answer, she began to resolve with her self, and told Cylenisa, she was contented she should go unto Cleander, and that she left it unto her <◇> to chuse which of her women she would have with her Page 232 But to abridge my discourse, since it hath been already too long; Cylenisa made choyce of her companion, and Tegeus sent a dark Lanthorn; and after she had received full instructions what to say, they went into the Garden with the dark Lanthorn, which gave no light but when they pleased, and went unto the Cypress Walk, close by the back door, towards the Bridg which Tegeus mentioned unto Cylenisa: but as she told me afterwards, they trembled at every step, and thought twenty times to return back: yet they went on, and being come unto the end of the Bridg, after the Gardener whom they had suborned had opened the door, Cylenisa opened and shut the dark Lanthorn two or three times as was appointed between Tegeus and her (for they passed through the Garden only by the light of the Stars;) immediately after the Bridg was let down, the window opened, and Cleander appeared, or (to say better) was heard.

Since this window was very low, Cleander speaking in a low voice, Is it possible, said he unto her, that I should have the happiness to speak with you, or is it a dream? Speak Cyleneisa, that I may know you, and tell me who is that which is with you. Sir, said she unto him, you may well imagine, since she is here that she is faithful, therefore not to lose a minute of precious time, let me haste to tell you, that the Princess is resolved to save your life, and to tell the King your father, that she knows of your birth; she desired to advertise you of it Sir, lest you should differ, and contradict one another in your relations of it; then Cyleneisa acquainted him with all that the Princess gave her in charge, both what she would say unto the King her father, and what Cleander should answer. How Cyleneisa (said he, after very serious attention) does that adored and admired Lady take any care for my life, and trouble her self with such difficulties as these? Ah Cyleneisa, I could never imagine it: But if she cannot preserve it, by any ways but by prejudice to her self, tell her I conjure you, that I had much rather dye then be any cause of harm unto her. But Sir, said she, do you think that your death would be pleasing to her? No, replied he, I think her too good to have any such thoughts; but my life is so useless, and will cause her so many sorrows, that I think it in some sort just not to preserve it by any way which may expose her unto the anger of the King her father: assure her therefore that I can dye without murmur; tell her Cyleneisa, that I should not be sensible of my misery but for the love of her; and that I do not think my prison tedious but because I cannot see her, and provided I do not lose her Love, I can contentedly lose my Crown and my Life also. As they were thus talking, a Soldier chanced to hear the voice of a woman, and went to acquaint the Governor, who presently took out a Party, some went to Cleanders Chamber, others to the window. Tegeus would have opposed them, but was not able, and his father caused him to be taken: Mean while Cyleneisa and her companion hearing a noise, would have fled, and got into the Garden, but they could not possible: Then Cleander, seeing the Princess women taken, and could not help, he both spoke and did such things, as might have discovered that which he had so long concealed. When Cyleneisa saw the Souldiers come unto her, and that there was no possibility to escape, she turned the light of her Lanthorn, and made her self known unto them: they then were much surprized, and turned their violence into civility; not one of the Souldiers but had seen her a hundred times with the Princess, when she came to walk in the Cittadel. Cyleneisa, who certainly had an excellent spirit and wit, told them, That the danger wherein I was for the love of Cleander, was the cause of her coming thither; that they need not think it strange she should endeavor to save her Cousin, by advising with him who was the cause of his misery, which way they might make his innocence appear. The Souldiers did harken unto her patiently, and did not contradict what she said: yet they carried her and her companion before the Governor, whom she would have perswaded to let her go unto the Princess, and not to acquaint the King with her being there, but she could not prevail: but on the contrary, since he was very exact, after he had placed these two women with much civility in one Chamber, and given orders to guard the prisoners very carefully, and his son also, he sent to acquaint the King with the passage; and sent also to the Princess, to ask her pardon for detaining her women, supposing that she would not acknowledg them after such an act as this. Since it may easily be imagined what apprehensions all these Parties had upon this accident, I will not stay to relate them: but you may be sure the Princess was extremely surprized and sad; Cleander was desperate; poor Tegeus who loved Cyleneisa, feared she would think he betrayed her; Cyleneisa was at her wits end as well as her companion; Cressus was astonished to hear of it; and sent Orders unto the Governor, whose name was Paetias, to send her and her companion presently to him; and he did so: When Cyleneisa came before him, Is it possible, said he unto her, that my daughter should keep one about her, that would do such are act so far unbefitting the modesty of her Sex? Sir, said she unto him, appearances are often fallacious; and this boldness of mine which seems so criminal, will perhaps appear Page 233 commendable, when you shall hear those truths which I shall tell you: for Sir, I am a Cousin unto Sosicles. 'Tis true (said the King and interrupted her,) but it was unto Cleander with whom you spoke. I do confess it, replied she, for since it is by him that Sosicles may be justified. I might well speak unto him who might make his innocence known. However it be, said he, do you think my daughter would allow you to go from her at midnight? and do you think I can be perswaded that you spoke unto Cleander only concerning the interest of Sosicles? Speak Cyleneisa, speak, I say, and tell me ingeniously who set you a work? Then Paetias whispered the King in his ear, and told him, that the Souldiers who heard them speak, and discovered it unto him, did often hear the name of the Princess both in the mouth of Cleander and hers. The King seemed to be much moved at what Paetias told him; for presently remembering the sorrows which the Princess testified at the imprisonment of Cleander, and her endeavors to justify him, he made no doubt but that there was some secret business which Cyleneisa would not confess: so that he spoke more sharply to her then before; yet say and do what he could, he could not make her speak a word against the Princess: But her companion who was with her, bring neither so witty, nor so bold, nor so affectionate as she (the King being advised to separate them) he got her by promises and by threatenings to tell all she knew: she confessed then ingeniously, that the Princess did know of their coming; but thinking to justify her, she protested that it was only out of compassion to the prisoners, that she sent Cyleneisa to speak with them. The King would have made her confess what she heard of Cyleneisa's and Cleander's discourse, but she would not answer a word to that, for she said she was so affrighted to be at that time in that place, that she heard their discourse but very confusedly, yet confessing that the name of the Princess was often used. There needed no more to disturb the Soul of the King, who now made no question but that there was a secret Correspondency between Cleander and the Princess his daughter: He went unto Cyleneisa again, but with such fury in his words, and so much anger in his eyes, that she stood in need of all her constancy to be undaunted. However, she was carried back to the Cittadel, and the King sent unto the Princess (for by this time it was day) to come unto him, which immediately she did: He no sooner saw her, but he commanded all to withdraw; then looking fiercely upon her, I never thought, said he unto her, that you had a heart so base, as to bestow any private affection upon a man that is unknown; upon a man, I say, who certainly is of a base original, since he hath no shift but an Imposture to fly unto to save his life, as if he could make the world believe he was a Kings son; a man who after abundance of benefits which I conferred upon him, would in recompence betray me, and ruine me and my Dominions. When the Princess heard her Father speak in such manner, she thought that Cyleneisa had confessed all: so that having no disposition to deny a most innocent truth, and injure it by telling lyes, resolved to disguise the matter no longer: Sir, said she unto him, it seems you think me to be very much in fault, but thanks be unto the Gods I have this satisfaction of Conscience, that I am certain I am not so. How, said he, are you not infinitely in fault to hold a secret compliance with a grant Delinquent to the State? Should any of my Subjects do as much, he should infallibly dye for it, and judg whether your Crime be not greater then any Subjects can be; you who are my Daughter, and is interested in the glory of my Kingdom, and good of my People, and ought to have no other Interest but what is mine. Sir, said she unto him, if I had any other then such, indeed I should think my self most culpable; but since I have not, I most humbly beseech you, to give me one quarter of an hours audience to justify my self. The King with much ado kept silence, and suffered her to speak. This wise Princess began her discourse with the affection the King had to Cleander in his Infancy; likewise with the affection of her Brothers; and the esteem which she her self had of him, repeating in few words, and much art, all the services which he had done for the King; his Victories, his Conquests, and all his heroic Acts: Yet relating all this after such a manner as no suspicion might be she affected him, but only as if she aimed at his justification and truth; Yet Sir (said she unto him, after she had called into his memory whether he would or no all his obligations unto Cleander) this man, so illustrious in every thing, to whom the Prince Atis owed his life, unto whom I am a Debtor for yours; he, I say, should never have moved my heart so much at this time, but by two most powerful Considerations: the one is, because I know you had a design to marry me unto him at your return from this War; the other is, because I understand his original is equal unto mine: besides all this, I am most certain, that he never had any intentions to betray you; nor ever had a more violent desire to acknowledg all your benefits.

The King wondering and raging that his daughter should know of his design concerning her Marriage, said unto her, and interrupted her, You ought however to have stayed until I had Page 234 commanded you to marry Cleander, before you gave him any testimonies of your affection: But since you are so obedient unto my will, that you would have married him if it had been my pleasure, pray also hate him when I would have you; and know, that I will punish him for his Crime, and adhere unto no other Interest but mine own. Were he guilty Sir, I should with all my heart do so, replied she, but since he is innocent, and the son of a great King, I think Sir, that I should do you good service in restraining you from incensing the anger of the Gods against you by destroying a Prince who did never justly offend you: For truly Timocreon, Thiettes and Acrates told no lyes, when they assured that Cleander was son unto the King of Phrigia; I my self have seen all those things, which should have justified his Birth: and moreover, I do most certainly know, that he would never have took part with your Enemies to fight against you. It seems you know very much indeed, said Cressus, and interrupted her, but though you had committed no other Crime then this, to know so exactly the secret thoughts of such a man as Cleander is, a stranger, and a Delinquent, it were enough to deserve no pardon. But Sir, said she unto him, since I cannot justify my self in your opinion, unless I justify Cleander also, and letting you see his real right and true quality, why will you not be pleased to allow me so much patience as to hear me out? Why, said he unto her, would you have me believe your words, because you have lightly given credit unto the deceiving words of Cleander? Do I not plainly see you are his Confederate in this gross Imposture, by which he would make himself the son of a King, just now when he is accused of a Crime which brings his life in danger? Where are all the convincing proofs of it? You tell me you have seen them, but you shew not one: As for this Picture which all the Court hath seen, and I my self also have seen, that argues as much as nothing, nor any thing else except the King of Phrigia's Letter: as for that, I confess, I have seen, and know his Character, and it may be of some consideration: but they will shew it seems only unto you who does not know it; and will not produce it to shew unto me, because I should discover its forgery. In a word, Cleander is unknown, and you ought to look upon him no otherwise; neither ought you to believe that I would have married you unto him, unless I had told you so my self; and if by reason of some reason in State, I should have married you to him, I know not whether or no you would have willingly obeyed <◇> : Moreover, admit Cleander were the son of a King, yet you ought not to hold any secret intelligence with him: but since he said himself to be the son of my Enemy, was it just in you to conceal it from me one minute? Might you not well suppose, that this very circumstance of Enemy was enough to prevent all alliance with him? Which way soever then I consider your actions, I find you so culpable, and in so deep a manner, that I cannot endure the sight of you: Therefore retire unto your Chamber, and obey my orders without meddling any more in the Justification. Since my own justification is inseparably linked unto his, replied she, methinks Sir your command is not just. Go (said he unto her) be gone, and answer no more: but without insisting upon your pretended innocence, go and pray unto the Gods, that they will pardon you; for my part I cannot. The Princess Palmis would have replied something, but he would not suffer her; and commanded the Lieutenant of his Guard to carry her unto her Chamber, and be responsible for her person. The Princess then seeing she could not prevail with the King her father, obeyed with tears in her eyes, and returned to her Lodging, without having the comfort of her dear Cyleneisa, with whom she might condole her misfortunes. Her Chamber becoming now a Prison, none were admitted, nor permitted to see her, no not so much as the Prince Myrsiles, because he seemed always very affectionate unto Cleander: The Princess of Classomena desired it, but was denied: Albradates endeavored very much to do her service, yet all in vain: The Prince Mexaris, though glad perhaps of these disorders, yet seemed very angry at it: The Princess Anaxilea, widow of the Prince Atis, remembering what an obstacle the Princess had heretofore been unto her marriage, shewed not much generosity: But as for Esope, he was constant, and spoke boldly unto the King, in behalf both of the Princess and Cleander: Menecus also was very generous, and spoke high, so that the King grew angry with him, and employed him no more in his Councils, expressly forbidding him to publish that Cleander was the son of a King. As for Artesilas, though he was a Lover of the Princess Palmis, yet her prison was no great grief unto him, because he hoped that this disastrous course would make her repent of her affection unto Cleander, and was in hopes to transact in her behalf so cunningly, as that she might think her self in some sort a Debtor unto him for her Liberty.

In the mean while Cleander hearing the next day by some of the Guards, that the Princess Palmis was a prisoner: all the sorrows that ever he suffered in all his life, were not comparable to his sufferings then: he saw his fortune was in a pitiful condition: for he knew certainly Page 235 that he was the son of a King, and had no power to justify himself: he appeared ungrateful and guilty towards Cressus, and was not able to produce any convincing proofs to the contrary: he was in love with the Princess, and knew she loved him again, but according to all appearances, he should never be in a condition to enjoy her, or himself: he heard she was a prisoner for the love of him; and this last consideration made so deep an impression upon his spirits, that he valued not all the rest: until then, he suffered his fetters without any desires of breaking them: but when he heard she was a prisoner, he thought upon nothing but his liberty, to the end he might release her: He desired the Guards to go unto the King, and beseech him that he might immediately dye, upon condition she might be set free, and express so many signs of real love, and in so moving a manner, that one of the Guards did offer him all his endeavours for his comfort at the least, if he could do nothing for his liberty: Cleander did accept his offer, and conjured him to go unto the Palace, there enquire very exactly, what Orders and Guards were upon the Princess, that afterwards he might judge whether there was any possibility of sending her a Letter. This officious Souldier did as Cleander desired him, and went unto the Palace; but being not so wise as well affected, some men that are ready to do any ill offices, espied him, and knowing him to be one of Cleanders Guard, did acquaint the King he was there, who did command him to be seized upon: and since he gave no good reasons for his coming to the Palace: and since information was given that he enquired what guards was kept over the Princess, they clapt him up in prison, and the King imagined there was some design to release her: so that to put her in a place which he conceived inviolable, and to send her further from Cleander, whom he would not yet put to death, as much incensed as he was against him, therefore he sent the Princess the next morning unto Ephesus, unto the Temple of Diana; appointing her who commanded the vowed Vestals there, not to let her speak unto any whosoever; causing the Companion of Cylenisa to be released; and likewise the Son of Pactias, because of his fathers fidelity, to have his liberty. This wise Princess desired to take her leave of the King, but the favour was denied her: then she desired to have Cylenisa with her; that also was not granted: so that the day following, none having the liberty to see her, she departed from Sardis, guarded by five hundred horse unto Ephesus, which was three days journeys from thence. But Madam, the way thither was of necessity behind the Garden of the Palace, and by the Cittadel, under the window where Cleander did speak with Cylenisa. It happened that this unfortunate Prince, walking in his Chamber, and contemplating his misfortunes, chanced to spy the Princess as she passed, and knew her; she also, looking up, saw him: To tell you Madam, the thoughts of these two illustrious persons at that instant, and how sad this sight was unto both, is not an easie matter. Cleander would have broke the grates: the Princess wished the Coach might go more safely, yet she made signes with her hand and her hand, to let him understand she lamented his misfortunes: and he did let her see, by his violent and disordered actions, though full of respect, how great the trouble of his soul was. Mean while the Coach went on, and they lost the sight of one another: But the Princess, as I was told afterwards, looked a long while after upon the place where Cleander was a prisoner. After this Madam, the Court of Lidia was as dull, as it was delightful before. In the mean time Artesilas did not bring his designs to pass, for he could not move Cressus, either to put Cleander to death, or call back the Princess Palmis: Cressus also knowing that the King of Phrygia was entered into his Dominions, was forced to go himself in person unto the Army: and that was one of his reasons why he sent the Princess his daughter unto Ephesus: having no mind to leave her in that place where Cleander was a prisoner: The general state of things did change faces: for you know, that the King of Assyria who had carried away the Princess Mandana, sent to solicit these two Kings who were his Allies, to enter into his Country: and in order unto that, they made a truce between themselves, and did so: going both of them to aid the King of Assyria, and to oppose the King of the Medes whom they feared, or rather indeed the valour of the illustrious Cyrus under the notion of Artamenes, who was so terrible to all Asia. The King of Phrygia notwithstanding the truce, desired that his Troops might not mingle with the Troops of Lidia. The truth is Madam, you know so well what passed in all Asia since that time, as I need not speak of them, nor of Cleander, who being still a prisoner had nothing to do amongst them: for after the King of Assyria's first defeat, Cressus out of some discontent retired and returned unto Sardis, still keeping us and the Princess prisoners. However Artesilas was not a whit more happy; since neither being able to ruine his Rival, nor see his Mistress, it may be said, that he himself was punished for their own crimes. As for Cleander he being of a very obliging disposition, he got the love of all the Guards; and so far that they Page 236 let him have the liberty to write and receive Letters, in spite of Pactias for bidding them to do so: so that he writ unto Esope, to the end he might acquaint him with all news concerning the Princess, which Esope accordingly did, though I know not which way he went to work: However Cleander, Thimettes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my self, did live most melancholy lives: and so we lived until Cressus who was restless to hear of all the prodigious victories of the Illustrious Cyrus, sent unto all the famous Oracles in the world, though I know not what he intended to enquire of, because there was no return of them, when I came from Sardis. But during the voyages of all these Embassadours who were sent to consult with the Gods, he ceased not from making great Levies; he employed divers Envoyes to several Princes; and was so busied in some great design which he had in his mind, that he thought much less of Cleander. Then Madam, to shorten my relation, I will make hast to tell you, that Cressus being gone to muster his Troops, Tegeus the son of Pactias, and Lover of Cylenisa, plotted with Meneceus: and found out ways to release us, love being predominate over all other considerations; perhaps his aims and desires were only to release Cylenisa: But Meneceus, of whom he stood in need, denying him any assistance, unless Cleander, Thimettes, Timocreon, Acrates, and my self, were released also, he consented unto it. So that one night, when I little dream'd of liberty, Tegeus, who had suborned the greatest part of Cleanders Guard, and Garrison of Pactias, entered into the Cittadel, and going unto Cleanders Chamber, he told him that he was at liberty: and afterwards coming where we were, he told us the same. That which did make the business more easie, was because Pactias was gone two days journey from Sardis: and Artesilas was with the King. Moreover Meneceus who had the Conduct of the business, had provided fifty horse ready to guard us: so that without fight or tumult we went out of the Cittadel, at the same door by which the poor Cylenisa entered. I forgot to tell you that Tegeus went not unto the Chamber of Cleander to release him, till after he had been with Cylenisa: for whom he had provided a Coach ready at the coming out of the Cittadel. However since Meneceus had many friends in Ephesus, and since besides, that it was a place where they might more easily hide themselves than any other, by reason of many strangers which resorted unto the famous Temple of Diana: and more than that, it was easie to flie away when one pleased, by reason of the Seas nearness. It was resolved to retire thither; and indeed Cleander would not go any where else, because of the Princess Palmis, and there was none that would leave him. The Governour of Ephesus was also an intimate friend of Meneceus, who though he should know him to be there, yet he did not fear that he would do either him or his friends any hurt: Then Madam, when he had gone a days journey from Sardis, we disguised our selves as well as we could, Cylenisa also with a woman which waited upon her, and would not leave her, did the same: so that we came unto Ephesus as strangers which come to visit the Temple of Diana: Meneceus also, caused those horses which guarded us to enter at several Gates, and resolved to have them always with him in case of any need of them. The first thing Cleander did, was to go about the Temple of Diana, desiring to see the place at least where the Princess was, though he could not see her. In the mean while, Madam, one chance most extraordinarily happened to the great comfort of these illustrious Lovers, which was, That she who commanded the Vestals, whose name was Agesistrata, proved to be Sister unto a Lady in Ephesus, with whom Meneceus in his younger days had been in love, and whom he should have married, if her friends had not opposed it: so that there being this obligation then between them, there continued still a great friendship between them, though they had not seen one another of a long time; Meneceus having done many considerable services towards Cressus, in behalf of her Husband, whom afterwards she married, and since was dead: Meneceus then confiding in her, and setting forth the injustice of Cressus, in that he would not suffer Cleander to clear himself, and that the Princess his daughter was sensible of his innocence, he negotiated so well with her, as she obtained of her Sister, that Cylenisa should be entertained in the Temple, and placed with the Princess, not daring to ask leave for Cleander to speak with her, for fear of being refused, and lest it should prejudice her, in lieu of serving her: you may easily imagine what joy this was unto the Princess Palmis, to see her dear Cylenisa again, and to hear Cleander was out of prison, and come unto Ephesus: though she was still very fearful he should be discovered, and taken again: But when Cylenisa told her he seldom stirr'd out, except mornings and evenings into the Temple, and that he was well disguised, she was more at quiet. 'Tis true, the liberty of Cleander did make the prison of the Princess more close, (if I may call that sacred place a prison.) For as soon as Cressus heard that Cleander was released, he sent new Orders unto Agesistrata, to take more care of the Princess Palmis, Page 237 and that she be better guarded: But since the friend of Meneceus was for us, the doubling of Guards was to no purpose: One strange and happy accident more happened, which was, that Cleander found in the house where he lodged all those things which should testifie what he was; and thus it came about: Be pleased to know that the domestique servant whom my father had trusted with all those things, and many others, seeing that his Master was a Prisoner, resolved to steal all that he had of his, and embarked for Ephesus: That he being acquainted with a servant in this house, he left with him many of those things to keep, and amongst the rest all those things which would serve to clear Cleander; declaring unto him, that if he dyed, he gave him all those things which he left in his hands, and telling him, that he durst not return until his Master were out of prison: But the truth is, he thought that Cressus would put my father to death, and then he might return to Ephesus, and enjoy the fruits of his Theft: yet since he was gone no further then the Isle of Chio, his friend heard often from him; but indeed at last he understood that he was dead, when Cleander came to lodg with his Master, who was a very good friend unto Meneceus: So that desiring to see what was given him, he looked upon all those things which my fathers servant had left unto him, and there found all those things which I told you of; and not being able to conceal his wealth out of joy that he had to possess it, he shewed the Picture unto his Masters wife, who finding some resemblance between it and Cleander, let him see it, as some extraordinary piece; so that to recover all that he had lost, he recomended him who had them, and received them again. I leave you to judge Madam, what joy this was to Cleander, in finding a Crown, when he had no hopes to enjoy it; he made the Princess Palmis acquainted with this prodigious accident: But do what could be, Meneceus could not obtain permission for Cleander to see the Princess: All that could be done was by the contrivance of Cylenisa, to convey Letters unto her, which she out of her goodness was pleased to answer. In the mean time we knew not what course to take, because Cleander would not go and make himself known unto the King his father, and leave the Princess Palmis at Ephesus; he durst not think of taking her away, though she should consent unto it, not knowing where to find any place of security for her, or whether he should be known for what he was; neither durst he make it known unto Cressus that he had found those things which would manifest what he was, understanding by a Letter from the Princess, that the quality of the King of Phrygia's son would not at all advantage him in the opinion of the King her father. Cleander being thus unresolved what course to take, he was advertised of two things in one day, which moved him unto that resolution, which I shall tell you of; the first was, that I informed him of a Cilician Ship come into the Port, in which was the King of Pontus and the Princess Mandana: the other was, that absolute Orders came from Cressus, that the Princess his daughter should enter into Orders, and take upon her the habit of a Vestal. You may imagine how much this severity of Cressus concerned Cleander, and how much it grieved the Princess Palmis, for she had no inclination unto that course. Agesistrata protested unto the Princess, that she would not receive her into Orders, though she would have her, because her will was forced, which was positively against their Customs. This being the state of things, the Princess Mandana stole away from those who watched her, and put her self into the Temple of Diana as a Sanctuary; and the King of Pontus could not get her out again, because the people would have risen against him, if he had attempted it. But Madam, she was no sooner there, but Cleander thought he had found an undoubted means to obtain an inviolable Sanctuary for his Princess, if in getting away the Princess Palmis, he could get away the Princess Mandana also, and carry her unto Ciaxares from the King of Pontus, or else in the absence of Ciaxares unto the illustrious Cyrus: For said he, If this design prosper, although the King my father who is with him, should not acknowledg me, yet the service of restoring the Princess Mandana would be acceptable to the King, that I shall obtain from Cyrus a protection for the Princess Palmis; and it may well be hoped, that the Heavens will favor so just a design, since I do only rescue an innocent Princess out of the hands of her Ravisher, to restore her unto the King her father. This Project seemed so full of Reason, were it but once executed, that neither Thimettes, Meneceus, Tegeus, my father, nor I, did at all contest concerning it. We speedily then sought out ways to execute what Cleander had imagined: We had already some men with us, but not sufficient to do it by open force; therefore policy must be the way: Meneceus did so well employ the power which he had with his ancient Mistress, that he moved her to speak unto her Sister, who is one of a great virtue, much spirit, and greater Soul: he set forth the injustice of Cressus and also the King of Pontus in such a moving manner, as he forced her to acknowledg that whosoever Page 238 could set the princess Mandana and the princess Palmis in any places of security, would do an act which would be acceptable unto the Gods. She had no sooner said so, but using her own words he told her; that it was she who was best able to do an act so generous: Yet for all this he could not move her to trust those two Princesses into his hands; But she told him, that they had a Custom amongst them, that those who were to be received into Orders, it was permitted them to go once out, to the end it might appear they came in without constraint: so that if the princess Palmis please, she may ask that favor, and carry the Princess Mandana with her at the same time; and that she would give Orders, it should be upon such a day, when the King of Pontus did not know of it; and that it should be at a back door, where no strict Guard was kept, because it was never almost open; and then if they would consent unto it, they might trust themselves with Cleander. After this, having obtained leave to speak unto Cylenisa and Cylenisa having prepared the mind of the princess Palmis, and she the princess Mandana, which two had contracted a great league of friendship in a few days, it was resolved, that the princess Palmis should feign obedience unto the will of the King her father; and that according to the custom she should ask to go out, accompanied with Mandana, and her women; that within three paces of the Temple there should be a Coach ready for the Princesses; That Cleander, Meneceus, Timocreon, Tegeus, and their men, should guard them to the next Port; where a Barque should be ready to wait them unto Phrigia, and from thence they should come by Land hither: So that when I came away, the Barque was ready, and all things fitted for execution of the design, which in all likely hood took effect: That which would more facilitate the enterprize was, the King of Pontus was hurt with the fall of a horse in his thigh, in going from the old Town unto the new, where the Temple of Diana stands: So that though their flight be noised about, yet he was not able to follow, for he was in great pain, and kept his bed. The princess Palmis desired Cleander to promise her by Letter, that he would let her continue always with the princess Mandana, until he had made his peace with Cressus, and until he had made himself known unto the King of Phrigia. However, to go more surely to work, Meneceus moved Cleander to send Thimettes, Acrates, and my self, to the King his father, with all things requisite, to manifest he was his son, and to prepare him for his better reception; also to acquaint the illustrious Cyrus with that service which the generous Cleander would render him, thereby to merit his protection. I had forgot to tell you, that whilst we were at Ephesus, Thimettes heard accidentally that his friends had made his peace with the King his Master, so that present[ing] himself unto him without fear, that Prince no sooner saw him, but he received him with many expressions of tenderness. But when after this he had told him all the story which I have told you, and shewed him the Picture, the Letters, and all other things concerning that business; and when that Prince had read his own Letter, and the Note from his dear Elsimena, whose hand he knew at first sight, he apprehended so much joy and so much sorrow both together, that his Soul could not determine which of those two passions to choose. Since it was I who had the honour to relate the story, which he harkened unto with extream attention, I was the Witness of this pleasing irresolution: but after that his joy of having a son, and a son so illustrious, had a little mitigated his sorrows for the loss of his dear Elsimena, he desired to see Acrates, who by his generous repentance did easily obtain his pardon. The King had a mind to compare this Picture with that which he always kept, and which was made at the same time; and looking upon that Note which Elsimena writ, he knew the hand so perfectly, that he doubted not at all who was the Writer; but expressed a hundred signs of gratitude and acknowledgment unto Thimettes and me; and being full of impatience to acquaint the illustrious Cyrus with this welcome news, he went immediately unto him, and commanded me to follow, leaving Thimettes and Acrates at liberty to rest themselves. So Madam, I hope that within this two or three days they will receive certain news, that this great Enterprize has a happy proceeding.

Sosicles having ended his Relation, the Princess Araminta thanked him for the pains he took in speaking so long together, and composing the Method of this extraordinary History in so neat and elegant a manner. Cyrus for his part gave him most obliging language: after which Sosicles withdrew; and then, Sir, said the Princess Araminta unto Cyrus, can it be expected you should be so highly generous, as to promise me, that when the Gods have restored the Princess Mandana unto you, you will not look upon the King my Brother as your Rival? Yes, replied he, and I will promise you more than that, since I will promise you to serve him, whether Page 239 he will or no, as his Friend, which I am resolved to be, and to restore him the Crown of Pontus: As for the Crown of Bithinia, said he, and smiled, I must let it alone in the hands of Arsamones, to the end that the prince Spitridates may hereafter give it unto you. As they were thus in discourse, the King of Phrigia entered, unto whom the princess Araminta expressed her joys, that he had found a son so illustrious; and then calling to mind the most considerable passages of his life, they could not enough admire at the wonderful providence of the Gods in all things. For my part, said the King of Phrigia as oft as I remember my aver <...> inclination to this War against Cressus, <◇> cannot doubt but that the Gods did secretly advertise me, that I ought not to do it: however, if I can but be so happy as to see my Son restore the Princess Mandana unto the illustrious Cyrus, I ask no more at the hands of Heaven. That happiness is too great for me, said Cyrus and sighed, and I never can hope for it. But yet you may very well hope it (replied the Princess Araminta) for according to the Relation of Sosicles the thing seems to be out of doubt. When I was at Sinope, replied Cyrus, he who should then have told me, that I should not have released the Princess Mandana, I should not have believed him: and when I took Babylon, I could not imagine she should possibly get out. Then after a while of such discourse as this, since it was late, Cyrus took his leave of the Princess Araminta, and returned to the Camp with the King of Phrigia, and with a mind divided between hopes and fears, and absolutely taken up with thoughts of his dear Princess; having also appointed Arsames before to let the Queen of Susiana know, that he was sorry she found her self not well, and commanding him again to have all imaginable care of her.

ARTAMENES, OR CYRUS the GREAT. The Fourth Part. BOOK. II.

NEver did hopes flatter miserable men with more pleasing minutes; nor ever did fears infuse more cruel torments, then these two contrary passions did procure unto Cyrus, and the King of Assyria: Mandana Released, or Mandana a Captive, was the whole business of their minds; and according as these did present themselves unto their imaginations, so were they either sad or glad; though both of them had always a mixture of displeasure amongst their highest satisfaction, to think that though she be at liberty, yet it was not by their assistance: yet since she was to receive this good office from a Prince who was not yet their Rival, the thought of it did not lessen their joys; and sometimes, not doubting but ere long they should bless their eyes with a sight of their Princess, they both of them began to think of vanquishing one another by combate, according to agreement. Three days, thus passed on; during which time, Cyrus discoursed often with Sosicles, because he had seen his Princess at Ephesus; and during which time also, the King of Phrygia entertained Thimettes and Acrates with much satisfaction by reason of the hope which they had given him to see in the face of Cleander so perfect a resemblance of his dear Elsimena, that he could not possibly doubt, but that he was his Son. The Princess Araminta also was full of joys and hopes, believing that since the King her Brother had Mandana no longer in his power, he would become a friend unto that Prince who offered to set upon his Throne: and so she might one day be in a happier condition then ever. The Queen of Susiana, though a Captive, and not very well in health, had yet the comfort to be served with the same respect, as if she were at Susa: for Araspes was punctual in the observation of Cyrus his commands, and was very assiduous and observant of that fair and wise Queen, whom Cyrus much honoured, and grieved he could not after see her: When those three days were thus passed, Timocreon arrived, and sought for his son Sosicles, to understand from him; how the King of Phragia had received those things which Thimettes, and he had <◇> unto him: after he understood the truth of all, he went unto the King of Phrygia's Tent, into which Cyrus entered; presently after, Thimettes who met him, had presented him unto the King of Phrygia: so that this Prince no sooner saw Cyrus, but addressing himself, Sir, said he unto him, this is that Timocreon who preserved my Son; and who brings us news of what we so much desire to know; but I know not whether it be good or bad, because he is but newly come. Questionless, the news is but bad for me, replied Cyrus, for I do not look to be so happy as to hear the Princess Mandana is at liberty. 'Tis true, Sir, she is not at Page 241 liberty, replied Timocreon: but it is not long of the illustrious Cleander that she is not: since he has done things most difficult to bring it to pass: and had it not been for one misfortune which we could not foresee, doubtless the Princess Mandana, and the Princess Palmis, both had been at liberty.

Tell us, however, replied perplexed Cyrus, how fortune did hinder our happiness. Sir, answered Timocreon, since I understand by Thimettes, you know all passages, since his departure from Ephesus, I shall relate nothing what has already been told, but I do assure you, never was business better managed then it: for when Agesistrata had advertised Meneceus of the day on which the Princess Palmis was to come out; and the Princess Mandana was to follow her, with two women who waited upon her, and one upon the Princess of Lidia: Meneceus made the Barque ready, whereof he was assured: the fifty men which we had in the Town, lying in Ambuscado, at all the avenues by which one could come unto that Gate, out of which the Princesses were to come; besides these, above thirty friends of Meneceus joyned with Cleander, who kept himself in the head of twelve or fifteen only: for all were divided into little Troops, least those which passed should suspect any thing: he placed himself as near as he could unto the door of the Temple, having a Coach there to carry the Princesses unto the Sea, which was not far off, and where the Barque waited. Since there was none but Centinels stood in that place, because it was a door out of which seldom any did come, that could be no hinderance in the Enterprise; and without killing them, it was an easie matter to secure them without being perceived by the nearest Court of Guard: Thus Sir, all things being rightly ordered to execute our design; the Barque ready, the Coach come, all our men placed, at all the avenues unto the Temple: Cleander waited for the opening of the door: and the business came so far that the door did open; and I saw the Princess Palmis, who caused another Lady of an admirable beauty to pass before her, whom I supposed to be the Princess Mandana: and I did but see her; for as these Princesses were coming out, and we advancing to receive her, there came out of a house close by two hundred men in Arms, in the head of whom was the Prince Artesilas: you may imagine how Cleander was surprized (who looked for no other resistance but from the King of Pontus) when he saw Artesilas in the head of them, whom he thought had been with Cressus. But though the wonder of Cleander was great, yet that of Artesilas was no less to see Cleander with a Sword in his hand, standing between him, and the door of the Temple: However, as soon as the Princess Palmis spied Artesilas, she went back, and carried the Princess Mandana with her: The door of the Temple was shut in an instant: so that Cleander not being able to release his Princess, nor Artesilas carry her away, as he designed; these two Rivals went one to the other with as much fury as their passions were violent; they spoke one to another, but I think were not understood. In the mean time, all our men, who were dispersed into several parties, gathering together about Cleander, who thought our selves in a condition not only to resist Artesilas, but also to overcome him; and Cleander fought with so much courage, that he killed his Rival with his own hand, and many more: so that after the death of this Prince, the rest of his men dispersed themselves, and vanished in a moment: so that if they had opened the Gate of the Temple again the very same hour, we had released the Princesses: we knocked at the door, but I think the noise was so great, that the women durst not open it: presently, all the King of Pontus his men, and all those belonging to the Governour of Ephesus, came up to us; and we were so surrounded with a multitude, that it is an absolute miracle to see we are escaped; for Cleander could not resolve to save himself by the Barque which waited for us, but would still be near the Gate of the Temple; yet in the end, seeing an absolute impossibility to resist such a multitude, and thinking he had received a wound in the right hand, resolved to retreat fighting until we came to the Barque, unto which we entered in spite of all those who pursued us, and made all haste away: for they threw many Darts at us, and we kept them off us with our Lances: But when we were out of their reach, we looked whether the wound of Cleander was considerable, and found it to be more troublesom, then dangerous: Afterwards we mustered to see whether we had all our men, and except ten or twelve Souldiers whom we had out of Ephesus, and those would not imbarque with us, we lost not a man: but making a strict search, I found amongst us a servant belonging unto Artesilas, who in this tumult chose rather to enter into our Barck, then to fall into the hands of the Ephesian Governour: I no sooner saw him, but I knew him, and when I shewed him unto Cleander, Sir, said he unto him, I beg your pardon for seeking Sanctuary unto you. Friend, said Cleander to him, my hatred to thy Master is dead with him, and shall not revive to hurt thee; but however tell us, by what strange accident we met Page 242 to day, Sir, replied this man, none can tell you better then my self what the design of that Prince whom I served, was; so I have had but too much knowledge of his secrets, since the flight of the Prince Antaleon.

And then, since he thought to merit much from Cleander, by defaming his Master, in lieu of answering to what was asked, he told us that which we asked not; and related unto us, how the Prince Artesilas was of that odious Conspiracy with the Prince Antaleon: not but that we knew it already, in going between Sardis and Ephesus; but he related it unto us more exactly: Afterwards, he told us, that this Prince knowing of the Orders which Cressus had sent unto Agesistrata, by which he appointed the Princess his daughter to take upon her the habit of a Vestal, he became so desperate, that since he had committed so many Crimes in vain, he was resolved to venture upon one more, which would be profitable unto him: so that his plot was to carry away the Princess; and in order to that, he left the King upon some pretence or other, and disguised himself and his men in habit of Paisants, and kept them in that house out of which you saw us sally, the Master of which had heretofore been his servant: He told us further, that Artasilas resolved to wait there until that door of the Temple was open, and then to seize upon the princess Palmis, and carry her unto a Ship which he had provided ready, with intention that if the door of the Temple did not open within six days, then to force it in the night, and execute his design, as he would now have done, if he had not been prevented. So that we collected thus much from the discourse of this man, that Cleander, at least, preserved the Princess from being carried away by Artasilas, whom the Gods by his own hands did punish for being in such a horrid Conspiracy, as that of the prince Antaleon was. In the mean time, night drawing on, we went to lodge in a little Village, where we caused Cleanders wound to be dressed, and also three or four Souldiers more, who had been wounded also, and whom we left there with men to have a care of them. Afterwards, quitting the Sea, and taking horses, which we expected to wait for us in that Town, and which we sent thither, in case our enterprise should fail, we are come hither; we stayed two days by the way, by reason we sent to know some news of the Princess; and we understood by a man whom Melneceus sent unto his friend, that the Guards were now extremely much more strict about the Temple, and that there was no possibility of attempting any thing in the like manner again. And Agesistrata herself was resolved to favor the going out of the Princesses no more; she conceiving that this sad accident did manifest the Gods were not pleased at her connivance at it before; yet we understood at the same time, that the princess Palmis was fully resolved not to do what the King her father appointed; and Agesistrata sent word unto the King, that she could not receive her: We also understand, that the princess Mandana and she are resolved; and have promised not to part from each other, until better fortunes did smile upon them: In conclusion Sir, Meneceus and I, after we knew thus, waited upon Cleander hither. After Timocreon had done speaking, Cyrus, as sad as he was, did testify unto the King of Phrigia, that he was much obliged unto his son, for what he had done concerning the princess Mandana; desiring a pardon, for not being so sensible of joy at the receiving of his son, as he should have expressed any other time: Not but that I conceive my self interested (said he) in what relates to you; but the truth is, as long as Mandana is Captive, I am not capable of any joy whatsoever. As he would have gone out, the King of Assyria came in; who came to enquire what news Timocreon had brought, for he had heard he was come: But as soon as Cyrus saw him, and being impatient to have him grieved as well as himself; Your hopes are broken, said he, as well as mine, and our Princess is more captive then ever, as you may understand by Timocreon. The King of Assyria drawing nearer him, caused him to repeat all that he had told unto Cyrus, who was gone unto his Tent to lament his misfortunes with more liberty. He sent one notwithstanding to Cleander, to assure him from him, that he should find a most inviolable Sanctuary with him, and desired that he himself might have the honour to present him unto the King his father: And after he had spent two hours in considering the obstinacy of his fate, and had sent to acquaint the princess Araminta with this ill success, one came to tell him, that Cleander, Meneceus and Tegeus were arrived: Making then a truce with his sorrows for a while, or to say better, shutting them up in his heart, to welcome a Prince, whose reputation was so high, he commanded they should enter, and he himself went to meet him. This first Congratulation passed very well on both sides: And as doubtless Cleander was as handsome a man as was in the world, and of as good a carriage, Dyrus was charmed with him at the first sight, and one might see them look upon one another with so many signs of admiration in their eyes, that it was easie to foresee they would love one another most tenderly. I am very unfortunate Page 243 Sir (said Cleander unto him, holding his arm in a Scarf by reason of the wound he received at Ephesus) that I am forced to appear before you, having failed in that service which I designed to do you. It is rather my part to complain, replied Cyrus, since I fear my misfortune is contagious, and is a cause of yours. I have more cause of fears and sorrows then you, answered Cleander, when I apprehend my misfortunes may chance follow me in your Army. I know not, replied Cyrus, whether your bad fortunes will follow, but I am sure high Fame goes before you; and the name of Illustrious Cleander has been long known unto me, so that I am in love with his glory and honour; in love, I say, most pure, without any envy or jealousy. Happy Lovers, replied Cleander smiling, are never jealous; and they who possess honour, and deserve it, as the most illustrious Cyrus does, will easily permit others to love it also; yet Sir, at this time, I shall desire nothing but the honour to serve you. You are so loaded with honours and glory, replied Cyrus, that you have no reason to wish more then you have; yet give me leave to oppose your desire of it at this time, since I am already so much obliged unto you, that I must needs endeavour to pay unto the Prince Artamas, that debt which I owe unto the illustrious Cleander. I have so little merited the first of those names, replied he, that I dare hardly take it upon me, though the King my father should appoint it. Then I must go and move him to command you by his absolute Authority, replied Cyrus: and so he carried Cleander unto the Tent of the King his father; and presenting him, Receive here with joy Sir, said he unto him, a Prince who is worthy to be your son, and deserves more Crowns, then Fortune, as prodigal as sometimes she is, knows how to give. The King of Phrigia would have observed the same ceremonious respects which he was used to render unto Cyrus; but that Prince being desirous he should embrace Cleander, and natural affection being stronger then all rules of Civility, he embraced him with unimaginable delight: for as soon as he perceived Cleander, he saw so perfect a resemblance of his dearer Elsimena, that he changed colour, so that his heart as well as eyes and reason telling him that he was really his son, he received him with all the testimonies of a dear affection which a generous father could express unto an illustrious son. Sir, said Cleander unto him, can you acknowledge me for your son, after that which I have had the misfortune to do against you? Yes, replied the King of Phrigia, and smiled; and it is most advantageous for me to do so, otherwise I must acknowledge you to be my Conqueror. If your goodness can pardon me this Crime, answered he, I beseech you let it be no more remembered. It is a Crime so glorious, said Cyrus, that I make a question whether or no the King your father does wish it had never been committed: for as you are a Debtor unto him for your life, so, as he hath told me, you preserved his in this last War: However Cleander, if you will disclaim from what you have already done against the King of Phrigia, I shall oblige him to remember nothing but what the Prince Artamas shall do in the future. I conjure you Sir, replied he. I command you, said the King of Phrigia (if I may command in the presence of one whom I will ever obey) that you prefer the interests of the illustrious Cyrus before your own. This is a Command so unjust (replyed the invincible Prince of Persia) that I will not give Prince Artamas time to answer it: And I declare unto him before you, that I desire no more from him, but what I will render unto him first, that is, a firm friendship: so that amidst my misfortunes I may have the happiness of finding an illustrious Friend the same day the King of Phrigia finds an illustrious Son.

The King of Phrigia, and the Prince Artamas (whom we will no longer call Cleander) answered Cyrus with all possible civility; and since this Conference had continued something long, the King of Phrigia grew impatient to talk with his Son in private; and therefore they retired: Yet in their passing, the King of Phrigia carried him unto the King of Assyria, and unto the King of Hircania, who received him very civilly; the first of these not daring to testify that secret discontent which he always had against the King of Phrigia. In the mean while all the Princess and men of Quality in the Army came to visit the prince Artamas, who doubtless would have thought himself extremely happy, if his love of the princess Palmis had not tormented him. Cyrus then seeing no hopes of releasing Mandana but by force, called a Council of War the day following; where the prince Artamas took his place with much honour, speaking unto every thing which was proposed with as much spirit and judgment, as if a long experience had fortified his Reason; and it plainly appeared, that he who I <> to conquer betimes, is exact in the knowledge of things, when others who have not that experience are ignorant in them; and that it is not impossible, but that a young Conqueror may be more able then an old Captain, who hath not seen so much as he, though lived longer. The Result Page 244 of this Council was, that since the season of the year was far spent, and Cressus had attempted nothing, to send unto him, and demand the princess Mandana, before any open War was declared. The prince Artamas insisted most upon this resolution, because he could not forget his obligations unto Cressus, notwithstanding the ill usage he had from him: and he used all his Rhetorique to persuade Cyrus unto a trial of all fair means before course was had unto the last Remedy of War. Cyrus had much repugnancy to that Resolution, alledging for reason his ill success of sending into Armenia, and his repentance in sending. But he was answered, that the cases were not alike, since the King of Lidia could not deny, that the princess Mandana was in his Dominions, and therefore he must needs answer directly. Moreover, it was further objected, that it was impossible to besiege Ephesus considering the season of the year, and also considering he had no strength at Sea, therefore the attempt seemed to be unreasonable: especially since if Cressus would protect the Ravisher of Mandana, he must have a more plausible pretence for the War in the eyes of the people. However Cyrus desired that Feraulas might return before he sent unto Cressus, yet fearing he might stay too long, he resolved that Hidaspes should go thither within two or three days; and in the mean time that the Army should advance, and march through part of Phrigia, and enter into Lidia that way, if the Answer of Cressus was not satisfactory.

In the interim, he had intelligence that Abradates was gone unto Sardis; and he acquainted the Queen his wife with this news, who seemed to be very angry at it; yet he went to visit her, and told her very obligingly, that he was very sorry the King of Susiana would not rather release her by becoming his Friend, then vainly endeavoring to do it by declaring himself his Enemy, though he assured her she should still be treated with the same respect. This great Queen thanked him with Civility answerable to his Generosity: And she commended Araspes so exceedingly, that Cyrus at the going out of her Chamber told him, that he could not please him better, then in pleasing Panthea. From thence he went unto the Princess Araminta, who desired him to contrive it so, that she might go and speak with her Brother: So that it was resolved she should advance towards the Frontiers of Lidia; and that the Queen of Susiana should go this voyage with her, these two Princesses having contracted a great amity one with the other: So that it was to be hoped this Queen might perhaps be serviceable unto her, since the King her husband was in the Enemies Country. This Resolution being pitched upon, and approved of by the King of Assyria, Cyrus returned to the Camp; and as soon as he came there, Feraulas was returned, and also the man whom the King of Assyria had sent: but both of them related, that it was a thing impossible for them to convey a Letter unto the Princess Mandana: They would have made a full relation of the whole state of things, but understanding that all had been related before they came, they forbore: yet they did relate how the Town and Temple were at this present strictly guarded; how not only all the Souldiers were in Arms, but a great part of the Townsmen also; how they had sent again unto Cressus for new Orders; how the King of Pontus recovered; how a Prophecy of the Hellespontique Sibbil, which none could interpret, made a great noise about the Town, since it would admit of a double interpretation; how this woman was admirable in Prophecies, and seldom was mistaken in the event; how all the Town of Ephesus knew not whether to rejoice or mourn, because this Prophecy promised either great good fortune, or menaced very great misery unto it. Feraulas and the other man said, they endeavored both of them to procure this Prophecy, but could not possibly obtain it; for being strangers and importunate, it could not be gotten: So that their voyages thriving no better, nor effecting any thing but vexation to their Masters, they durst hardly look upon them: Cyrus did treat Feraulas never the worse; but the King of Assyria being of a more violent composition, could not believe but that the fault was in him he sent: Cyrus then seeing the return of Feraulas was ineffectual, he was ready to dispatch Hidaspes, when he received intelligence that Cresus at the return of his Embassadors from the Oracles had declared himself, and done the first act of Hostility against Ciaxares: This news saved Hidaspes a Journey, and hastened the march of the Army, which the next morning began to move.

The Princess Araminta fearing lest those first occasions of war should prove fatal to her Brother, moved the Queen of Susiana to begin their journey, and haste unto the Frontiers, that she might speak with the King her Brother, before he fell into the hands of Cyrus: So that Araspes by orders for that Prince, guarded them unto a Town of Phrygia, towards Lidia, where the Army of Cyrus was to quarter, and where by consequence they might be in safety.

Page 245 Cyrus dispatched a messenger unto Ciaxares to acquaint him with all things; and received news from Thrasibulus, which assured him in general, that he was in great hopes to be happy, both in his war and love. Afterwards marching as fast as it was possible, an Army of above an hundred thousand men should march towards the enemy, the weather and ways were so very bad, and marches so long, that it was not expedient either to besiege places, nor give battles: so that Cressus who desired no more then to have the glory of the first onset, did block up himself so advantageously, that it was not possible for Cyrus to give the first Assault, nor hinder him from putting his Troops in their Winter quarters. So that all which was to be done, was only to make some incursions into the enemies Country, and skirmish, which did so exceedingly vex Cyrus, that he stood in need of all his constancy to support his excessive sorrow, he could not wonder enough at the proceedings of Cressus; who had begun a war at such a time: and could not chuse but think, that he was prompted to follow such military Policies, so contrary to all reason, by such evil destinies as would ruine him. Sometimes he resolved to disguise himself, and go into Ephesus, to see if all attempts to release the Princess were as difficult, as they were reported: Sometimes again he would go and force the Lidians in their encrenched quarters, notwithstanding the ill weather, but when he considered, that though he should do so; yet he had not released Mandana, but still the King of Pontus might carry her away from Elphesus; then he hearkened unto reason, and resolved to wait, until there was some more probability of good success in the war. However being much discontented with the uncertainty of his fortune, though he never had any desire to enquire what success the future would produce, yet hearing the Hellespontique Sibbel cried up with so many Elogies, he resolved to send unto her; and indeed, sent Ortalques with orders to enquire when he might hope for any rest; and to bring back her answer in waiting under her hand. At this time Araminta put him in mind of his word, and his desires concurring with hers, he dispatched Adusius to the King of Pontus, to desire him he would obtain liberty from Cressus to speak with the Princess Araminta, who much desired to confer with him upon some important business. That Prince received Adusius very civilly; and sent unto Sardis to obtain that favour from Cressus, which was granted unto him. The King of Pontus then, and Adusius agreed, that their meeting should be in the Temple, which was a days journey from Ephesus, having only five hundred horse apiece for their Guards. Adusius had orders to enquire of Mandana's health: and by the information of Meneceus he understood she was very well but he could not possibly speak unto her: He being returned to the Camp and the day when this meeting should be being set down, Adusius who had negotiated before, did guard her; Araspes was excused, and Araminta desired that the Prince Phraartes might not accompany her, as he desired. Before her departure, Cyrus and the King of Assyria did visit her, and furnished with such instructions, as such an important business could inspire them withall. As Cyrus was there the first, he had the opportunity to tell her, that she might assure the King of Pontus, that he would engage his honour to remember all his obligations, and that he would promise to restore him his Crown, if he would restore the Princess Mandana: Moreover Cyrus, let this Princess understand that he would most firmly engage himself to be a Protectour unto Spitridates, if she should negotiate well for him in this business: but she interrupting Cyrus, Sir, said she unto him, I beseech you, do not mingle my interests with yours, and let me have the honour to negotiate that which concerns the illustrious Cyrus, and the King of Pontus, my Brother. Cyrus was about to answer her, when the King of Assyria came into the Princess Araminta's Chamber: and adding his prayers with the prayers of his Rival, they conjured her to transact her best in that negotiation: Both these Princes conducted her some two hundred paces from the Army, after she had bid adieu unto the Queen of Susiana, who was exceedingly grieved to part from her, though it was but for a short time. The King of Pontus also prepared himself for this parley, and came unto the Temple according to the appointment between him and Adusius; he arrived there some two hours before the Princess his Sister. Since they had not seen one another, since the loss of their Dominions, this meeting did revive the memory of their misfortunes in both their minds. As soon as the Princess came, she was carried into a great Arched Hall, where commonly they used to keep their Feasts at extraordinary Sacrifices, which for the magnificence of the structure, and beauty of the furniture, did well become the meeting of two such illustrious persons: After the King of Pontus had saluted her with many expressions of tender affection, they did sit down, and all the Company withdrew.

Is it possible Sir, said she unto him, that after all these unfortunate disasters I should have the happiness to see you again? The condition wherein you see me, answered he, is so miserable, Page 246 that I make a question whether this meeting will grieve or comfort you; and whether that which you take for a happiness be only some device of Fortune to make us more miserable. Indeed, dear Sister, to what purpose is this interview, unless to make you grieve at my miseries, as I do at yours? You may easily conceive by what I say, that I am not now the same Prince who condemned in you that innocent affection which you had, and I believe still have unto the Prince Spitridates: His virtue and my own passion have taught me not to censure Love so severely: The truth is, I was much to blame to condemn that in another which is so predominate in my self: for since I saw you, I have lost Battels, I have lost my Liberty, I have lost Crowns and Kingdoms; yet for all these, before I complain against Fortune, I must complain against Love. Sir, said she unto him, you are in this much to be blamed and pitied, since if you can but overcome this passion, you may yet be happy. Ah Sister, said he, I should not know how to love, if I should imagine there can be any other happiness in the world but in being loved by the Princess Mandana: But however, I beseech you tell me what Considerations did move such earnest desires in you to see me? was it only out of your tenderness, and natural affection? or was it to pity me, and your self? or else does it relate unto some Interest of Spitridates, or Cyrus, or your own, or mine? I beseech you acquaint me with your real design, that I may the better know in what manner to speak unto you. Sir, said she unto him, though all these Considerations which you have named may claim some share in my design to see you; yet, to speak sincerely, it is your own Interest which most induced me unto it: for Sir, I must tell you, it is only your own fault if you be not happy, and if you do not one of the most heroic Acts that <...> ever was done: Certainly, said he, I am a very great Lover of honour; and provided that I must not quit the Princess Mandana in acquiring it, I shall do any thing in the world you will propose unto me. Sir, said the Princess Araminta, Mandana does not love you, nor ever will. 'Tis true, said he, but as long as she is in my power, her affection shall never make any of my Rivals happy. Do you not consider Sir, answered she, that by making your Rivals miserable, you make her you love so also, and that you augment your own misfortunes so much the more? For I have authority to tell you, that if you could resolve upon so much <...> q <...> y as to render up a Princess who loves you not unto Cyrus who only hath her heart, and unto whom you are a Debtor for your life, he would in exchange restore you a Crown, which in all probability you never will get without him; since it is not ordinary to find Protectors who will conquer Kingdoms, and render them unto those they protect. Sister, said that Prince and sighed, I do verily believe that Cyrus would do as much as he says, for I know his generosity better than you, and before you knew him: But though I do esteem this illustrious Rival as much and more than ever I did; and though notwithstanding my love, I am very sensible of my obligations to him for using you so well since he had you in his power; and also though I do confess, I owe my life unto him; yet for all this Cyrus is not the same to the King of Pontus that Artamenes was. But Sir, this Artamenes, said the Princess, whom you loved so tenderly, was then not only on your Enemies side, but also got Victories from you, and also opposed your Love, and yet though he did dispute with you for the glory, and won so many Battels from you, still you loved him, and acquainted him with those Conspiracies which were plotted against his life; and commanded that none should fight against him: Since that Sir, he restored you your Liberty, he rendered back what he had conquered in your Dominions, and gave you Forces to suppress those who rebelled against you; and now he offers you a Kingdom, upon condition you will restore Mandana, whose love is impossible to be obtained by you. All this you say Sister, replied he, I confess is full of Reason, and if I had more Ambition than Love, or to express my self better, if my Love were not stronger than my Reason, certainly I ought, in point of Generosity, of Policy, and Ambition, harken unto this Proposition you make: But in that condition which my Soul is, it is impossible for me so much as to think of it; and I wonder how the Princess Araminta can imagine, that any one can so easily part with what one loves, she, I say, who is so just as to love a Prince whose father was a declared Enemy of my house. Sir, replied she and blushed, Spitridates loved Araminta, but Mandana never loved nor never will love the King of Pontus. If I should love that Princess, replied he, because she loves me, then my love would cease when she ceased loving: but since the foundation of my love is because she is the most amiable in the world, I shall eternally love her, though she never love me: Had I then known, when I had the good fortune to save her life at Sea, that Artamenes was Cyrus, and that Cyrus was my Rival, perhaps, as the temper of my mind was then, I should have restored her unto him: I was then so newly cast out of a Throne, that I thought no Prince could live without it: But now since Page 247 the charms of the Princess Mandana have enchanted my heart, and am unaccustomed unto Sovereignty, Love has quite abolished Ambition out of my Soul; and if I could pass away all the days of my life with this incomparable Princess, though it were in some desert Isle, where neither Sovereign nor Subject did inhabit, I should esteem my self most happy. Come not then to increase my miseries by awakening a passion, which one more strong than it hath cast into a sleep, and which, if disturbed by such Propositions as these, would but augment my misery. But Sir, replied the Princess of Pontus, what can you ever hope for by detaining her? Could I but hope for any thing, answered he, I should not be so miserable as I am; but I do profess unto you, that I can hope for nothing by it, and do expect every day one misfortune after another: Yet you may assure Cyrus, in answer unto his generosity, as far as I am able, that when I first did understand I was his Rival, I grieved as much at it, as I did at the loss of two Crowns: But since it is Injustice to desire things impossible, oblige him, I entreat you, not to accuse me of ingratitude, in not rendering up the Princess Mandana unto him, for I loved her before he knew her, and shall love her till death. Had I any thing in my power, said he and sighed, which I could offer him by way of Ransom, I should with joy present that any thing unto him: But dear Sister, since Fortune hath deprived me of all, and left me nothing but Mandana in my power, I beseech you pardon me if I do not redeem your Liberty by my own Ruine: You are in the hands of a generous Conqueror, and I do not fear he will revenge the Injustice I do unto him, upon you; and to excuse me in what I do, consider I beseech you what Love hath moved Spitridates unto: he, for your particular interest, hath left his Father, refused Crowns, and wanders unknown throughout the world; he hath done more for you, than I have done for Mandana: Therefore, my dear Sister, pity me, and do not persuade me unto any impossibilities, which I cannot do.

But Sir, said she unto him, I did not hate Spitridates, as Mandana hates you: Moreover, if there were any apparent probability, that you keep this Princess for any advantage, I should not so much oppose your design, but pity you for the misfortunes which she is the cause of; yet considering the state of things, I am full persuaded, that all the power of Cressus will sink, and that you with her will sink under it: for do but call to mind all the prodigious Acts which Artamenes and which Cyrus hath done, and you will find the number of his Victories so many, and his Conquests so great, that they cannot be remembered without wonder; and can you think the Gods did raise him unto that height, only to cast him down? Has Fortune, contrary to her Custom, followed him so constantly, purposely to forsake him afterwards? to forsake him whose Power doth every day increase, and seems to hold the destiny of all Asia in his hand: So that plainly foreseeing you will love Mandana, were it not much better then to restore her, and gain a Kingdom by it, then to ruin your self by keeping her, and at length lose her too?

Doubtless it had, replied he, if I were able to do it; but since it is not in my power, I must not so much as think of it any more; therefore Sister, I beseech you, discourse no more upon this Subject: for if any upon Earth could persuade me to restore Mandana, it should be Mandana her self: and since I have denied her Tears and her Prayers, pardon me Sister, if I deny your Proposition with abundance of ease, and it is not so difficult to deny a Crown, as it is to deny Liberty unto one who is adored: This divine Princess hath offered me a thing more precious than a Crown, since she hath offered me her friendship, if I would give her Liberty: Judg therefore, if after this I can harken unto your Propositions from Cyrus. But Sister, I beseech you, do me the favour as not to let my Rival know how constant the Princess Mandana is unto him: but doubtless he is already sufficiently persuaded of it, and there is no need that I my self should confirm him in a truth so advantageous unto him: Use not my own words to make that Prince whom I ought to hate more than I do, to hate me; for really I do esteem him so much, that sometimes I curse my Fortune for forcing me to be his Enemy, since I owe him my life: you may assure him from me, that if the dispute were about nothing but a Crown, I would lay it at his feet, yes and my honour also, which is a thing more dear unto me: but as for Mandana, absolutely I cannot do it: Moreover Sister, the power of Cressus is not so inconsiderable as you imagine it. The King of Assyria, said she and interrupted him, was much more puissant than he, and he subdued him. Cressus, said he, is stronger than the King of Assyria was, because more united; and since his endeavors are to prevent Cyrus from lording it over all Asia, our Souldiers fighting for their Country and Liberty, are no less exasperated then my self, who fights for Mandana.

Page 248 The Princess Araminta, seeing she could not prevail with the King her Brother, could not restrain her tears, and began to adde her prayers unto her reasons, but both to no purpose, for she was compelled to part from him without obtaining her desired end: she perceived that he was something ashamed to be so unjust and ungrateful towards Cyrus whom he esteemed so much, and unto whom he was so great a debtor: yet love was more predominant then his reason, and rul'd his soul which was sensible of nothing but that passion. The Sacrificers of that Temple prepared a very magnificent Collation for the Princess Araminta: But she only looked upon it, and thanked them, for her soul was so sad that she could not eat: she departed from thence, and went to lie in a Castle, some fifty furlongs from thence: The parting was very sad, for this Princess imagining, that perhaps she should never see the King her Brother again, or if she did, it would be as a prisoner, and vanquished, she could restrain her tears. Hesionida, who saw into her thoughts, wept as well as she: and the King of Pontus himself seemed much dejected as soon as he had put her into the Coach; and turning himself towards Adusius, Tell your Illustrious Master, said he unto him, it is not the Princess Araminta's fault that I do not satisfie him; nor is it long of my own reason, which tells me, I ought to do it: But tell him, generous Adusius, it is only the Princess Mandana, whom he must accuse for my crime: yet assure him, that I shall dispute with him for her, with so much carriage, that though I be overcome, it will be without shame, since my death and my defeat will not be unworthy of my Princess, and my Conquerour. Adusius promising to obey him, the Coach went on; and the King of Pontus taking horse, the Princess returned towards the Camp, and the King her Brother towards Ephesus, with both their minds filled with various thoughts, but all melancholy.

Cyrus, and the King of Assyria, during the absence of Araminta, had many a restless thought, for their hopes were not strong enough to make them think that this meeting would procure the liberty of Mandana: since though the King of Pontus would have consented, yet Cressus perhaps would not: But since fears and hopes are the life of Lovers, they feared and they hoped, successively one after another. The day in which the Princess Araminta was expected back, being come, they went to meet her; many persons of quality, amongst the rest, the Prince Phraortes did follow then. These two Illustrious Rivals, riding alone some distance before the rest, after a while of silence, and transported with their passions, began to discourse. Can you believe, said the King of Assyria unto Cyrus, that our Rival will so much as hearken unto the Princess Araminta? Since I know him to be affable and civil, said Cyrus, I am confident he will lend her a hearing. But since I knew him to be in love, said the King of Assyria, I am confident he will refuse the proposition which you make him: at the least, I am certain, that though you should offer to restore unto me Babylon, and all my Dominions, which are more considerable than the Kingdom of Pontus; and though I were certain to be vanquished in the Combat which we are to fight, I had rather die in keeping Mandana, than mount the Throne, by parting with her unto you. This thought, replied Cyrus, is worthy of your self, and of the Princess whom we adore, and speaks so much violent affection, as it must needs be concluded after this, that they who maintain love is the cause of love again, are much deceived; since if it were so, the Princess Mandana should have divided hearts, being so infinitely loved and adored as she is, both by the King of Assyria, the King of Pontus, and the unhappy Cyrus: for Sir, said he, and looked upon his Rival, since you are able to refuse one Crown, rather than part with Mandana, I would lose an hundred, if I had them, and assume as many sitters as I quitted Scepters, rather then alter my thoughts of her. As they were thus in discourse, they espied the horses, and immediately after, the Coach of the Princess Araminta: and riding before the rest, they went to meet her: The Coach staying they lighted from their horses, and came towards her with beating hearts; yet they no sooner saw her put up her hood, but they perceived by her eyes that her negotiation had not taken effect; and knew by the first word she spoke, that they had more reason to fear than hope: yet both of them did most civilly thank her, especially Cyrus who having no mind to stay her any longer in that place, told her, that they should have better conveniency to acknowledge their obligations unto her at her own lodging: she had a great mind to have them with her in the Coach, but there were so many women, that it could not be, therefore these Princes took horse, and went with her unto her lodging, whither the Queen of Susiana came, being conducted by Araspes, who almost never left her. When they were come thither, this wise Princess told them what she could not conceal, that the King her Brother would not restore the Princess Mandana: but she expressed her self with so much prudence, and such good language, that Page 249 she did rather lessen, then augment their resentments against the King of Pontus her Brother, Adusius acquainted Cyrus as he lighted from his horse, with what that Prince did charge him withall: who out of his respects unto the Princess Araminta, seemed not transported with it, but said, I am extremely sorry, that I am thus constrained to be an enemy unto so great a Prince, yet notwithstanding Madam, I promise you, that though the fortune of Arms does favour me, yet I will not employ the power of a Conquerour against him any further, then shall only concern the interest of the Princess Mandana: and do here declare unto you, that he shall never be further captive, then as the Princess Mandana makes him: that hand which hath offered him a Crown, shall never fetter him. But the King of Assyria, who was naturally of a more violent temper, had much ado to contain himself; and could not chuse, for all his respects unto Araminta, but cast our such sharp language as contained many menaces, and much anger. After this, Cyrus, and the King of Assyria withdrew, and Phraortes only, when all the Company was gone, continued his visit.

Since the return of this Princess Cyrus did so bestir himself, that though Winter was not yet past, he began to annoy his enemies: Not a day did pass wherein he did not send out some skirmishing parties, and sometimes went out himself. He received intelligence upon intelligence from all parts; and employed his time in informing himself how Mandana did: what forces Cressus had, which way his designs aimed; how he might cross them, and by what means he might release his Princess: he gave orders for all necessaries fitting for a great Siege, not knowing whether he should be put unto it: he dispatched away towards Thrasibulus, for provision of a Fleet, in case he was to besiege Ephesus. But as the Spring time of the year was near, he received such news as much joyed him, which was, That Cressus hearing fame speak loud in behalf of Artamas, whom he knew by the name of Cleander, That he was really the King of Phrygia's Son, and so acknowledge, he resolved to recal the Princess his daughter unto Sardis, and to bring the Princess Mandana with her, as thinking that a place of greater security then Ephesus. This news was wondrous welcome unto Cyrus, as well because Mandana would be far from Sea, as because he had hopes to release her in the way as she came: As Artamas was very well acquainted with that Country, so he told him, that he knew an infallible way to place an ambush in a Wood, close by the way, where they must of necessity pass in going from Ephesus to Sardis, which their enemies could not possibly avoid, and where in all likelihood he might intercept and release the Princesses. So that their only business was to be informed of the certain time when they would set out of Ephesus, and what number their Convoy consisted of: Feraulas was dispatched thither with Letters from Meneceus unto his friends there. Timocreon sent also to Sardis, so did Tegeus, to the end they might every way receive intelligence, and not be mistaken. This fresh hope put such an impression of joy into the heart and eyes of Cyrus, that he seemed more fresh and lovely then ever; his conversation being now not so melancholy as before, it did exceedingly delight the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess Araminta: as for the last of which, the condition of the King of Pontus, the absence of Spiritides, and the Courtship of the Prince Phraortes, all these considerations did procure her many angry hours. Panthea also was not without her share of sorrows, yet the civilities of Cyrus, his pleasant addresses, and his spirit, did often times suspend them; for he endeavoured as much as possible he could to make their captivities less tedious unto them.

Whilst this was the State of Affairs, and whilst all Asia was in Arms, waiting for nothing, but until the Sun had dried up the field of battle, and produced fresh palmes to crown the Conquerour: Cyrus, being full of pleasant impatience since he hoped ere long to release Mandana, and acquire new glory, saw Artaban arrive, whom Ciaxares had sent unto him; and who informed him, that all Medea was in peace, that Ciaxares was in health, and that he would send Aglatidas back unto him with fresh supplies. At the name of Aglatidas, Cyrus embraced Artaban, and enquired very earnestly how he did; Sir, said Artaban unto him, I have orders from him to relate unto you the sequel of his history, which is no less full of admiration, then that part you know already was extraordinary: It is Megabises then, replied Cyrus, who disturbs his happiness. It is in vain Sir, replied he, for you to guess at his adventures, for they are so strange that it is impossible they should be imagined. However, since Artaban seemed very weary, Cyrus would then keep him no longer from his rest, but deferred the relation of it until the next day. And in the mean time he managed his time so well, and took such orders for all things that were necessary, as the next day he came Page 250 unto Artaban, with intention to hear this Story. Since Cyrus and he were alone, Artaban put that Prince in memory of Arbates and his Cheat; of Aglatidas and his Jealousie in seeing Megabises and Amestris together in the Garden; of his Despair and Exile; of his sained Passion unto Anatisa at his return; of the sorrows which this feigned Passion caused in Amestris, because she thought it real: how she knew Aglatidas was jealous, but knew not of whom; of the odd Resolution she took to justify her self in his opinion, by marrying Otthanus, of whom she was certain he was not jealous, nor could be; of her Marriage; of her, and his own Despair, when they knew their reciprocal innocence; and also their last parting. After a short Revival of all these passages, Cyrus turning himself towards Artaban, I do very well remember them all, said he unto him, the misfortunes of my friends do not so easily slip out of my memory; and therefore I pray you satisfy my Curiosity, and relate all that concerns Aglatidas: Then Artaban obeying his Commands, began thus.

The Sequel of the History of AGLATIDAS and AMESTRIS.

For your better understanding the Story of Aglatidas, and the accidents happened unto him since his return into Medea, I must acquaint you Sir with the Adventures of Amestris since her Marriage with Otthanus, and since that sad separation of Aglatidas and her, wherein both Love and Virtue did eminently appear, and reside both at a time in the heart of Amestris. But that you may judge of her sufferings, it is requisite I should make a particular description of the person, humor and spirit of Otthanus: for since it was Aglatidas who spoke of him unto you at Sinope, and since I know him to be as wise and reserved a man as lives, doubtless he would not aggravate his faults. Imagine then Otthanus to be very tall, but far from handsome; of a sullen, fierce and subtle aspect, and an unpleasing and forced action, of a rude and boarish conversation: with these qualities imagine him to be of as much spirit and courage as ever any had: So that if an art could have been found out to have separated the good qualities of Otthanus from his bad, there was enough to be found in him to have sufficiently furnished a compleat man, and also a very Monster: However, since that spirit which he had was of a turbulent and restless temper, it had been better both for himself and for Amestris, if he had been a dull Blockhead, as I shall hereafter let you know; for if he had been so, he had not so much tormented himself, nor persecuted her. You may remember Sir, how suddenly he became happy, by reason of the odd humor in that fair Lady: his happiness was so great, that at the first he thought upon nothing else, but of enjoying her he loved: and so solely devoted his heart unto joy, as I believe he did not observe the melancholy of Amestris on the marriage day; and I think it was a long time after, before he began to take any notice whether she was pleasant or discontented. The truth is, his good fortune seemed to be as great as possible, for he had married with her own consent, the fairest, the most virtuous, and the richest Lady in all Ecbatane, who in her own choice preferred him before all the compleat Gallants of the Court: Moreover, the two Rivals who were most to be feared, were out of Town, to wit, Aglatidas and Megabises; so that consider his felicity in that respect, it could not but be imagined very great: Also, he was so excessively sensible of it for a while, that he spoke of nothing else: and whilst Amestris was weeping in secret with her dear Menasta, Otthanus was publishing his joy unto all the world. This prudent Lady was so wise as to hide her discontents from her husband: But since it was an intolerable torment, to be always in a constrained mode, she shunned the company of all others as much as she could, and forced her self only in the presence of Otthanus. She always delighted in solitude more then company; and Otthanus did seem far from any jealousy: But after the first edge of his joy was taken off, and he returned unto his accustomed dull humor, he began to consider, among the rest of his sullen musings, what reason Amestris had, after she had so long a time treated him rigorously, to change upon a sudden, and make him happy: he resolved to ask her the reason of her sudden alteration; he pressed her very earnestly to tell him her reasons, why she hated him, and why she loved him: for said he unto her, I am certain the change was not in me, but your self.

This unexpected Question did so surprize Amestris, that she blushed, and gave him ◇◇ satisfactory Page 251 answer: yet she told him, that as long as her Father lived, the disposition of her self was in him; and after his death she was resolved to marry according to her own affection; but she spoke this with so much disorder in her countenance, that Otthanus changed colour as well as she: Then urging her no further, he went to walk by himself, as one of my intimate friends, who was also a friend of his, did tell me, and revealed all his secrets unto me: But oh Heavens, what odd phantastical thoughts did come into his mind during this walk? and how severely did he punish himself with his own capricious phancy? Then he called to mind all the severity which Amestris expressed towards him: he remembered all her scornings of him, and the great difference which she made between him and Aglatidas or Megabises, and did not forget any act which this fair and virtuous Lady did either in contempt of him, or in advantage unto any of his Rivals. However (said he, after a memory of all these things) I am the Enjoyer of Amestris, and all my Rivals, which in appearance were then more happy, were yet really more unfortunate: What then would I have? said he; and what do I want to compleat my happiness? Then would he walk a while in a more calm temper: and thinking he had settled himself in more tranquility of mind, he gave over the thought of these things, and began to delight himself in the variety of flowers which grew in the Garden where he walked: he quitted that shady melancholy walk which he made choice of at first, and took one of a more open ay; but notwithstanding the enamelled beauty and variety of flowers, as soon as he had changed places, he began to make comparisons betwixt himself and his Rivals, and he could find no reason in the world why Amestris should make choice of him before them: and though it be the custom of all the world to flatter themselves, and seldom to do Justice when they are their own Judges; yet Otthanus in this business did censure himself with all severity possible; he concluded then, that Amestris ought not to have made choice of him, since she had no prepossessed opinion of him, or affection to him, as he knew she had not: For (said he) the very day before my happiness she was intolerably incensed against me, I never found her more cruel or uncivil towards me in her life then that day, and the next morning the fit took her to marry me, and did so, though I could never conceive any Reason why she should think of so much happiness for me: But what matter is it which way our good fortune comes, so we enjoy it? Amestris is mine, and all my Rivals go without her; nor is there any likelihood they ever had any shares in her heart, since she made not choice of any amongst them, as if she had pleased she might have done, but preferred one whom they loved not before them all: Yet for all this, said he, Amestris did not love me two days before she married me; and I am most certain I used neither any charms nor enchantments to change her heart; nor did I so much as ask that favour from the hands of Heaven, because I saw so little probability of obtaining it, yet upon a sudden I became happy and—Then he stayed a while, and went no further: Afterwards repenting him|self of what he had said, and what he thought to have said; But am I very well assured that I am happy? and is it not so that I have only changed misfortunes? And indeed Ottanus (as my friend, whose name was Artemon, of whom I already spoke, since told me) after he had well examined the matter, and sufficiently tormented himself, could never resolve with him|self whether he was happy or unhappy; but he went home very reserved and melancholy: He resolved to get the mastery of his mind, and wrestle with those thoughts which disturbed his good fortune; and indeed for some certain days did endeavor to be contented. As for Amestris, her thoughts were as far from any calm serenity, as the spirit of Ottanus was; and she thought her self the most miserable woman upon Earth, especially since she knew the in|nocency of Aglatidas: for before that, though she had an extream aversion towards Otta|nus, yet she had some consolation in her hopes to undeceive Aglatidas in the opinion he had of her, and if he were once undeceived, then had she cruelly revenged her self upon him: But as the state of things were, knowing that if she had not married Ottanus, she might have been happy, and Aglatidas contented, she suffered unconceiveable torment of mind: she could find no consolation in condemning him who was the cause of her sufferings, nor in any thing else but condemning her self. However, Aglatidas at parting having sent a Letter unto Menasta to give unto Amestris, she quitted her self very faithfully, and gave it unto her though with much ado to move her unto a reception of it: For since Amestris was as virtuous as fair, she conceived it something against the Rules of Virtue to receive any expressions of love from Aglatidas; yet after Menasta promised her it should be the last she should be troubled with, she read it; and this was the Contents:

The miserable AGLATIDAS unto the unfortunate AMESTRIS.

I Can never consent to go far from you before I have asked Pardon for being a cause of your sorrows: I would I were able, for your tranquillities sake, to wish you would absolutely forget me; but I do confess my weakness, and acknow|ledg that I cannot be so generous; but on the contrary, I desire that the remem|brance of my constant Passion may be the greatest torment of your life. As for mine, I do promise you it shall be so miserable, that unless you be the most unhumane woman in the world, you will have so much goodness as to let me know you pity me, lest I should dye with despair.

AGLATIDAS.

After Amestris had read this Letter with tears in her eyes, though she refused to receive it at the first, yet she kept it at the last, and would not give it again unto Menasta: and talking together concerning the crossness of these accidents, Menasta told her, that since things past and done cannot be recalled and undone, the best way was to make the best of things one could, and to comfort ones self. Ah Menasta, said Amestris, how difficult is this counsel to be practised? and how hard a matter is it to find any comfort, when one is forced to see him continually whom one hates, and never to see him one loves? and I assure you, that since the time Aglatidas did justify himself in my opinion, the aversion which I ever had towards Ottanus is so much augmented, as I cannot tell which is the greater torment, never to see Aglatidas, or continually to see Ottanus: for when I do not see Ottanus, I have but the moyety of my misery, because then I think very often upon Aglatidas without any remem|brance of Ottanus: But as for Ottanus, I do confess my dear Menasta with shame, that I never look upon him but I think upon Aglatidas, and at the same time look upon Ottanus as the only obstacle of my felicity, and likewise the felicity of Aglatidas: I use my best endeavors to choak such thoughts, but cannot hinder them: Ottanus never does any act, or speaks one word, that pleaseth me, and which does not make me remember, how Aglatidas was wont to tell me of a hundred thousand pleasant things: However, though I cannot be Mistress over the secret motions of my heart, yet I strive to set the best face I can upon them in his presence; and knowing that since he is my Husband, both the Gods, and Vertue, and Decency, do all require my obedience unto him, and that I be complacential towards him, this duty and complacency I do pay; but it is with such a horrible repugnancy, and by doing such ex|traordinary violence to my self, that I wonder it doth not cost me both my Reason and my Life.

But, said Menasta unto her, the only way to find rest and remedy, is to divert your self sometimes, and see the world as heretofore you have done: for when you are in company, and walking abroad in the conversation of wits, and pleasant men, you would less think upon either Aglatidas or Ottanus, since the noise and tumult of the world does at the least take up the mind, if not divert it, the variety of men which one shall see; news, walks, wit, musique and discourse will insensibly expel melancholy, and make one delight in company. Those who use these Remedies, replied Amestris, do certainly complain but of common sorrows: but they who use such as I do, do know Menasta, that all these things which you propound unto me as Remedies, are so far from that, as they are multiplications of miseries: and indeed, how do you think I can care for dressing my self as I was accustomed, when I desire to please none, and when all the world displeaseth me? How can I endure to be perpetually in the conversation of men, who would but importune me, and grieve me more in lieu of comforting me? You know that all I can see, are either Friends or Enemies unto Aglatidas: So that the same which you think would make me forget him, will revive the re|membrance of him: Should I go unto any Balls, considering the humor I am in, they would be so far from diverting me, that I do not think I should know so much as the difference of Page 253 Tunes: Musique would but make my heart more heavy in lieu of easing it: As for News, which you prescribe as a remedy, since it pleaseth none but a certain sort of men, who love to busie themselves in things which concerns them not, it cannot by consequence delight me, since I never think upon any thing but what concerns my self, and never cares for the rest: Let it therefore be concluded Menasta, that solitary walks is the only recreation I can take; and not upon the banks of Orontes, where none walk but such as would only see and be seen: Certainly I should see nothing there that would please me; and if I should do so, perhaps Ot|tanus (to augment my misery if it were possible) would become jealous of me. But then, said Menasta, how do you intend to live? I intend to live, replied she, as one that would quickly dye. This Resolution, replied Menasta, is most lamentable, however I beseech you do not banish me from your Company. Ah my dear Menasta, said Amestris, I cannot have such a thought: but since you cannot be much in my company, unless you banish your self from the rest of the world, I ought to deprive my self of my only consolation, which is your company.

Menasta then made new Protestations of friendship unto her, and so they parted; but yet Amestris was as good as her word, and lived a most retired life: And though it be the custom of new married people to be most gay, and more expensive at that time, then any other of their lives, yet she on the contrary was more negligent of her self then ever, she faign|ed her self not well, to the end she might avoyd all places of pleasure; she never made any visits, but such as were of absolute and obliging necessity; nor would permit any to visit her; so that she who of all the Court was most visited and courted, became the most solitary, and least frequented: she was so early every morning at the Temple, that not only all the Ladies, but all the Gallants of Ec|batan were asleep when she was there: So that never Husband had more reason to be at rest then Ottanus; and the way of living which Amestris used, was certainly enough to have satisfied the most jealous Lover in the world: Yet Sir, all these An|tidotes against that Poyson, was so far from satisfying him, that they augmented his malady, as the like was never heard: Yet notwithstanding at the first, he was glad of that which did so much torment him afterwards; and thought, that to have a fair wife whom none saw but himself, was no mean happiness: But yet this reservedness of Amestris did make so great a noise in the world, that nothing else was talked on; and since it was observed, that neither she nor Aglatidas were to be seen, none could understand the real cause of it; but they thought that Amestris lived in that manner, because Ottanus was jealous, and had com|manded her so to do: so that he had a hundred curses every day, for causing so fair a Lady to live so miserable a life: and since no Subject is so fit an An|vile to forge a hundred thousand extravagant Tales upon, as a jealous Husband; Ottanus was the mark that every wit and tongue did shoot at; and in less then eight days, long Histories were made of his Jealousie: In so much as Artemon, of whom I spoke before, who was his Friend and Cousin, resolved to acquaint him with the voyce of the people, thinking to do a good office both unto him and Amestris: and though he knew the spirit of Ottanus to be very odd, and that the busi|ness it self was something difficult to tell, yet he resolved upon it, and one day went unto him: After a while of talk upon things indifferent, he asked how Amestris did; and as he answered she was very well, Artemon told him all her Friends complain that they can never see her, or to speak more sincerely, said he unto him, They complain against you, for they suppose she would not forsake them but by orders from you: Then did he acquaint him with some reports of him, yet concealing the bitter part of them: Ottanus was amazed at the discourse of Artemon, and seriously protested unto him, that he never desired Amestris should so retire from company, but that her reservedness was voluntary, and proceeded from her self only. No, no, said Artemon, you cannot perswade me to beleieve it; but since you know I am your Friend, you may very well make an ingenious Confession of your weakness unto me: after you have done so, I shall say you have a mind to satisfie the world: But to make me beleieve, that Amestris, who all her life lived in the company of compleat men, and de|lighted her self with variety of Recreations, should change her course the very next day after her Marriage, unless you had commanded her, or at the least unless she knew that living so would please you; this, I say, is a thing which I cannot beleieve. I do protest unto you, said Ottanus to him, that I am no cause at all of her alteration: And I do protest unto you, said Artemon, that I do not beleieve you; yet to speak sincerely and plainly unto you, think Page 254Ottanus, that Amestris is yet too young to begin so severe a course of living; and I have heard many say, that a Husband who is jealous without cause, may afterwards have cause to be so, and thank himself for it: I know the virtue of Amestris is so great, that you are not in any danger of such a misery: but for all that, there is no great pleasure to be taken in being the common talk of the world; and the more vertuous a wife is, the more foolish the Husband is, and more tales are told, if he be jealous: Therefore, if you will take my advice, be not so; or if you needs must be, at the least hide it handsomly: A Lover, I do confess, may be jealous without dishonour; and seldom is love long without some sparks of it: yet a Husband cannot seem to be so, but he exposeth himself to be the mock of all the world: I know it is some injustice to excuse the one, and condemn the other; but since it is grown to be the universal opinion of the world, you cannot alter it; therefore alter your self, if you can.

Ottanus seeing he could not perswade Artemon to believe him, and being vexed to the soul that such tales should be commonly told of him, he carried Artemon whether he would or no unto the Chamber of Amestris, to ask her before him, whether ever he did so much as seem to desire, she should retire her self from the world: Artemon thinking Amestris would perhaps be pleased, if he could contribute any thing that might cause an alteration in her life, went with him. As soon as they entered, seeing she was alone in her Closet: I pray, Madam, speak, said Ottanus to her, whether ever I desired you to forbear any visits, or to go any more unto Walks, or Balls: Did I ever forbid you any handsom dress, or refuse any com|pany that ever came unto you? or did I ever bid you go unto the Temple by break of day? as it is reported over all Ec|batan? Sir, answered Amestris, and blushed, I cannot think these are any who have such an ill opinion either of you or me, as to say any such thing: Ask Ar|temon, replied he, who will tell you, that because you are more solitary then heretofore you used to be, it is said that I am jealous. I had rather, answered Amestris, they should say, you are jealous, and that I obey you, then say I go to Balls and Walks against your Commands. But since it befits me to justify you, Know Artemon, (said she, and turned towards him) that this change which is observed in me, is not properly a change, since it was always my nat|ural inclination, which I was forced to hide as long as Artambares and Hermanista lived, because they were not so indulgent towards me as Ottanus is, who suffering me to be Mistress of my own will, I can now live without any forcing my self, as before I did: It must needs be confessed, replied Artemon, and smiled, that if you did force your inclination, you did dissemble it admirably well: but however, (said he further, thinking to please Ame|stris whom he much esteemed) since you did hereto|fore force your disposition to obey a father in exposing your self unto the view of the world: doubtless you can do no less now to preserve the honour of a husband, who is accused of much injustice. I do not think (said A|me|stris much puzzled) that ever Ottanus will be perswaded by such ill grounded reports: for I have seen none since he was married of whom he can be jealous, and therefore I hope, that in spite of all malicious Rumours, he will permit me the freedom to prefer the tranquility of my Closet, before the tumult of the Court, of which I am weary. Then I beseech you, tell me (said Artemon, who imagined that Amestris spoke so only to please Ottanus) what you would have me answer unto those who ask me how you live, and what you do? You may tell them, replied she, that sometimes I read, sometimes I employ my self in works of gold and silver, sometimes I limb, and draw pictures; and sometimes I enjoy my solitude in remembr[ing] all the follies of many men, who think themselves very wise, and are not so. Whilst Amestris was thus talking, Ottanus walked up and down, and said nothing; and observing that she was angry at what Artemon had said unto her, Madam, said he, I hope you will no refuse to justifie me, and my honour in the opinion of the world; therefore I do conjure you to look upon it, and vindicate me: for I cannot endure to be any longer accused for keeping you up as a prisoner.

Sir, said she unto him, if you let your felicity depend upon the opinion of others, I think myself in an ill condition; and if I should expose my self unto the world again, I know not whether the same men that unjustly report you to be jealous, will not report me to be too gallant and free, therefore it is much better not to run the hazard of that danger. Then some came into the Closet, who had business with Ottanus, so that he could not make a reply un[to] Amestris: but he went out, and Artemon with him, leaving her alone in much wonder Page 255 at the passage. Menasta came to her presently after; and observing some disorders in her looks, What's the matter, said she unto her, since yesterday when I left you? I am so angry, replied Amestris, that I can hardly tell you the cause of it; for truly Menasta, excepting your self, I had but one comfort in the world, which was my solitude, and which I thought I should have enjoyed quietly until my death, yet they will deprive me of that: then she related unto her the whole passage: But Menasta, said she, it is true, that all the world reports Ottanus to be jealous? It is certain, answered she, that such a rumour runs about the Town, and more certain, that I never went about to undeceive them who reports it, because as long as they believe that to be the cause of your retiredness, they would never look after the true cause; and consequently, never find it out. And why, said Amestris, did you not acquaint me with these things? Because I saw you so sad, answered Menasta, that I scrupled whether I should tell such unpleasant news: yet since you do know it, I wish it may be a means to restore you again unto your friends. No, no, answered Amestris, deceive not your self, for I shall never do so; and were it for no other reason, but the having such a Husband as Ottanus is, I will never see them again; but Menasta, I shall have further cause not to love him; for he will by all means expose me to the view of the world. For my part, said Menasta, I do not think that Ottanus did press you unto it so much as you think; and he would never have spoke as he did, but because Artemon was present: however, for your diversion a little, let me tell you, that Anatisa hearing of your marriage with Ottanus in the Countrey where she is, is rapt into a little Heaven of joy: and makes no question but her own marriage would be next with Aglatidas, as soon as she came to Ecbatan: but afterwards hearing that he was vanished, and had settled all his Affairs, as one that would not return again, her sorrows were as great as her joyes were before: and since Tatlers do seldom get love either from such as themselves, or others, every one had a vie in disadvantage of Anatisa, who did so crack of her affection unto Aglatidas before, and of her anger against him now, that I believe she will never be able to make any great Conquests, though perhaps she will endeavour to repair her loss by hopes of some other victory. Amestris did hearken unto Menasta with some delight, because the anger of Anatisa, did evidently prove the fidelity of Aglatidas: for though she fully resolved never to see him again, yet she had a secret design in the root of her heart, to love him as long as she lived.

Mean while, after Artemon was parted from Ottanus, and Ottanus had dispatched his business with those who came to speak with him, he was alone with his own thoughts, and calling all these passages into his memory, which before tormented him, he found his soul in a worse condition then before: and that which at the first, afforded him some minuts of tranquility, was now a perpetual turbulency unto him. For (said he to himself, as he related afterwards) from whence should this sudden alteration in the humour of Amestris proceed? What may be her reason to leave hating me? why should she begin to hate all the world? which way should I find out the true cause of all this? After he had restlessly reasoned upon it, and that which Artemon told him, sticking in his stomach, he spoke unto Amestris at night, and conjured her, not to neglect her self so much, but to make some visits: yet as she refused it, though with much respect, so his mind became much exasperated; and he very roughly mov[ed] her to dress her self, and to walk abroad, and frequent Balls, and all other places, whither a jealous and angry Husband would have forbid his wife: Insomuch as she told him, that she would do all she could to obey him; and in order to that, she dressed her self the next morning more handsomly then ordinary, and went unto the Temple at the same time which other Ladies used, but yet it was with so much melancholy in her eyes, that she infused no joy in[to] any of those friends which saw her: and as ill luck was, two or three persons having seen her so sad, and afterward meeting with Ottanus, told him, that they would ask no more why Amestris was so long unseen, since it appeared by her face she had been sick. But Ottanus, knowing that she had not been so, did conclude, that there was some secret matter in her mind which was the cause of it, and which he could not discover. Amestris yet was less solitary for three or four days, but with so much forcing of her self that she was not able to endure it any longer: for if she saw any friends of Aglatidas, her soul was in a very hell: if they were indifferent men she met with, they gave her some such touch concerning the pretended jealousy of Ottanus, as did not please her; or if they were any of the discreeter sort of people, they entertained her with discourses so opposite to her present humour, that they were extremely troublesom to her: if any compleat man was commended, then the image of Aglatidas app[ea]red in her fancy: if any was blamed, then the thoughts of Ottanus would direct her eyes: Page 256 She thought all those that looked upon her, did blame her for marrying Ottanus: So having lived three or four days thus, and not being able to endure it longer, she faigned to be sick, that so she might not go abroad, nor receive any more visits. But since she could not deceive Ottanus so easily, as she could the world, who saw her not, his torments did double upon him; and not knowing what he would have, he endured all the pangs of a jealous man, and much more then common jealousy could infuse: for they who are jealous have at the least some ground for it, though he could not so much as imagine what the cause of his torments was: And not being able to contain all his turbulent cogitations within the compass of his own heart, he discovered all his secrets unto Artemon; who after he had observed the Raptures, the Reasons and Complaints of his Cousin, could not determine what his malady was: for said he unto him, It cannot be said you are jealous, since there is no imaginable reason for it; for Amestris neither sees nor will be seen by any: Amestris, when she was free, made choyce of you, and married you, what would you have more? I would gladly know, said he, why upon a sudden she resolved to marry me; and why upon a sudden she will not look upon the world.

I do confess, said Artemon, that the last of these is very strange unto me, since you assure me it is not long of you: yet however, it concerns us who have lost her, to complain of that, and not you, since you see her oftner, and discourse more freely with her. Not at all, replied Ottanus, for she perswades me to live as I was accustomed to do; and that I should allow of her alteration: I know very well that heretofore she did not hate Aglatidas, but there has been such jars between them since that, as I cannot conclude any thi[ng] upon it. But why should you torment your self, said Artemon, since your wife desires not to see Aglatidas more then any other, and indeed cannot see him, since he is absent. The reason why she lives thus (replied he, after a little study upon it) is perhaps because he is absent. And why did she marry you, replied Artemon, if she loved Aglatidas? That is it which I know not, said he, but gladly would know her reason for it. Aglatidas, replied Artemon, is indeed a very gallant man, but he is so inconstant, that I cannot think he ever had any share in the heart of Amestris: The pitiful Complaints which Anatisa makes against him, does sufficiently argue his inconsistency. How, said Ottanus, do Aglatidas and Anatisa jar? Yes, answered Artemon, and that extremely. Ah Artemon, said Ottanus, this which you have told me, does much more perplex me. I do not see any cause you have, replied Artemon; Aglatidas when you married Amestris, did love Anatisa, as every one thought; since then he has cast her off, and gone away, and what does all this concern you? I cannot untangle my thoughts, answered he, but I wish Aglatidas had continued yet in love with Anatisa. So would she too, answered Artemon and laughed, but since he is glad with a pretence to break with her, why should it offend Ottanus? Then having a mind to chide him after such a manner as should not make him angry; Well Ottanus, said he unto him, I pray resolve me, are you Jealous, or are you only Phantastical? I know not well what I am, replied he; but I am most certain my mind is most unquiet; and I find all symptoms of Jealousie in my self. Then this is the first time, answered Artemon, that ever a Wife made her Husband jealous, by neglecting her self, by never going abroad, nor seeing any body, and by hiding her beauty with as much care as others take to shew it. Therefore I am the more to be pityed, replied Ottanus, for I see no remedy for my misery: If Amestris had a gadding mind of going unto Balls, and I disliked it, then I could hinder her from going any more; but as the disease is, I know not where to find a Remedy.

If you will follow my advice, said Artemon unto him, you shall never seek for any, since certainly small diseases do commonly grow greater by remedies. My disease, replied he, is none of those which can be called small. Truly, said Artemon, I know not how you should term it a great one. Can a greater be imagined, replied Ottanus, then to see the same which should have been my chief felicity, become my greatest misery? But why are you not happy? replied Artemon, is not Amestris most fair? is she not richer then any of her quality? has she not as much wit as riches and beauty? and has she not much more Virtue then either wit, beauty, or riches, altogether? is she not affable and complacential unto you? what then would you have more? I would see, replied he, into the very bottom of her heart; and see if there be no secret there, which she has not already told. What, replied Artemon, what would you have her tell? I would have her tell me (replied Ottanus, half angry) a likely lye, rather then tell me nothing.

Page 257 Artemon seeing Ottanus begin to be angry, would incense him no further, lest he should deprive himself of means to be serviceable unto Amestris for the future: for though he was his Cousin, yet it was his generosity which made him his friend, and which side to take, either hers or his was no Question, since Reason would not allow him to take the part of Ottanus. However, conceiving it requisite to hold some hand of complacencie with him, he ask'd him whether he would have him speak unto Amestris: but the commendations which Ottanus gave of her, would not permit Ottanus to give that Commission: for he was of such a humour, as he could not, without anger, heare his wife extolled, nor I think could he endure to heare any speak in her dispraise. Artemon, not being able to regulate his minde, went away, and left him to champ upon his owne sullen, and melancholly humour; yet he was no sooner gone, but the minde of Ottanus altered; and as it is usual with unquiet and jealous spirits, he writ an intreating Letter unto him, desiring him to see Amestris the next day, and endeavour to discover the bottom of her soule: the Letter did contradict it selfe in two or three severall places, and it was easily perceived, that the minde of him who writ it was not at rest. Artemon failed not to doe as Ottanus desired him, who in the mean time had given orders, that they should let him enter, though Amestris said she was not well, and would see no body. When he came to her, he asked her pardon for interrupting her solitude; and really desiring to doe her service, he did not keep the conference which he had with Ottanus, as a secret: but on the contrary, he truly told her the state of her husbands minde, to the end she might contrive some wayes how to cure him, lest his restlesse disposition should reflect upon herselfe: Since Ottanus had rather you should tell a handsom lye, than tell nothing at all, I beseech you invent one, and such a one as may cause quietnesse, both to him, and your selfe, if it be so that there be any secret truth in your heart, which you would not have him know. I am much oblig'd unto you, reply'd Amestris, for your expressions of sincerity towards me: yet generous Artemon I have nothing to tell him, which I have not already told him: my humor, it is true, is changed, but I cannot tell the reason of it; yet since in changing it is for the advantage of Ottanus, what does he complain of? Look for no reason of his complaints, reply'd Artemon, for he has none; though Madam, I am forced to confesse your retirednesse is very strange: and it is not strange that Ottanus should wonder at that which does astonish all the Court and Towne: Yet since I am not so full of Curiosities as he, but being very full of reall respects unto you, I will believe that all you doe is well; nor doe I desire to penetrate into the secrets of your heart. But in the name of the Gods, Madam, if you can tell Ottanus something which may satisfie him; and if it be possible, be not so devoted unto solitude. I am able but to doe the one halfe of what you desire me, said she un[to] him, which is, to shew my selfe unto the world a little more then I doe: But as for inventing any lyes, and telling them unto Ottanus, is a thing I cannot doe: for I should tell them so scurvily that he would never believe me: yet Artemon, let me tell you, that in following your Counsell, I shall expose my selfe unto much misery, it being more the likely, that since Ottanus is jealous, and knowes not of whome, and at a time when my Closet is my Prison, and when I see no body, he will be much more when I haunt company. Yet however, since it is the pleasure of the Gods, hee should become my Husband, it is my duty to follow his will, and to force my owne: you may assure him that I will be observant unto him in all things, and shall please him in this, so he will promise, that as soon as ever he repents of his desire I should frequent the world, he will do me the favour to tell me of it; for I make no question but it will be very shortly: after]wards Artemon assured Amestris that he would be ready to serve her in all things, and he went to carry this newes unto Oltanus; who was something better satisfied than before: but yet he was not fully contented, because she would not tell him her reason why shee married him so suddenly, nor why she began to affect solitude as soon as married: yet finding so much obedience in the heart of Amestris, all his fantastickall humours could not finde out a reasonable pretence of complaint against her.

Thus did Amestris, though with extreame repugnance, suffer her self to be seen again, and within four dayes, the noise being divulged about the Towne, that she was visible, all the Court and Town came to visit her; and though she was much more melancholy then here[to]fore, yet since she could not chuse but be very faire and sp[ri]ghtly, and sweet and civill, there was an universall joy throughout all Ecbatan, for finding an inestimable Jewel which was thought to be lost: There was not a Wit about the whole Court and Town, which had Page 258 not invented some diversion for her & who were not very forward to testify some marks of that esteeme they held of her: It might well be said, that some magnetique beauty was newly come to towne, who by her secret charmes attracted all about her: all other houses were desarts and solitary places in comparison of hers. Those who had any designs to please her, did not arrive at their desired ends; for shee thought her selfe so miserable, in living continually a forced life, that shee could not chuse but complaine of it unto her deare Menasta. Anatisa, amongst the rest, came to visite her with other Ladyes, and as there is alwayes in the world, a sort of indiscreet men, who take as much delight in talking of angry subjects, as others doe in pleasing; there was a man amongst them, who having a mind to perplex these two Ladyes, began to talk before them concerning Aglatidas, and his absence, asking aloud, whether any knew the cause? Amestris and Anatisa both began to blush; one out of anger, the other out of modesty: and since the question was addressed rather unto Amestris, than any else, she answered, that it was so long since Aglatidas went from Ecbatan, that shee knew nothing of his designs, but perhaps (said shee, and turned towards Anatisa) this faire one can better inform you; I cannot tell whether it was her crueltie to him which wee must accuse for the losse of so gallant a man, since it is to be thought her rigour banisht him, and drive him unto despair. Anatisa was so nettled at this crafty rallary of Amestris, that shee answered in such a faint tone, as did apparently manifest, shee knew her crueltie was not the cause of Aglatidas his absence. And since shee was not ignorant, that all the world knew it was Aglatidas who quitted her; shee made no secret of it; but looking upon Amestris, however, said she, you are obliged unto mee for taking the heart of Aglatidas from you, since he was so unconstant as to breake off your chaines, and enter into mine. But, replied Amestris, since it is alwayes the good intention, which sets the value upon any good office, I beseech you* pardon mee, if I doe not thank you for it, since I know you had not any such complacentiall humor towards me in doing it. I do confesse, said Anatisa, I did not intend to oblige you by it: confesse also, replied Amestris, that you have no cause to vaunt of a conquest which you kept so short a time: however, since Aglatidas, per[h]aps cares neither for you nor me, I think we have done him a great deale of favour to speak so long concerning him: Amestris spoke this after such a manner as did much surp[ri]se Anatisa, who thought that she was a little too tart against Aglatidas, considering how she had lived with him heretofore: and she could not think that Oltanus, could recompence such a loss, and so she went home with an unquiet minde. This was the course of life which Amestris led for a while: but shortly after Oltanus seeing such a great concourse of visitants, and observing there was many which addressed themselves unto him much more complacentiall then usual; he conceived their extraordinary care, and complements to please and divert him, was done unto him rather as the husband of Amestris, then out of any affection to himself, so that his perplexities of mind were higher then ever: he did not intend to signifiy as much openly, yet do what he would, it was presently perceived: he received the civilities done unto him after a constrain'd manner; & made but hollow returns, & contrary to his custome, he kept home so constantly; that in a few dayes his jealousy was knowne unto all the world, and more notice taken of it, then when Amestris would not bee seene: for then they did but suspect him to be jealous, but now they made no question of it: his looks, his words, his actions, and all his restlesse agitations were apparent and convincing proofes of the secret turbulencyes of his heart: and since commonly domestique servants are the spies which reveale the secrets of their Masters unto all the world; it was knowne by the servants of Oltanus, that never any came unto his house, but he asked his Porter, who came to enquire for his wife? whether they were there then? whether he came alone? how long he stayed? and a hundred such questions, which caused more rumours of his jealousy then ever: he began to shew some signes of his anguish to Amestris, who made her complaints of it unto Artemon, who alwayes did very much esteeme her, desiring him to know of Oltanus what it was which troubled his minde, assuring him, that if his minde did alter, an* that he did not think it good, she should frequent the world any longer, she would obey him, and retire againe with abundance of joy: Artemon did promise her to know what the matter was: but since he could not give his consent or advice, Amestris should be mued up againe, hee would take another way: and remembering that Oltanus to prevent all reports of his jealousy, resolved to permit his wife to entertaine all the Page 259 Gallants of Ecbatan; hee thought that by telling him againe how his way of behaviour had exposed him to the same misfortune, hee would correct himselfe the second time. But yet it did not; for as soon as Artemon told him that his daily keeping home with his wife; his extraordinary curiosity to know what every one said of him; and who came to see her when he was abroad; such things as these had got him the same reputation he had before, when Amestris did not expose her selfe unto the world: since it is so (said he unto him, in a very angry tone) that whether Amestris frequent company or not, I must bee looked upon as a jealous man, my best course is to rid my house of all company, since it is continually stuff'd with a number of idle and flattering fellows, who spend their time in telling tales, and talking nothing but vanity. Artemon, was so surprised to heare Oltanus say so, that two contrary thoughts came into phansis almost at one time: for he could hardly forbear laughing at the phantasticall humour of Oltanus, and yet he could not chuse but bee extremely sorry, to see what perscution was towards Amestris, hee used all his Rhetorick to bring the heart of Oltanus unto reason, but could not. For deferring it no longer then the very same night, Madam, said Oltanus unto Amestris, I am well pleased with your complacency in quieting your solitude at my request: but since I finde you have passed from one extreame unto another, and since you did but force your selfe to frequent Company, I shall take it kindly if you follow your owne inclination, and retire your selfe from all Company again: Sir (said shee unto him with much joy in her face) you doe a very notable favour in releasing me from that trouble which I put my selfe unto, by obeying you before: But Sir, that it may be carryed more handsomly, I conceive it would doe very well, to make a journey into the Countrey, to the end that at my returne, I may assume my solitude under a pretence of not being accustomed unto the Countrey. Oltanus wondered that Amestris should so willingly deprive her selfe of all the good company, and gallantry which she saw; and in lieu of being well satisfied, with it, hee grew more reserved, and unquiet, in so much as hee thought of changing his minde againe; yet notwithstanding he tooke her at her word, and within two dayes after they went into the Countrey, Amestris carrying her deare Menasta with her, to comfort her in all her sorrowes: Artemon hearing of Oltanus his designe, came to him with intentions to divert him, but he could not possibly; and about two dayes after Ame[st]ris, not bidding adieu unto any, went into the Countrey, with intention if she could not returne of a long time, as well, that she might more conveniently enjoy her solitude, as also the better to hide, if she could, the phantasticall humours of her husband. Shee went with some kinde of joy; but as for Oltanus, change of aire did not change his humour: for although he saw Amestris was not only as complacentiall as any vertuous wife ought to be unto her husband, but also was as obedient unto him as any slave could be, (though shee could not be so tender of him as if she had esteemed and loved him) yet he was not satisfi[ed] with her, and all her respects of him did rather incense than please him. It was therefore but a melancholly voyage which they made; yet when they were come unto the end of their journey, and settled, Amestris was at a little more rest, for Oltanus did pass away many of his melancholly houres by walking in a great wood behinde the house, so that shee had more freedome to talk with her dear Menasta, and discourse often concerning Aglatidas: shee did at the first make some scruple of it, and resolved never to speak more of him as long as she lived; but considering that her affection to him was innocent, and ever should be, since she resolved never to see him again, she thought to preserve the testimonies of his affection in her memory, which indeed she could not possibly forget; but notwithstanding all her tenderness towards Aglatidas, she determined to burn all those Letters of his which she had in keeping. Menasta and she discoursing one day upon this subject, and being willing to give them their last survey before she committed them unto the flame, she opened her closet to take them out, but could not find a little Cabinet in which they were: she was so much surprised at it, that she was not able to speak unto Menasta: in the mean while she search'd all about her Closet, & all in vain: then she asked one of her servants, who was ever very faithful, whether Oltanus did at any time come there? & was answered no; afterwards she ask'd her if she knew what became of the Cabinet, which she thought she had put up when she came from Ecbatan? & she answer'd, that she saw it upon the table of her closet at Ecba* but knew no further what she had done with it. Amest. then recalling into her me[m]ory all that she did before her coming away remembred how she intended to put it up, & Oltanus coming in, she cover'd it with her hood upon the table, resolving to pack it up Page 260 when he was gone, and so shee concluded, that shee left it there upon the table. But after Amestris had considered that Oltanus was with her, and her women had the keyes of her Closet, shee was in lesse feare: yet at night Oltanus told her that hee must returne unto Ecbatan upon some important businesse; at which she blush'd and looked upon Menasta. I see (said this jealous husband in mocking kinde of rallari-) that you envy my well-being. Pardon me Sir, said she unto him, but indeed I had much rather you remained here then go unto Ecbatan: however it be, answered he, I perceive that my journey is not indifferent unto you: but your blushes imply either sorrow or joy at it. Certainly the reason of it is (said Menasta and laughed, to the end she might break off this discourse) because she imagines that you will have her returne with you. and because she is sorry to leave a place so soone which pleaseth her. Oltanus did not reply unto this, farther than some muttering words which were not understood, but did go away to Ecbatan very sad: for though he left his wife in a very solitary place, yet was he very unquiet in his minde, and could not for his heart interpret the blush of Ame[st]ris, nor why she should look so upon Menasta, who, from that time, he suspected, though he knew not for what. In the mean time, Amestris was not a little troubled that Oltanus should goe unto that place where those things were, which hee feared hee would come unto the sight of: shee knew not what to resolve upon; for since all the domestique servants were so many spies upon her actions, she durst not attempt to suborne one of them, and trust him with the keyes of her Closet, to take out that little Cabinet which so much troubled her: nor could she imagine whether Oltanus would break it open, therefore she resolved to put it to the hazard. Menasta was perswading her to move her husband, that he would desire him to carry her with him; but Oltanus prevented her, and said that his businesse was so urgent and hasty, that hee could not goe in Coach; so that hee went himselfe, and left Amestris exceedingly troubled; and certainly not without cause; for as soone as Oltanus came home, hee had a phansie to make a strict search in the Chamber of Amestris: The house[keeper] opened all the doores but onely of that Closet, of which hee said hee had not the key. Then Oltanus, pretending to take something out which he would keep for Ame[st]ris, he broke open the doore, and went in onely with a servant of his, called Dinocrates, whom he trusted with all his secrets: hee searched in all the drawers and boxes in the Closet, hee lifted up all the hangings, and looked in every corner: hee was ready to goe out againe very well satisfied that hee found not what he sought for; but Dinocrates lifting up the hood upon the table, hee found this little Cabinet, in which were the Letters of Aglatidas. Dinocrates cryed out as if hee had found some great Treasure, and Oltanus coming towards him with a panting heart, tooke it, and opened it with all hast and violence: But oh Heavens! when he saw the Letters and the names of Amestris and Aglatidas upon them, hee was in such a fury at it, that it was a whole houre before hee read them: yet at last hee began, but was so much transported, that hee knew not what hee read: hee sent immediately unto Artemon, who coming presently unto him, see, said hee, whether I have not reason to be troubled! then hee told him how hee broke open the Closet, and how hee found the Letters, and gave him one of the Letters which hee had found: Artemon perceiving it was writ whilest Artambares the Father of Amestris lived, and when it was thought Aglatidas should have married her, told him, that hee could not finde any fault at all in Amestris for this: How (replied Oltanus) do you think her innocent in keeping Letters of gallantry and courtship, after shee was married? No no, Artemon, said hee, shee cannot excuse it, for shee that would keep the Letters of Aglatidas, would doubtlesse keep the affection of her heart for him also. Then he shewed him that Letter which Aglatidas writ at his departure: here, said he, is it which speaks me the most unhappy in the world: I doe but too well see the cause of Amestris her being so reserved. Artemon perceiving that the Letter was writ since the marriage of Oltanus, and that consequently there must needs be a correspondency betweene them, was silent a long while, and could not speak a word; meane while, Oltanus talked faster then a man that was not jealous could thinke in a whole day. But at last, Artemon stopping the fury of his frivolous language; Is this all the Crime of Amestris (said hee unto him)? if it bee, you are not so unhappy as you talk of; for I cannot finde by any circumstance in the Letter, but that since Aglatidas prepares himselfe to bee miserable, it is Page 261 Amestris which hath banished him: Moreover doe you not see that none knowes the cause of his departure? therefore I must needs thinke the vertue of Amestris to merit much commendation: I can conceive no such thing, Replyed hee, for it was the duty of Amestris to refuse all manner of Love-Letters, since she was my wife, much lesse ought she to keepe them. Artemon used all his arguments to excuse Amestris, but all would not appease Oltanus, who without any thoughts of his businesse, which brought him to the Town, returned into the Countrey the very next morning; however, Artemon would not leave him but whether he would or no went with him. In the meane while Amestris, was full of Feares, and when shee saw him, returned so unexpectedly before it was possible he could dispatch the buisness he went about, her heart drooped, & wanted but a little of falling into a sound. As soone as Oltanus lighted from his Horse, though Artemon would have hindred him, yet he went strait unto the Chamber of Amestris, and comming to him in a most uncivill fury, Madam said he unto her, you are beholding to mee for bringing you so quickly, that which doubtlesse you forget, and left at Ecbatan; and in saying so, he threw upon the Table all the Letters of Aglatidas, I leave you to imagine what operation the sight of these had upon the heart of Amelstris: yet since she knew her selfe not so culpable as Oltanus thought her, shee recollected her Constancie, and without any great dauntednesse, Sir, said shee unto him since you know it was my Fathers Command upon mee, to look upon Aglatidas, as one who should afterwards be my husband, me thinkes you should not thinke it strange that I should receive Letters from him: but the last of these Letters, replyed hee, admits not of that excuse: so that though you were not faulty in receiving the first, yet it was an unanswerable Crime to keepe them any longer, or to receive the last. I doe confesse, said shee, that I was not soe prudent as I might have beene, in not burning them, when I resolved to marry you; but truly the Crime is not so great as you apprehend it; and as for this last Letter received, since, indeed it was impossible for me not to receive it, yet I can assure you that I did never returne any answer unto it, and that it was not in my power to send it back unto Aglatidas: However, replyed hee, it seemes hee is much in your favour. Sir, said shee unto him, give me leave to tell you onely two things for the satisfaction of your minde: The one is, that I shall never see Aglatidas againe: And the other, that I will never receive any more Letters from him, nor shall hee from mee. It seemes to mee (said Artemon, who was present at this angry conference) that Amestris does offer more than is reason; for knowing her vertue as you may do, although she should see a man who was in love with her; yet there is no necessity you should be troubled at it. But how can I be assured (said Oltanus to Amestris, not harkning unto Artemon) of this which you tell me? Sir, answered she, you may leave me here, and not let me goe to Ecbatan, where Aglatidas, perhaps, may hereafter be. Solitude (reply'd he, and shoke his head) is very fit for secret meetings. Then carry me to the town (answered she) that all the world may eie my actions, & all the world may know (reply'd he all in fury) your crime and my misfortune. But, who was it which brought you this last Letter? one who was (unknown to me answered she, having no mind to bring the name of Menasta in question) where is Aglatidas at this present, asked Oltanus? I know not, replyed she, for I hold no intelligence with him, nor enquire of his being. And why, said he unto her, did you marry me, since you loved Aglatidas? I thought (answered Amestris) that my preferring you before all others, would have obliged you not to use me as you doe: I thought, said he, that though you did not love me, yet you would have loved your own honour, and done nothing unworthy of your selfe. Truly, said Artemon, me thinkes all these promises, which Amestris, hath made should satisfie you: she saith she wil never see Aglatidas againe; she will never receive any Letters from him, nor shall hee from her, and what would you more? I would have had her not to have received this last Letter, reply'd he, nor have kept any of the rest, for they are certaine testimonies, she is no hater of Aglatidas, nor ever will be a lover of mee, and by consequence I must be alwayes in feare. Sir, reply'd Amestris, I beseech you know this, that though I were an inveterate hater of you, and did love Aglatidas as well as I doe my selfe, Page 262 yet would I never speake to him againe, and the more tender I were of him, the more circumspect would I be to avoid meeting with him, therefore if it be possible, let your minde be at rest concerning that matter, and leave me here. It is not an easie matter, replyed he, for that man whom you have made for ever miserable, to leave you here, what then would you have her doe? said Artemon; I know not, replyed he sharply, but untill I be better resolved, I doe intend that Menasta, who is Cousin to Aglatidas, and doubtlesse his Confident, shall presently returne to Ecbatan, and that Amestris see her no more. Sir, said she, I beseech you doe not wrong a Lady of her Quality and Nature so much; augment, if it be possible your force against me, but be not uncivill towards her, yet if it be your pleasure that I must see her no more, let her returne to Ecbatan, some few dayes hence upon another pretence: I doe understand you very well, said he unto her, you have a minde before you part with her, to consult and agree which way you may receive some intelligence from Aglatidas. Sir, replyed shee, if Aglatidas and I were upon any termes of intelligence twixt each other, why should hee bee at such a remote distance from hence? I can say nothing to you, replyed hee angrily, but that you will drive me out of my Reason, and my Life. Artemon seeing that all Amestris could say, did rather exasperate than appease him, did get him out of her Chamber almost by force, yet being prompt unto it by his Jealous thoughts, hee would not leave the Letters of Aglatidas with her; neither would hee burne them, thinking that whilst he kept them in his hands, he should keep her better within compasse of her duty; hee tooke them up then, and kept them as carefully as the dearest thing in the world, and looking upon Amestris with insufferable insolency; I hope you will permit me Madam, said he unto her, to keep them now as well as you have done: I permit it with all patience, said she, for there is no misery which my minde is not prepared for. After he was gone out from Amestris, he would by all meanes goe unto Menasta, who was not well that day, and kept her Chamber, but Artemon dissuaded him, and used such Arguments, as moved him that Menasta should not return so sodainly, but could not perswade to let her stay long with Amelstris: yet doe what Artemon could, he would needs change all her women, and every Servant which waited on her. It was as much as Artemon could doe, to keep Oltanus from using Amestris ill, or from taking up some odde desperate resolution. Yet was he much puzzled in making the choyce of a place to dwell in: for though he thought the Countrey a more convenient place then any other to observe the actiions of Amestris: yet since his occasions would often call him from thence, hee thought that Aglatidas might see him in his absence more easily, and perhaps carry her away, for his foresight was alwayes very ingenuous to torment himselfe. Moreover he was perswaded, and that with good reason, that Amestris seemed faire in the eyes of all that looked upon her, so that he was not onely in feare of Aglatidas, but his neerest kindred; and his very best friends were not privileged from his Jealousie; Artemon himselfe scaped not: and if he put any difference between him and others, it was in his expressions of lesse Bitternesse, and Artemons suffering with more Patience, and lesse Malice than others who delighted in persecuting him. But the time came, that Menasta must returne to Ecbatan, and that Artemon accompani'd her; the parting of these two friends, was the sadder, because they could not confer in private together about one short quarter of an houre, though Artemon did all he could to procure them that Consolation: This generous friend at his departure from Oltanus, made him promise not to speake any more unto Amestris concerning Aglatidas, and that he would live better with her, otherwise himselfe in particular would complaine of him. Moreover, since he conceived that Amestris would fare better at Ecbatan, though shee saw no body then in the Countrey, where shee should see her angry husband continually, he addressed his discourse so handsomly unto him, that by his justifying Amestris so much, he gave him some subject of feare that Aglatidas would not so soone make any attempts of seeing her in the Towne, as in the Countrey; Not that I suspect, said he unto him, that Amestris would ever contribute any thing unto it, but yet you know that Aglatidas did most passionately love her, and does not yet hate her: so that seeing you more happe than him selfe, Page 263 questionlesse he will seke out wayes to make his sufferings knowne unto Amestris, therefore if you will hearken unto me, carry her back to Ecbatan. Oltanus at the first, did thinke this proposition reasonable, but immediately after he disapproved of it, and Artemon departed with Menasta, not knowing whether Oltanus would live in the Countrey alwayes, or returne to the Towne, and indeed Oltanus himselfe was unresolved what to doe. Meane time, the unexpected sudden returne of Menasta made a great noise, and the Houshold servants divulging the cause of it, the Jealousie of Oltanus made a fresh rumour in the world: Moreover, Anatisa, having a servant who was Sister unto Denocrates, the Page and confident of Oltanus, she came to know by her meanes, that the Letters of Aglatidas were found in the Closet of Amestris; so that Anatisa entring into a new fury against her, vented a hundred malicious tales, which in conclusion turned against her selfe, for she spoke with such Animosity, that though she spoke some truths, yet whensoever she spoke against Amestris, she was no more believed than if they had beeneall Lyes. Meane while Oltanus was very busie in guarding all the Advenues of his house: If hee chanced to spie a Peasant in the woods, he presently imagined him to be Aglatidas disguised: If he saw any of the Servants of Amestris talke with any that he knew not, he would know their businesse, and what they said, and suspected they brought some Letters from Aglatidas to their Mistresse: to the end she should not corrupt any of her women by any gifts, he tooke an exact Catalogue of all her Jewells, and kept it himselfe, often viewing them to see whether they were all there. He searched every cranny, where he could imagine she could hide any Letters; and it might very well be said, that notwithstanding all her Persecutions, yet hee made himselfe more miserable then her; he looked upon her with eyes so full of tormenting Jealousie, that she might clearly see the restlessnesse of his Soule: In the meane time, he was forced to returne to Ecbatan, upon some urgent occasions, and carryed her with him, not daring to leave her alone in that place. For though he did not know where Aglatidas was, yet he suspected him to be lurking in some place neere hand, watching for an opportunity to visit her, when he did at any time goe from her. At her returne to the Towne, he limited her unto such persons, as he allowed her to see there: and principally charged her not to admit of any such as made Gallantry, their Profession, who Coached away their time from Street to Street, from Company to Company, onely to talke the same things over and over againe: Amestris with unequalled patience did, without murmure, as he desired, and did not see so much as Menasta, but in private, by the meanes of Artemon. But since it was the delight and desire of all reasonable men to see her, doe what she could, they sought her out in the Temples; they followed her in the Streets, and found her sometimes in the houses of three or foure whom she was permitted to visit. Now as there was ever a sort of men who loved to delight themselves, without any regard of prejudicing others; so there was one man among the rest called Tharpis, who to punish Oltanus for his jealousy, did augment it as much as he could: So that Amestris never went out, but he had Spies to watch whither shee went, that hee might follow. As often as Oltanus went out or came in, he alwayes observed some of Tharpis his officers, keeping watch at the corner of a Street next his house, so that he became as Jealous of Tharpis as of Aglatidas, and to say truly, he was Jealous of all the world as well as of him. When Amestris was not well, it was alwayes said at the dore of her Lodging, she was so extreame ill, that none could be admitted to see her, and when Oltanus was ill, he also was said to be so ill, that Amestris could not leave him; so that when either of them was the least out of temper, it was carryed so, as if they were at the last gasp: if any one spoke unto Amestris in a low voice, he would afterwards ask them both severally what they said, and that in such an odde manner, as it was impossible to forbear laughing. This was the life of Amestris, untill the death of Astiages, who as you know, died partly of sorrow for the taking away of the Princesse Mandana. Which in a few dayes after Ciaxanes was come to Ecbatan, to take possession of the Medean Crowne, and the Court would be very full: Oltanus imagining that Aglatidas might perhaps returne to see the new King, he carryed Amestris into the Countrey, though Page 264 it had been more fit for him to returne to the Towne if he had been there: But as his resolutions were commonly contrary to all reason or handsomenesse, so he went out of Ecbatan when all the world came in: therefore when you Sir came thither with Ciaxares, she was not there, but as soone as you were gone to the Armenian Warre, he then returned with her, though with no intentions to use her any better, but lived after the same manner I have told you, untill such time as it was knowne that Aglatidas was in the Army, and gracious both with you and Ciaxares: This newes begot two contrary apprehensions in him: for he was glad to heare Aglatidas was so farre from Ecbatan, but very ill pleased with the honours which the King and you were pleased to conferre upon him; in so much as though every Letter, which came from the Army, spoke in high commendations of his valour, yet Amelstris durst not so much enquire of any newes in generall, nor of the warre, because he would be apt to imagine her end was to heare Aglatidas spoke of. But after the Governour of the Province of Aresantines was dead, he was very desirous to imploy all his friends, to obtaine of Ciaxares the Government thereof for himselfe, because all the estate of Amestris, which was very great, did lye in that Province: yet since he knew nothing could be obtained from Ciaxares, but by your mediation, hee would not make any addresse unto any who were Loved, or Lovers of Aglatidas: Also, since he had neglected that duty which a man of his Quality ought unto Ciaxares, at his entrance to the Crowne, and since his Jealousie kept him from following the Warre, as his birth obliged him, so hee had not confidence enough to aske this favour, and much lesse hopes to obtaine it, though hee should aske it: But a while after he received a Pacquet, which was no small amazement to him, for he found in it that you had sent him the government of that Province from Ciaxares. At the first he was extreame joyed, and though he knew not from whence this good should proceed, nor could guesse at the truth, yet he imagined it to come from the Kings disposition onely: so that he published it with joy, declaring that this honour was conferred upon him, though he employed none, nor made any intercession for it: All the Towne, upon this, did make their complementall addresses to him: and he permitted Amestris to entertaine all those who would visit her. But within three dayes after this first newes of joy, he received others which were as vexatious as the other was pleasing: for an old Officer in the household of Ciaxares, who was of his acquaintance, sent unto him and told him he conceived it expedient he should return some thanks unto Aglatidas for the honour which he had received from him, since it was only by his meditation he obtained it, intimating afterwards, your zeale Sir, in his behalf, at the request of Aglatidas. When Ottanus received this Letter, he was in the chamber of Amestris, in which was much company; and because it was known that it came from the Army, every one did draw neer at the reading of it, to heare some newes, and he was contented to satisfy them: But in his reading what I have told you, he changed colour about twenty times, and every one thought that either Ciaxares was dead, or else the government newly conferred upon was taken away againe. Every one asked him what ill newes? for they imagined by his looks it could not be any good: but his answer was, that he had received an account of some private businesse which did not please him well, and indeed it was easily perceived, for so much discontent appeared in his eyes, that Amestris, who knew him very well, did imagine something besides his jealousy, was a cause of his disorder, yet she could not guess what it was, but thought that perhaps some had sent him intelligence Aglatidas would ere long returne to Ecbatan: however, he made such a visible testimony of his discontent to all the company, that Amestris withdrew: some came unto him, who had not yet made their complementall addresses unto him, as Governour; but he received them so scou-vily, that they conceived themselves injured; and had he not been known to be a jealous man, and by consequence phantasticall, those men considering his extravagant behaviour towards them, had quarrelled with him: but they made a short visit, and left him to the liberty of his halfe-mad humours: As good luck was, Artemon came in before he spoke with Amestris, after the company was gone out: if hee had not, perhaps hee would have used extreame violence towards her.

Page 265 As soon as Ottanus saw Artemon, here (said hee unto him and gave him the letter which hee had received) see whether I had not reason to beleeeve that Aglatidas and Amestris have been alwaies very kind one to another: Artemon tooke the Letter and read it, but finding not a word in it conduced to what Ottanus talked of, nor any thing else but that Aglatidas had obtained for him the Government of Arisontine Province, which hee so much desired: how is it possible, said hee unto him, that your reason and mine should bee so opposite? Why, answered Ottanus, is it not as cleere as day that Amestris hath written secretly unto Aglatidas, that I desired this Government, and that it would bee an excellent expedient to reconcile mee unto him, and would bee a meanes to let mee permit him the sight of her if hee obtained it? No such thing, answered Artemon, but I am confident of the contrarie, that a Crowne were not able to induce Amestris to permit Aglatidas the sight of her, or a visite unto you, and consequently I must conclude that Amestris had no hand in it, and that Aglatidas did it out of pure generositie, because hee hates you not, as you doe him. You are so much devoted to excuse Amestris, said hee very angrylie, that I beleeeve there are few crimes which you would not absolve her of if shee should commit them: It is very true replied Artemon, that I am strongly perswaded of her virtue, and most true also, that to punish one for thoughts which hee had in the bottom of a heart, were to entrench too much upon the privilege of the gods, for they only can truly know them. However it bee, said Ottanus, I will never accept of any thing as a gift from a man whom I would pistoll. How, said Artemon, being much amazed, will you refuse the Government which you accepted of, and after you have received the complements and congratulations of all the Towne who came to rejoyce with you? Yes, said hee, I will refuse it, and render thanks unto the gods, that I neede not write any letters of thanks un|to Clarans for his fine honor conferred upon mee: But what can you say unto those who came to see you, replied Artemon, if any doe meete mee, said hee, and urge mee for any reasons of my actions, I will tell them I cannot endure Amestris should love Aglatidas, and that I am more generous then to receive a benefit from my enemy, or that hee should triumph over the heart of Amestris, which should bee only mine; yet are you not afraid to offend Cyaxares and Cyrus by it (said Artemon.) No answered hee, I feare nothing so much as to bee obliged by Aglatidas; but why doe I terme it obliged? I may rather say wronged, for what greater injury could hee doe mee then this? Had hee written unto Amestris and sent her any Jewels, or had shee answered him and returned her Picture, few then would have knowne it: But by this it is divulged throughout a whole kingdome, that Aglatidas in lieu of asking a Government for himselfe, did aske it for a man who hates him, and hath married her hee loved and still loves: hee might as well tell all the world, that by this hee doth recompence the husband for the favours which hee hath received from the wife; but I shall take such orders as they shall not accuse mee of preferring any ambitious thoughts before my honour. Beleeve mee, said Artemon, you runne a greater hazard of your honour by refusing then by accepting of this Government: How|ever it bee, said hee in extreme fury, I had rather lose my honor, then receive any benefit from Aglatidas. When the benefits of an enemy, answered Artemon, may prejudice us, it is prudence to refuse them, and it is more generous to oblige an enemy, then to bee obliged; but since this benefit which Aglatidas confers upon you is not of that nature, and since you cannot refuse it from the hand of a King, without ruine to your selfe, and mov|ing all the world to mock you, I conceive you ought not to yeeld unto your passion but to overcome it. Pardon mee Ottanus for using such freedome of speech, the extravagancy of your reason moves mee thinke I am obliged unto it: were it not that I see you are not Jealous of Aglatidas (replied Ottanus with a forced smile) I should thinke you in love with Amestris. Though you should think so, replied Artemon, I should not so much wonder at it, as I do at your actions; And I doe confesse, that I cannot understand your designe in it. I would let all Medea know, said Ottanus, that I will not contribute any thing unto the follie of Amestris. Ah Ottanus, said Artemon, Let it be least of your <◇> that any should suspect any such thing; you have taken such strickt order for that, as it can never be imputed to you. I will take a stricter order then yet I have done, reply'd he: Which you can hardly doe, answered Artemon. You shall see that e-re long, replied Otta|nus; and shall confesse, that my honor is more deer unto me then any thing else. Arte|mon, fearing he had some secret ill designe against Amestris urged him no further, but felt him, because it was very late.

Hee was no sooner gone, but Otanus went unto Amestris, and vented as many expres|ions Page 266 as furie, jealousy, and anger could invent, she returning not one sharp reply, or knowing the cause of his choller: for since he was fully perswaded she knew Aglatidas had obtained the government for him, he expressed himself in such obscure enigmas that she could not understand either his injuries or his reproaches. After he had fretted and fumed away almost all the night in persecuting Amestris, he went out of her chamber unto his own, and would permit none to follow him but Dinocrates, whose unworthy flatterie did best suit with his inclination. He was no sooner in his chamber, but he sent orders to have his horses ready by break of day; and after he had passed over the remainder of the night in most unconceivable turbulence of minde, as soon as it was day he took horse, with|out any taking leave of Amestris, and went into the Country, to avoid the concourse of company, not knowing what to say: But he was fully resolved, rather to choose any death, then to accept of any thing Aglatidas should obtain for him.

However, the absence of Ottanus gave a little more liberty unto Amestris; for her Spies were not so strict in their office, but she had the comfort to see Menasta; and she saw Artemon also, who acquainted her with the cause of her husbands furie. But when she was alone with her deer Menasta, she did confesse unto her, That though the jealousy and chollerique humor of Otanus did trouble her very much; and though she was vexed to the heart at the fantastical resolution of her husband, in refusing that Government, which all the world knows he so much desired; Yet she had some delight to think that Aglatidas should still love her so well, as in consideration of her, to confer that good Office upon Otanus, whom he alwaies hated. For my part, said Menasta, I cannot choose but admire the various events which are caused by one and the same passion; for the love of Aglatidas to you, moves Ottanus not to love you; and the love of Ottanus to you, makes him not indure Aglatidas should doe any thing for him. Ah Menasta, said Ame|stis, Those thoughts which Ottanus hath of me, cannot be phrazed Love: and I doe con|ceive, that they who say Love and Jealousie are inseparable, are much deceived; I doe be|leeve them to follow one another, but I cannot think them to reign both together at one time in one heart. However Monasta, said she, doe you not admire at my misfortune; for doubtlesse Aglatidas thinks he hath much obliged me by it; and I beleeeve imagines that Ottanus, being well satisfied by it, will be lesse rigorous to me: but, quite contrary, he doubles his persecution upon me. Can any be more innocent then I am? You know Menasta, that since the Letter I received by you, and to which I returned no answer, I have refused many others: And if at any time Aglatidas came into my memorie, it was against my will, in my discourse with you, and yet they say the Gods will punish me for some great Crime. You are not so innocent as you think your self replied Menasta, for why did you ever marry Ottanus? was it just in you, to imploy that great wit which the Gods had indued you withall, in devising such an odd way to punish Aglatidas, and justifie your self in his opinion? Oh doe not speake of what is past, answered she, and sighed; let us think only upon the present and the future. I doe foresee so many disasters towards you, replied Menasta, that you must pardon me, if I rather speak of what is past, then of what is present or what will be hereafter; for I doe professe unto you, that I can|not at all conceive, eyther what Ottanus will doe or what you will doe. For my particu|lar, said Amestris, I know no other resolution, but to referr my self wholly unto the guidance of the Gods, to submit, without the least murmur, unto their Will, and to pre|pare my self for a perpetuall persecution: For, to attempt the driving of jealousy out of Ottanus his heart, is meer follie so to think of it, since what I have done will not doe it.

These were the words and thoughts of Amestris, whilst all the Town was troubled at the suddain departure of Ottanus, and sought out for the reason, but could not finde it: But a few dayes after the thing was but too much divulged; for as the news of his being Golvemor of the Arasantins Province did fly into the Country as soon as it came to Town; many Deputies of great Towns came unto him; who, understanding that he was gone into the Country, went after him, but he would not receive them, telling them, he did not accept of that office which was put upon him. Several persons of qualitie in the same Province writ also unto him, but he would return no answer: So that these Deputies, wondering at it, went back to Ecbatane and complained of their usage, asking the cause, but none could tell them; yet notwithstanding, presently after it was divulged: For Dinocrates acquainting Anatisa with it, she told it all over the Town, adding many things more then truth to make it thought Amestris was not so innocent as reported; yet say Page 267 or doe what she could, she was not beleeeved. However, Ottanus, who hitherto passed only for a fantastical jealous man, began now to be looked upon as a man absolutely out of his wits and deprived of reason; and if they had been permitted to have seen Amestris every one would have grieved for her, and advised her to forsake Ottanus; but those unto whom he had committed the keeping of his house, would not suffer any whosoever to enter into it; not only because he so commanded them, but also because Amestris desired it, contenting her self with the liberty of enjoying Menasta, and seeing sometimes Arte|mon, the first of which, entering in at a back Garden dore, was not discovered by any. As for Ottanus, he was in a most unemaginable perplexitie; for notwithstanding his jeallousie and furie, he did imagine, that what he did would seem very strange in the opinion of the world, and that he could no way justifie himself, but by belching out lyes against Amestris; he was not able to indure his solitude, nor was he able to resolve upon a re|turne to Ecbatane, since he knew not what to say unto those who came to rejoyce with him, and whose complements he had received: He was perplexed on all sides; but amongst his varietie of different thoughts, the image of Aglatidas went never out of his minde; and when he imagined that Amestris, thought her self obliged unto him for what he had done, he was absolutely mad, or at the least seemed so unto Artemon who came to see him, in hopes to perswade him unto reason.

In the mean while Tharpis, who thought it a peece of Justice to torment that man, who did unjustly torment the fairest woman upon earth, did seem as if he had received a Letter from the Armie, which did intimate that Ciaxares and you were so incensed against Ottanus, for refusing the Government which they had conferr upon him, that it would be a peece of great difficultie for him, ever to reconcile himself. Then, as it is the qualitie of ill news alwaies to spread sooner abroad, all the Town in twenty four hours was filled with it; and reports went, That it was confirmed by four or five other Letters, though none at all came: So that Ottanus was presently advertized of it by his Spies which he had in the Town. These reports did so much augment his miserie, that he was not ma|ster of himself. For since then your condition Sir was known unto all Ecbatan, the fa|vour which Aglatidas had with you, was most terrible unto him, and doubled all his sorrows. At the same time it was certainly known, that the Affairs in Armenia were dis|composed, and that Ciaxares would draw the war into that Country: So that Ottanus, being moved unto it by apprehensions of rage, despair, revenge and jealousy, altogether, he resolved to cast himself into the King of Armenia's Partie, though he apparently saw it would be the ruine of himselfe and losse of his estate, flattering himself with hopes of some occasion to meet with Aglatidas, knowing he would be in that war, and he would seek him out, though in places fullest of danger.

This designe being resolved upon, without communicating it unto any, he sent for Ame|stis, who, contrary to the advice of Menasta, obeyed him. Artemon, who was returned to Ecbatan, hearing of it, would not let her goe alone, but accompanied her whether she would or no: When they drew neer the place unto which they were to goe, they espied Dinocrates on horseback under a Tree, who as soon as he saw them coming galloped with all speed towards the Castle where his master was. This passage did much surprize Amelstris and Artemon, who could not devise the meaning of it: But they were much more astonished, when being come into the Castle, they understood, that as soon as Dinocrates advertized Ottanus of their coming, hee took horse with three or four of his servants, and went out at a back dore, leaving a Letter with the Captain of the Castle to give unto Amestris: He had no sooner declared it, but she opened it, and found these words:

OTANUS to the unworthy AMESTRIS.

I Goe from hence to hide that shame which you have brought upon me, and in order to that I goe amongst men, who know neither you nor me: But the principall reason of my voylage is to kill Aglatidas, if I can meet with him, as I hope I shall: If I hear you receive the news of his death without any tears, I shall return, and perhaps pardon you for loving that man whilst hee lived, whose death should be indifferent unto you; in the mean time keep within this Castle; obey him who commands it in my absence, unlesse you have a minde I should return to punish you for all those evils you have brought upon me

Page 268 Imagine Sir, how this letter grieved Amestris; who shewing it unto Artemon, conjured him to follow after him; and notwithstanding all the distwasion of the Captain, he did so: But whether Ottanus made too much haste to be overtaken, or whether Artemon took a wrong road, so it was he could not meet with him, but returned to Amestris, whom he found in a deluge of tears: She was not well perswaded whether or no Ottanus was gone, or if he were, whether he was gone to kill Aglatidas, as his Letter expressed; or else whether he was only hid, to see how she would behave her self during his pretended absence: But however, she collected by the beginning of his Letter, that he was not gone into the Armie of Cixares, since there he would be known: After much debate upon the matter, they hit upon the truth, and Artemon beleieved he was gone into Armenia and was amongst the Kings enemies. However, Amestris told him, that obedience unto her husband was her dutie, and therefore she desired him to return back: Artemon used all his arguments to perswade her, that he might carrie her back again to Ecbatan: But as she had no mind unto it, so indeed she could not if she would: for he whom Otanus had left commander in the Castle was an obstinate and resolved man, and would not have permitted her: Yet the sweet disposition of Amestris did obtain this singular favour from him, that Menasta might come and see her. Thus was Amestris, after Artemons departure, in a most terrible solitude, especially because she knew no limits of time when it would end. Her friends and Kinred did divers times offer to take her away in spight of him that kept the Castle if she would consent unto it, but she never would; not so much, I think, out of her obedience unto Ottanus, which truly was without a paralel, as out of her own disposition to avoid companie, which she would not indure without con|straint. A while after she had the comfort to heare that Ottanus was certainly in Ar|menia, and consequently she was in lesse fear of Aglatidas his life, conceiving it a hard matter to meet with him amongst an Armie of a hundred thousand men.

Thus Sir, did Amestris live during all the Armenean warre, untill the news was spread throughout all Medea, that Ottanus was dead: It was told unto her with so many cir|cumstances, that none were afraid to rejoyce openly with her, and all the world did make a publique thanksgiving for it, in behalfe and out of affection to Amestris. But the wonder of all was, that shee who of all living had most reason to rejoyce at the death of Otta|nus, did receive the newes with the most moderation; for there was not the least visible signe of any inward joy in the face of Amestris; as it was a thing impossible shee should bee sad, so nothing of that passion appeared likewise; but without eyther any joy or sor|row, shee made the wisdom of her minde, and generositie of her soule most apparently appeare in her discreet moderation, and when Menasta asked her why shee was not more sensible of that freedom which shee was to enjoy, shee answered that there was som scruples of minde yet unsatisfied, and shee feared that the ill treatments of Ottanus would bee a meanes by which the gods would shorten her life. Within a few dayes after, the ser|vants of Ottanus, returned all except Dinocrates, who they said was sick and stayed in Ar|menia, which confirmed the reports of his death. In the meane while the Captaine of the Castle where Amestris was, in lieu of commanding her as before, hee began to obey her as soone as hee heard of Ottanus his death, and since hee was never very severe in his office, shee treated him with much sweetness: Within a few dayes after the kindred and friends unto Amestris came to carry her back unto Ecbatan, where shee lived in all possible discre|tion, as if Ottanus had not at <◇> beene jealous and fantastical; yet since it is not the cu|stome of mourning in Medea, to continue long, and since Amestris was never in her life more faire then at that time, the passionate affection of very many began to disclose and discover themselves by the tender of their services: And amongst the rest Tharpis (who whilst Ottanus was jealous, had no other design in seeing Amestris and following her unto all places, but to add fewel to his foolish fires) was now really in love with her. Artemon for his part, he thought that meer compassion upon the miseries of Amestris was the only cause which prompted him to see and serve hen, but now he perceived that he loved her with more tender affection then he thought on: So that Amestris in losing a husband found many Lovers: And that which was most strange, was, that Anatisa only mourned for the death of Ottanus, and so sad she was that all the world perceived it: Amestris hearing as much, and discovering on it with her deer Menasta, after second thoughts Menasta imagined the true cause, which was her fears that the death of Ottanus would revive th <...> ve betwixt Amestris and Aglatidas, if ever he returned to Ecbatan Amestris blus <...> n this discourse: Ambition and absence, said she, will doubtlesse cure Page 269Aglatidas of <◇◇> affection to me, so that the fears of Anatisa are ill grounded: And <◇> <...> Id <◇> , yet I <...> de Libertie so sweet that I shall hardly be induced to lose it again. If you had spoke this unto any friend of Anatisa, replied Menasta; and smiled, I should have thought it much Prudence in you; but in speaking unto me, and to tell me that ambition and absence can cure Aglatidas, is very strange: Aglatidas, who might have obtained <◇> Government for himself, but preferred him whom you married; No no Amestris, it is impossible, and I cannot in|ure to hear of it: Speak Amestris, tell me truly, whether or no, you speak as you think? tell me ingeniously if it would not vex you to <◇> Aglatidas returne hither, and Court Anatisa before your face? As for Anatisa, replied Amestris, I must confesse, it would much vex me, and I could not in|dure it. Who then could you allow him to Court, said Menasta, and smiled? Wicked woman, replied Amestris, why doe you so cruelly persecute me? and why doe you force me to tell you with a blush, that I cannot indure Aglatidas should love any thing but honour above me? Yet, said Menasta, you speak as coldlie as if Aglatidas were Ottanus, I beseech you, said Amestris, speak not of Ottanus, but let him enjoy that rest in his death which he could not have in his life, and think (said she with a half smile) that the jealousie of Ottanus has not been my only punishment, but the jealousie of Aglatidas hath also extremely troubled me; and therefore I had need bee wise in exposing my self the second time to the same misery. You may easily prevent that (replied Menasta wittily) by holding no discourse with Megabises, if he return hither; and banish out of your heart all causes of complaint against him: and let me tell you that a secret spleen in Love, how little soever it be in the beginning, may end in a great quarrell: therefore hearken to my Councell, and without any more apprehensions of Aglatidas his jealousie, receive his affection with gratitude; for I am confident that his fidelitie deserves it. This Sir was the State of things: Tharpis and Artemon were in love with Amestris, and Anatisa was jealous; for since the death of Ottanus she had many spies about the actions of Amelstris, to the end she might discover what intelligence passed between Aglatidas and her: But there being at that time some Comotions in Medea, it was your goodnesse Sir, to make choyse of Aglatidas to be sent thither, with Commission from the King for it. I can|not well describe unto you Sir the impatience of Aglatidas, during this voyage; yet give me leave to tell you, that though he was going to see Amestris and Amestris at liberty, yet he did a hundred and a hundred times expresse his sorrows to be so far from you Sir: The glorious name of Cyrus and the pleasing name of Amestris, were perpetually pronounced, and nothing else, during all the voyage. As good fortune was, things were a little calmed at Ecbatane before we came there. Moreover, since he came with absolute Authoritie, his arrivall was no sooner known, but all addressed themselves unto him with resolutions of obedience; So that his entrance into Ecbatan was as if it were in Tryumph. In the mean time Artemon, Tharpis and Anatisa were quite down in their conceits: But as for Amestris, she was so quicked at his return, that she hardly knew the motion of her own heart.

As soone as Aglatidas arrived, hee was so thronged and taken up with publique businesse that he could not disingage himselfe from them, but desired mee to goe unto Menasta, and desire her to know the commands of Amestris, and to understand from her how shee was pleased hee should behave himselfe as soone as this throng of affaires would permit him any leisure to dispose of: But Menasta knowing the modest minde of Amestris, told mee, that Aglatidas should make his first addresse by way of visit only, as was fitting unto one of her qualitie, and that if he would be pleased to acquaint her with the day he intend|ed to come unto Amestris, she would contrive it so cunningly; that, provided he came in fitting times for it, there should be little company when hee came. Time did seeme so te|dious unto Aglatidas, that notwithstanding his multitude of affaires, he could not choose but write two Letters unto Menasta that same day, and goe unto her at night; for since she was his Cosen, he was more free with her then another; and he tooke such delight in discourse of his deer Amestris, that he never thought of parting from her. But at last after he had spent two whol dayes in the Kings service, being in extreme impatience to see his faire Amestris, hee went unto the Temple, where he understood, by Menasta, shee ulsed to bee; yet Amestris not being there that day, not daring to trust her selfe before so much company, at the first meeting with Aglatidas, his hopes were disappointed, and in lieu of seeing Amestris, he met with Anatisa, who came thither purposely to see whether Aglatidas and Amestris were there. This encounter put him out of countenance, being Page 270 conscious of his crime to that Lady, and considering what a sad consequence the last sight of her produced, it being the cause why Amestris was jealous, and whereupon she groun|ded her strange resolution; hee went out of the Temple as if hee knew her not; and the time of his going unto Amestris being come, hee went thither with a trembling heart. As the mourning of widdowes doth not last above foure dayes at Ecbatan, so Amestris was out of it when wee came thither; and though shee had no desire to appeare in her negligent dresse, at the first sight of Aglatidas, yet shee did not dresse her selfe in any glorious manner at that time, but was in meane betweene both, so that not diminishing any of her beauty, there appeared as much modesty in her dresse, as in her minde: Menasta, who was with her when Aglatidas and I came thither, and since Amestas knew that I was not ignorant of all passages, my presence did not interrupt the meeting; yet Sir it seemed un|to mee something strange, for in lieu of those testimonies of joy, which usually appeares in the faces of those who love, and who after great misfortunes and long absence delight to see one another; Amestris was reserved, and concealing her satisfaction from Aglatidas, shee seemed so serious at the first, that all joyes vanished out of his eyes, and his heart was so damped that hee had much adoe to expresse himselfe in termes of common civilitie: That which did most of all non plus him was, that at his coming in hee found a Lady with her upon a visit, as wee were: so that Aglatidas knew not in all the world how to ad|dresse himselfe, nor did Amestris know how to answer him, For to tell her hee was sorry for her losse had beene ridiculous and absurd; to say hee rejoiced at it would offend her; and to say nothing had not beene handsome; so that Aglatidas was not a little puzzled, and I know not how hee came off with his complement, for whilst he was performing it I addressed my selfe to Menasta, to tell her she was not so good as her promise, since that Ladie was there to interrupt us; and indeede as shee was present, discourse was but con|strained, yet Aglatidas hoped that when shee was gone, then Amestris would not appeare so cold, but after her visite was ended, and wee were in freedome together, seeing shee kept still in the same posture and would not assume that obliging aire and free beha|viour as hee hoped for.

Madam (said he unto her) Is it possible that you should expresse such sensible sor|row at my departure, and that now you should deny me so much happinesse as to see some symptoms of joy at my return? That sorrow which I shewed against my will (replied Amestris and smiled) did seem so criminall unto me, when I could think upon it with tran|quility, that I desire to repent of that fault now. Say rather (Madam) replied hee, that you have a premeditated designe to commit another against the lawes of amitie, which you owe mee: For since you honored me with your commands, to love none but you, when I parted from you, I thinke it is lawfull for mee to say as much, since I have most exactly obeyed you: Yes, Madam, I have loved you, and loved none but you, and also in so high a measure that my honour is not deerer then it, nor my life; yet after I have suffe|red a multitude of miseries; after a sensibility of all your sorrows and my owne; after I have preserved a most violent love, without any hope; and endured a million of misfor|tunes, and all only because I loved you; then, after all these, to finde such an indif|ference in your looks, as perswades mee your heart is indifferent also, is a very hell unto my soule. Doe not beleewe my lookes Aglatidas, said shee unto him, if they tell you that my heart is indifferent to you, since certainly I have ever esteemed you as much as I ought to doe. If you said loved me, in lieu of esteeming me, replied Aglatidas, you had compleated my happinesse. But cruel Lady, I beleewe you make no account of all my services and sufferings, but expect I should make a new purchase of your heart: If it bee so I beseech you tell mee; for I must needs confesse I am not prepared at this time to tell you that I love you, nor did I thinke you expected it, but Madam, if I was deceived I beseech you acquaint mee with your will, and you shall bee most exactly obeyed. Whilst Aglatidas was thus expressing himselfe, and Amestris most attentively hearing, that seeming coldnesse which shee out of her modesty, at the first, affected; did vanish before shee was aware, so that the reall thoughts of heart, stealing through her eyes, did speak her joyes so apparently, that Aglatidas had his desired satisfaction, Amestris also plainly perceiving that Aglatidas was no changeling, was full of obliging sweetnesse towards him. Then did they begin to relate all their sorrowes and all their misfortunes which intervined since they saw one another, and this conference which began with a little kinde of a quarell, did end in a renewing of a most sincere amitie. Since company began to come in, the conference was interrupted, but the most observable passage was, that Tharpis coming to Amestris Page 271 whilst wee were there, within a quarter of an houre, Aglatidas perceived hee was in love with her, and telling Menasta as much, shee told him againe in rallarie that hee had best take heede of being jealous, as hee was of Megabises. Wicked Cozen answered hee, why doe you make a jeast of that which hath beene the greatest torment of my life? I doe it, answered shee, to prevent your relapse into the like. By this time our visite had lasted but too long, and therefore I reckned unto Aglatidas to break off which accordingly we did: But since he owed another visit unto one of his Aunts, he left me, and went to pay it: As ill luck was he found Anatisa there, which vexed him so much, that he was in a minde to goe out of the Chamber: yet since he was discovered, and owed much respect unto the Ladie he went to visit, and who was already risen up to salute him, he went forward and performed his complements, which smelt a little of the disorder in his soule: He saluted Anatisa yet very civilly, but with so much confusion in his face, as he durst hardly look upon her; for besides his own non plus he saw a Lady who had good reason to blame him, he was afraid that Amestris, if she should hap to know it, should thinke he sought the occasion to see Anatisa: So that resolving to cut his visit very short, he told the Lady whom he came unto, that this should not be counted for one, but that ere long he would tender his devoirs in a more ample manner. Just as he had ended his complement, one came and desired to speak with his Aunt upon some very important businesse. Nephew (said shee unto him) I know you are in no such haste, but you may doe me the favor to keep this fair Lady companie, whilst I goe into my Closet and dispatch a peece of businesse which cannot be done another time. Anatisa was so ravished with this fit oportunitie, that she never offered to goe away, but quite contrary, desired the Lady not to make so much haste, but to dispatch her businesse at leisure. Aglatidas was so vexed with this angry adventure, that though he would not openly offer any incivility, yet he would have given some ifa|vord reasons to move Anatisa to goe away, or else that he must himself be gone: But the Lady of the house left them together without any answer, or any other companie except a woman which waited upon Anatisa, who stood at the other end of the Chamber: You may imagine Sir how Aglatidas was put to it, who was a long while dumbe as well as Anatisa, who stayed to see what he would say before she began: Yet Aglatidas conceiving it best not to incense the Spirit of that Lady too much, by too great an incivility, resolved to make some excuses unto her, and to prepare her that she should not take it ill, he had cast her off as he had done: but since he was something long in consulting with himself about it, Anatisa broke silence first. Tell me truly Aglatidas, said she unto him, Did you know that I was here when you came in? Certainly, answered he, if I had known you had been here, I should out of my respect unto you, not have forced you to see a man whom you have reason to hate; though, to say truly, he never had any intentions to wrong you. That I may the better judge of your Crime, replied she, you must sincerely, without any dissimulation, tell me what it is, for truly my minde is not yet resolved, what thoughts to entertain of you: Speak then I conjure you, said she, and tell me sincerely, whether when you applied your self unto me more then unto any other, and by your assiduous Courtship perswaded me that you loved me; whether I say, did you really love me, or only did distemble it, that you might better hide your love of Amestris? for it may be you quitted her at that time for me, or it may be you now quit me for her; or else perhaps you were ever devoted unto Amestris, though I cannot understand what reason you had to let her marry Ottanus: However, tell me the real truth, that I may accordingly regulate my thoughts of you. Aglatidas, being much gravelled for an answer, stood silent a while. No no, said she unto him, pump not for any excuse, nor any disguisement of the matter; let me only know whether you be only an unconstant man or an impostur, lest I should be unjust in hating you either too much or too little; for I put a great deal of difference between these two Crimes, which one of them you have committed. Aglatidas being deeper gravelled then ever, thought it best to confesse the very truth of the matter: Madam (said he then unto her) since you command me to speak the truth in all sinceritie; I doe confesse that I was never inconstant, but that I ever loved Amestris better then my self: I beseech you (said he, seeing her blush for anger) let not this truth incense you more against me; for I am certain there is no cause of offence; and am certain also, that you will confesse as much, if you will be pleased to understand me. I doe not thinke you can perswade me to it, replied she, since I have more reason to complain against you, then if you were inconstant. You shall see Madam the greatest esteem which I had of you; for since I loved Amestris with a most violent and unruly passion, and esteeming her above Page 272 all the world, but finding great cause of complaint against her severity towards me, and desiring to cure my self, if it were possible, of such an unaccepted passion, I conceived you able to deface the image of Amestris out of my heart, and would perswade my self and all the world that I was in love with you: Judge, Madam, whether any man that was in love, and who thought the Lady he loved the most incomparably accomplished of any upon earth, could render a greater testimonie of esteem then I unto you upon this occasion: I make a question whether I had been able to have rendred it in so high a degree, if I had been really in love with you, as in seeming to be so, and as I endeavored to become so really. Now if by the help of all my endeavors, I cannot passe above the degree of esteem, nor reach so high as love, the fault is not in your beauty or wit, or any virtue wanting in you; but the only fault is, that I cannot root out of my heart those first thoughts which took such deep hold of it. Therefore, Madam, to speak reasonably, it was a wrong rather unto Amestris then you, when I applied my self unto your service, since I endeavored to dispose of a heart which was not in my power, but only and absolutely in hers. Confesse the truth, replied Anatisa, Was not your only aim to make Amestris jealous, and never to intend any Love towards mee? Ah Aglatidas, you are deceived if you ever thought I beleaved you: Inconstancie is sometimes pardonable; but an impostur, a Cheat, a man which cozens us, there is no imaginable revenge which is not sweet, to punish him withall. Had I protested a thou|sand times (said Aglatidas) that I was infinitely in love with you, or if you had done me any considerable favours, you had then some reason for what you say; but alas, Madam, I was no more then a frequent visitor, and discoursed with you more then with any other; and I doe not doubt, but if I had been so boldes to professe any matters of Love unto you, then you would have treated me more hardly then you did: but since it is no shame for all beauties to be loved, I cannot conceive I have done you any great injurie in moving you to beleewe, by some deep sighs, that I loved you. No, replied Anatisa, you have rather done me a good turne, by giving me cause to thinke that you never loved me: However Aglatidas, I shall be revenged of you, and I will revenge my self upon Amestris, that I may be the better revenged upon yourself: And since you say you have tryed and indeavored to love me, I thank you for it, and in requitall, I shall try and indeavour to hate you; and if I be not much mistaken, I shall bring to passe my designe better then you have yours; for I perceive I have a stronger inclination unto it: Expect therefore a punishment for you Crime, even by Amestris her self, who perhaps shall not make you lesse jealous then Ottanus was; for indeed Aglatidas some have eyes as well as you; others thinke her fair as well as your self; and after the choise which she made of Ottanus, I beleewe few lovers are sure of their own hearts, be they as compleat men as can be. Yet since you are ingenious and speak sincerely unto me, I shall be the like and tell you with the same sincerity, that I doe already hate you more then you can love Amestris, and shall never be satisfied untill you be both miserable: I shall not make any great blun|der in the world, but shall revenge my self in a more fine and subtle way. You may use your pleasure (answered Aglatidas coldly) for since I respect all Ladies in generall and much esteem you in particular, I shall be so effectually respective, that I shall not interpret your hatred and choller to my disadvantage; and if I return any answer unto the injuries you speak of, it shall be in complements.

As Anatisa was ready to reply, the Aunt of Aglatidas came in, and hee took his leave of her, and left Anatisa as much incensed against him as possibly could be. But the angry part of this visit was, that Tharpis came into the Chamber as the Aunt of Aglatidas came out of her Closet, so that he saw the private Conference which had been between him and Anatisa, and observed the disorder which appeared in the face of that Ladie: So that Aglatidas fearing this encounter should prejudice him in the opinion of Amestris, he sent Menasta unto her, to acquaint her with the accident; and indeed his policie was advan|tagious to him; for Tharpis found out some means or other to acquaint Amestris the next morning, that Aglatidas and Anatisa had a long private conference together at the house of Aglatidas his Aunt, which made it seem as if it were a thing appointed: but since Amestris knew it before, this devise took no effect, nor made any jars between Amestris and Aglatidas.

In the mean time Artemon and Tharpis were not a little vexed to observe that they did concur so well: But since Artemon was not declared a Lover, though it was apparent enough he thought he had found out an excellent devise to ruine Aglatidas; So that Page 273 resolving not to speake yet as a Lover, hee designed the destruction of his most feared Rivall, by acting in appearance as the friend of Amestris, and the truth is, if shee had not perceived by a hundred circumstances that hee was in love with her, his plot had tooke effect: for hee did mannage it most cunningly, as I shall tell you. Presently after Aglatidas arrived, and had made many visits unto Amestris, where it was easilie perceived hee alwaies loved her, and was never hated: Artemon, one morning desired to speake with her, and it was granted him; for shee was much obliged unto him for taking her part against Ottanus when hee was with her, and had liberty to talke in private.

Madam (said hee unto her) I know not whether my zeale will bee well taken, but I am certaine that if you could see my heart, you would confesse I am obliged to what I did: Artemon (answered shee) I have received so many testimonies of friendship from you, and you have done mee so many good offices, that I cannot imagine what you can tell mee, which will not bee well taken; therefore speake on, I conjure you. Madam replied hee and blusht (for hee related the conference unto mee very fully, as I shall tell you at the end of my discourse) I know very well that the jealousie of Ottanus had ever a causlesse foundation, and that your virtue is so great that no calumny can blemish it: But having alwaies observed your passionate love of Honour, and that you would not only bee vertuous but also would appeare so in the eyes of your very enemies, I thought it requisite for you to take into your your serious consideration all those things which Ottanus hath published to the World, concerning the correspondency betwixt Aglatidas and your selfe. Not Madam, but that I know his injustice was well perceived, yet for all that, I conceive that Aglatidas conferring the Government upon Ottanus, and hee making that the pretence of his fury against you, you would perhaps take away a great cause of censure from all those who envie your beautie and merrit, if you should a little lesse admitte of visites from Aglatidas. Not that I have any exceptions against him, for you your selfe have often heard mee speake much good of him, upon severall occasions: Therefore I doe most humbly entreat you to beleewe that what I speake is meerely out of zeale to your service. I am much obliged unto you (answered Amestris, knowing well enough what motive induced him to his advice) and I doe assure you, Artemon, that I will take your advice, as I ought to doe: yet let mee tell you, with the like freedome that you take, I am unwilling to revive the jealousies of Ottanus after his death: for hee would have barred mee from the conversation of all the world; you your self was not excepted. It is very true, replied Artemon, but all the towne talkes more of Aglatidas then any other, not that I advise you to banish him from your sight absolutlie: but only for a little time; and thereby stop the tongues of calumnies which Anatisa perhaps will raise against you. This seemes to bee but ill policie, said Amestris, therefore I had rather not conceale my thoughts, and it will be advantagious to mee, that all the world did know them, since thanks bee to the gods, they are not criminall. However madam, said hee unto her, I beseech you take it not ill, that I should bee so free with you. I doe promise you, I will not, answered shee; but Artemon, (said shee further, and smiled) you give mee this counsell so seriously that I am fearfull you will take it ill from mee, if I doe not follow it: truly Madam, replied hee, I should bee very glad you did follow it for severall reason, but I see you have no inclination to it. I doe ingeniously confesse it said shee, for I have lived so long in a constrained condition, that I desire to enjoy freedome as farr as handsomnesse and decency will permit mee. But madam, said Artemon, to her, you may remember the time when you told mee that exposing your selfe to the conversation of the World was constrained and contrarie to your inclination: Did you then speake as you thought, Madam, or is your minde changed since. But Artemon, said shee unto him, you may remember the time when you told Ottanus that it was fit one of my age and qualitie should expose themselves unto the conversation of the World; Did you then speake as you thought Ottanus? Or doe you not speake as you thinke now? You, I say, who would have mee banish from my converse the prime person that I have in Ecbatan. Madam (said hee being transported by his passion) to speake sincerely and really unto you, I would never Page 274 have moved you to forbear the company of Aglatidas, but only to discover your thoughts of him, and likewise to discover what are mine of you. I doe not see (said Amestris, and assumed a more serious look) what should be the riddle of these things. You may easily perceive it, answered hee, if you will be but pleased to consider that none can converse with you except they infinitely love you, and desire unto themselves a happinesse which they fear you will bestow upon another. I must confesse, said Amestris to him, that your discourse amazeth me, and I could never have believed you would have given me any cause to complain against you, or begun your expressions of affection with any thoughts of jealousy: But Artemon, that you may see I forget not my obligations to you, I will take the same freedome as you have done, and give you some counsell, and sincerely tell you, that you will be the most miserable man upon earth, if you ever think of loving me: Content your self I pray you, that I doe beleeve you are my friend, and be confident that as long as you keep within the limits of that, I shall very much esteeme you; but on the other side I doe ingeniously professe, that if you love mee any otherwise then so, you will lose your labour, you will exceedingly vex me, and I shall endeavour my utmost to persecute you as much as ever I can. But Madam, said he unto her, I beseech you then acknowledge that Aglatidas is the cause of the absolute impossibilitie to move your heart. When you are no more then only my friend (said shee unto him and smiled) I shall discover the secrets of my heart unto you. Alas Madam, said he, that's an honour I shall never arive at; for it is absolutelie impossible for me to love you more or lesse then I doe. But when Otanus lived, said she unto him, you were neither unquiet nor jealous, and yet I was the same I am now, and you saw me also as you doe now, therefore did you love me at that time? Doubtlesse I did Madam, said he unto her, yet I did not know it by that name; but I called that esteem, friendship and compassion, which really was most violent Love. For my part, said Amestris, I cannot see any reason why your friendship should not continue friendship still, or why your esteem should be converted into Love. The return of Aglatidas, replied he, is the cause of it. I doe understand you very well Artemon, said she unto him, you had some sparks of jealousy in your minde before you knew you were in love; and beleeve me, nothing could render you more terrible to Amestris then that humor. I know Madam, replied he, that the reason why you say so is because I was allied to Otanus, but I did intend by it to let you know my sincerity and my misery. You would doe much better, said she, to let me see your wisdom and discretion, in continuing my friend as heretofore you have been; for by that way you will be sure to have my esteem and friendship; and the other way you will force me to hate you and shun your companie.

Thus Sir you see poor Artemon, who came to see Amestris in hopes to get Aglatidas banished, was almost banished himself: therefore he began to expresse himself in the most obliging language he could possible, and solemnly protested he would never speak any thing again that should incense her; but desired he might come see her, though never in private again.

All this while Anatisa was plotting her revenge upon Aglatidas, and in order to that, she made a firm league of friendship with Tharpis; the confidence they had in each other was so high, that I think they imparted their most secret thoughts: They held many counsels upon it, to advise upon the best course; and this cunning Ladie made him promise her never to speake openly of his love to Amestris, for fear shee should treat him ill, and banish him her companie: for since there was a report that Ciaxares would, ere long, return to Ecbatan, and that Megabises would return with him, she thought that all three rivals would puzzle Aglatidas to some purpose; and if they had all three the freedom of Courting Amestris at once, it was ten to one but some jars or other would arise amongst them, which would reflect upon Aglatidas. She advised Tharpis therefore only to get some faithfull Spie which should be continually about Amestris, and never to speake any thing which might incense her, or move her to banish him her companie: And the better to delude Tharpis, shee told him that there was a Letter which came from the Armie, intimating that as soon as Ciaxares came to Ecbatan, then you Sir would send for Aglatidas back; and therefore Page 275 it was better to stay untill he was absent, before he declared himself: Telling him further, that his principall businesse should bee, to hinder as much as ever he could, that Amestris and Aglatidas held no long private conferences together, whilst hee stayed at Ecbatan. So that Tharpis was so perpetually with Amestris, as it was impossible to be here and not finde him one. Aglatidas did divers times offer to quarrel with him, but Amestris did strictly forbid him: for though hee did earnestly importune her, and was a perpetual trouble, yet she would not permit a quarrel, upon no other reason but frequency of visits: She would not neither have it denied that shee was within, but let every one enter besides; so that shee could never enjoy the sight of Aglatidas, but she must admit of the sight of Tharpis also: for though his companie was pleasant enough, yet Amestris, Menasta, Aglatidas and my selfe were so confined in our freedome of discourse, that when hee was present wee knew not what to discourse upon: Every one was silent, purposely to vex him, but all was one, for speake or speake not, hee was alwaies there, and was the last man commonly that went away: So that Aglatidas could never have any opportunity of private discourse with Amestris, but sometimes at the lodging of Menasta, and that too was very rare to finde none but our selves there. Aglatidas yet was so fully assured that Amestris loved him, though shee gave him but common testimonies of it, as that hee thought himselfe unhappie in nothing but that shee would not name him, conceiving it too short a time since Ottanus died to doe it with any handsomnesse.

This Sir was the state of things when Ciaxares came to Ecbatan, and when Megabises followed him, whom one would have thought that time, and absence, and reason would have made him forget his affection to Amestris, but as soone as hee heard of the death of Ottanus, and that Aglatidas might perhaps become happy, it revived, and hee was deeply in love with Amestris: when hee came to Ecbatane hee was not deceived in his conjectures, for hee found that Aglatidas was in favour with Amestris, and his soule was so extremely perplexed that hee could not tell whether the hatred hee bore unto his Rivall did revive his affection unto Amestris, or his affection to Amestris revive his hatred unto his Rivall: However, these two contrary passions tooke up the whole dominion of his heart, so that in one and the same day, hee did both love and hate in the highest excesse, and was equally tormented by them both, for as hee durst not yet tell Amestris that hee loved her, because hee had promised never to speake any more of his love unto her; so shee durst not make his hatred of Aglatidas appeare more then ordinary, because of Ciaxares and of you Sir: so that hee was extremely tormented; but in the end, love being the predominate passion in his heart, hee conceived, upon serious thoughts, that though hee should tell her hee loved her still, yet it was no unpardonable sinne: So that hee went unto Amestris with a resolution to commit it. This visite did both surprize and perplex her, for shee imagined that since Megabises had broke his promise of seeing her no more, hee would breake the other also before hee had done, and though to speake reasonably, it may very well bee said, that hee was only the innocent cause of Aglatidas his jealousy; yet for all that, Amestris had never married Ottanus, if Megabises had not spoke with her in the Garden when Aglatidas became jealous, and therefore shee could not chuse but have a spleene against him: For this reason therefore and many others, shee gave him but cold entertainment, yet would shee not openly chide him for his breach of promise, because Tharpis was present, who was an eternall obstacle unto Megabises as well as unto Aglatidas.

The most observable passage was, that Amestris, being extreemly joyed that shee had continually one with her, who hindred Megabises from any private discourse, did one day desire Aglatidas, smiling, not to bee jealous, if shee treated the poore Tharpis a little kindly; to the end hee should continue his assiduitie about her, as long as Megabises should bee at Court. Anatisa, who was very subtle and craftie, did desire that Tharpis should bee with Amestris, only when Aglatidas was with her, and bee no hindrance unto eyther Megabises or Artemon, for shee cared not who got the heart of Amestris, so Aglatidas lost it. But Sir, Aglatidas was so exceedingly obsequious and full of respects unto her, that though the visites of Megabises were so Page 276 many bitter Pills to his stomach, and perplexed him to the heart, yet he resolved never to tell her as much, or speak unto her: But doe what he could, his eyes betrayed the secrets of his soul, and discovered his restlesse thoughts; yet since she was resolved to be very sincere and free with him, shee expressed her self so obligingly unto him at Menasta's lodging, that she sweetened those bitter Pills at the last, if she did not absolutely cure him of his Maladie.

In the mean time Megabises watched all opportunities to speak in private with her, and at the last found out an odd device, which was, to suborn the Porter by a considerable sum of monie: Then when he intended to execute his design, hee made choise of such a day as hee knew Menasta would not be with Amestris; and acquainting the Porter with it, he obliged him to tell every one, except himself, that came to ask for his Ladie, that shee was not at home. So that the Porter obeying him, and Megabises sending away his men when hee came neere the house, fearing if any who came thither should see them there, they would know by them he was there also, he went up into her Chamber, and found no companie with her but her women: His first entrance did a little startle her; yet imagining that company would presently come in, and at least Tharpis would not fail to deliver her from the persecution of Megabises, shee resolved to be speaking continually unto him, and prevent him from any expressions of Love: So that when they were set and conceiving there was no subject fitter for a long discourse then to speak of you Sir; Since wee have a fit oportunitie, said shee unto him, tell me, I beseech you, whether Cyrus be really such a one as fame speaks him to bee: I doe not expect you should make a large relation of all his conquests, but I would have you tell mee truly, whether it bee true, that he is absolute owner of all the virtues, and hath not so much as one fault: for since I was not at Ecbatan when he was there, I missed the sight of him, and would gladly know, whether all those that speak of him doe not flatter.

That Prince, answered Megabises, is so exactly accomplished in all respects, that none can flater him more then they can your beauty Madam, though they commend him in the highest strain. But Madam, said he, if Aglatidas hath not fully described him unto you, he is not gratefull enough for those favours which Cyrus hath done him; and you have som reason to feare hee will bee negligent also in his acknowledgements of those favours he hath received from you. Aglatidas, replied she, has extolled him in such a high strayn, as that is the reason why I enquire of you concerning him, conceiving it not possible that one Prince should have as many virtues as all the men in the world together can have; therefore if I were of a condition and humor to shew any favours unto Aglatidas, I need not fear by this reason that he will be ungratefull. But Megabises, added she, there is such a vast difference between the fortunes of Cyrus and mine, that it is not fit they should be brought into any comparison; so that without any more speeches of me, I beseech you let us speak only of him. I shall ever speak of him with delight (said he unto her) but only this day Madam, I beseech you dispense with it and me both, and give me leave to spend this oportunitie I have to bee alone with you, in beging pardon for not keeping within the limits you prescribed me. I also beleeved Madam, that since you are pleased to permit me the sight of you, so also you will permit me to speak unto unto you; and what coldnesse soever I observe in your eyes, I cannot choose but assure you, that the flame which once they kindled in my heart, is now hotter then ever it was.

Amestris, seeing she could not avoid this discourse which she so much feared; and seeing also that it was in vain, she turned her self towards the dore, to see if any came in to relieve her, she resolved to answer him directly and speedily, lest any should enter before she had ended; so that taking up Megabises very short, I see, said she unto him, that prudence is most requisite of all the virtues, and it is fit sometimes not to let all ones goodnesse appear; for indeed Megabises my indulgence towards you in seeming to forget that I ever desired you to see mee any more, and that you promised mee obedience, is the cause that you speak as you doe: yet know that the reason why I did not forbid you to see me, or discourse of a passion which I cannot answer, was because I thought that this passion had been quite extinguished, and consequently you might perhaps become one of my friends: But since you endeavour to perswade mee that it Page 277 remains still in your soul; Let me once more conjure you to keep within the limits of your promise. I doe confesse Madam (replied hee and smiled) that I made this promise unto the faire Amestris, as daughter unto Artambares, who had disposed of her heart unto Aglatidas, but I never made any promise to the wife or the widow of Otanus, who being absolute mistress of her owne will, ought now to make more elquitable Lawes then this, if shee desire to bee obeyed.

That Amestris of whom you speake, said shee unto him, in changing condition has not changed her thoughts of you. I wish to the gods, replied hee, that shee had changed her thoughts of Aglatidas, and that he should not bee the only happy one amongst so many miserable men: Howsoever, replied shee, I doe expect obedience, and since you cannot see mee but displease me, you shall see mee no more; or at the least, if I cannot avoid it absolutely, you shall never see mee but in Melancholy and Anger. Yet Madam said hee unto her, is it possible you should marry Ottanus, and cast off Aglatidas, for whom you banished mee, and will you not now so much as heare the complaints of a miserable man, on whom, out of your goodnesse, it was your pleasure to bestowe some sweete language when you banished him? for then you told him hee might pretend unto your esteeme and friendship, and that if you had not beene engaged by the command of a father, and your owne inclination to prefer Aglatidas before all the World, you would not have scorned him: Now Madame, since Aglatidas hath broken your chaines, and assumed those of Anatisa, before all the world, in so much as you married Ottanus, tell mee, I beseech you, if after all this I have not some pretence unto your heart, which Ottanus unworthily possessed, and which Aglatidas hath rendred himselfe unworthy of by his inconstancy? Moreover Madam, grant that hee never was really in love with Anatisa, and that by orders from you, hee did dissemble with her, yet I will maintaine hee never did love you rightly, that could doe so much: At the least, I am most certaine, that if you had imposed any such command upon mee, I should never have beene able to obey it. Obey me only in this (replyed shee) Never visite mee any more, nor speake of your pretended passilon; and I shall impose no other difficulties upon you. Had I not seene you change your minde, replyed hee, doubtlesse I should obey you, since heretofore I have done so; but since I have seene you make choice of Ottanus before all the most compleat men in Medea, It is not possible Madam, I should cast off all hope, how rigorous soever you are; for I thinke I may speake it without any vanity, that there is not so great a difference betweene mee and Aglatidas, as there was betweene him and Otta|nus.

Amestris hearing Megabises speak thus, and his discourse bringing into her me|more, all those misfortunes which hee had been the cause of; shee was extreemly troubled: shee wondred that none came in all that time; and turned her self to|wards the dore upon every least noise that her women made: however Megabises, doe or say what shee could, did passe away the greatest part of the afternoon with her: and in answer to the last thing which hee had spoke unto her, shee told him in generall termes, that her marriage with Ottanus, was caused by a secret which none could dive into, and that shee was resolved never to declare it; discovering noe futher unto him, but that hee himself did much contribute towards it. I Madam (said hee in a great amazement!) Yes, you, replyed she; and therefore looking now upon you as the cause of all my misery; Judge your selfe whether I can ever hearken unto what you tell me. I am so ignorant of the crime whereof you accuse mee, said hee unto her, that I cannot tell how to justifie my self. However it bee, answered Amestris, you shall never alter my heart; therefore, if it be possible, alter yours, and assure your selfe that this is the last time that you shall speak with mee in private as long as you live. Megabises would have replied, but that she rise up in a great chafe that none should come in to relieve her, and commanded that her Coach should bee presently made readie, saying shee would goe and visit Menasta. You see (said shee unto him, after she had given that command) how dangerous it is to give an ill exam|ple; for if you had not failed in those respects which you owed unto me, certainly I should not have failed in that civility which I owed unto you.

After this, without hearkning unto his answer, she took up her hood, and going Page 278 unto her glasse to put it on, she constrained Megabises to goe out; yet hee did wait upon her unto her Coach: but when the Porter heard them coming down, he went and hid himself, that he might have some excuse when she returned, in case she should come to know that half of the Town came that day to see her; hee intended to tell her▪ at her return, if she spoke unto him, that hee thought shee was gone out on foot at the garden back dore, and that most of those who came to ask for her, came since shee went out to visit Menasta.

In the mean time Aglatidas passed away many a restlesse minute; for be pleased to know Sir, that we went that afternoon very timely to Amestris, and the Porter told us she was not within; and because we saw her Coach in the Court, we asked him whe|ther any of her friends had borrowed it, or whether she was gone out on foot; and he answered us, that she was gone out at the back garden dore: Then did wee seek out all the neighbourhood for her, but could not hear a word where she was: After wee had made many a short visit, wee came to the house again, and asked whether shee was come home, and the Porter answered No: Then, since Aglatidas was to give her an account of a businesse, which she desired him to doe for one of her friends, unto Cilaxares, hee had an extream desire to meet with her, to let her see how ready hee was to obey her: So that wee went out again, to seek for her in all likely places; wee sent also unto divers houses, to enquire in the name of Menasta for handsomenesse sake▪ whether she was there. Whilst we were going thus from quarter to quarter, from street to steet, and from dore to dore, through all Ecbatane, we met with Tharpis and Artemon several times, who were searching as well as wee; and I think we met most of any qualitie in all the Court; but amongst them all wee met with no Megabises; so that ▪easting with Aglatidas, I told him that fortune in depriving us of the sight of his Mistris; was yet favorable in delivering us from his rivall. Aglatidas blushed at this, and laughing as well as I, told me, that it was no laughing if Megabises should bee all this while with Amestris.

But Sir, after we had the second time visited all the quarters of Ecbatan, we resolved to come unto her house again, and if shee were not there, then goe and lament with Menasta: but presently after wee were answered, that she was not yet returned, staying some twenty or fortie paces from the house, wee saw Amestris come out of her house in her Coach, and Megabises on foot, without any servant following, who crossing the street went into a house opposite the house of Amestris. Judge Sir, what operation this fight had upon the heart of Aglatidas: At the first hee looked upon me, and afterwards turning hastily to see which way Megabises went, and which way Amestris, hee lost the sight of both; for the Coach turned into another street close by, and Megabises went into the house I named before. And indeed it was happie that hee was out of sight, for I am perswaded hee had quarrelled with him without any more delay. Now Artaban said hee unto mee, What doe you think of this? It is ve|ry odd Sir, said I unto him; yet since the like hath happened unto you before, I would advise you, not to judge upon appearances. Why, said hee unto me, Can I make any doubt of my misfortune, when I see they have denyed Amestris to be within, both to me and every one else, whilst all that while Megabises hath been alone with her? How Artaban, can you interpret this any waies advantageously for me? When you saw Megabises, replyed I, with Amestris in the Garden by the Fountain, and with your own eyes saw him kisse the hand of that fair and virtuous Lady, did you not then think that you had as much reason to be jealous as now? yet the event did apparently manifest that you wronged her, and that she was most innocent and faithfull.

I doe confesse it, said he, yet what I now see is very considerable, and more strange; and I pray you Artaban, what doe you thinke of it? I cannot tell answered I, yet I advise you to speake with Amestris, and see what satisfaction she will give, before you precipitately resolve upon any thing; at the first Aglatidas could not re|solve upon that course, but all his thoughts were of revenge upon Megabises; but I conceiving by the way they went, that she was gone unto Menasta, did urge him very importunately to goe thither, and so we did; but I never in all my life saw such an all|teration as was in the face of Aglatidas, and coming into Menasta's chamber, where we found much company, he never looked who he was first to salute, but observing Page 279 the eyes of Amestris, he saw her so troubled and reserved, that he took it for an argu|ment of her crime. Madam, said he aloud, It is not my fault that I did not wait upon you before this time of the day; for I have beene at your house three times since dinner, nor was there any negligence in me, said Tharpis, for I have beene there as oft as Aglatidas, nor was I much short in my duty said Artemon, for I was there twice. Truly, said Menasta, I doe not know how Amestris hath this day disposed of her selfe; for all that came this day unto me, told me they were at her house, and sought her all over the towne, and could find her no where: Many that were present also said the same. Amestris all the while was so amazed she knew not what to answer since she was all that while at home when they sought for her: Menasta, wondering at her silence, and never suspecting any hidden mistery in the matter, pressed her to answer. Tell us, I beseech you, said she unto her, what you have beene employed in? Or if you will not, I shall thinke the Ghost of Otanus hath appeared unto you and commanded you to be retired. Truly (answered Amestris aloud) I am so much amazed at what I heare, that I know not what to say, for indeede I was never out of my owne Chamber untill I came hither, and Megabises (said she and blushed) hath beene with me all the afternoone. Aglatidas, thinking she said this only because per|haps wee might see them come out together, could not withhold the expressions of some unquietnesse in his looks: But Amestris, desiring to justifie her selfe before all the company, asked all those who said they had beene at her house, whom they spoke withall; and as she particularly asked Aglatidas, who told her he enquired of the Por|ter; I confesse, said she aloud, since it is so as you tell me, I may bee suspected of great familiarity with Megabises; But I can assure you, without any Lie, that whither it was I was in an ill humor, or he was so, I know not, but we found no pleasant agreeablenesse together. Yet Madam, said Aglatidas, his visite continued very long: I thought it so, replyed she; yet notwithstanding, said Artemon, the conversation of those who newly come from travell, useth to bee very pleasant: Yes doubtlesse, replyed Tharpis, but perhaps Megabises did not thinke it fit to entertain her with discourse of the stately walls of Babylon, or the River of Euphrates, with the Grandure of Artaxates, or such like: However said she (and interrupted him) I must know at my retourne how this designe comes to passe: After this Aglatidas spoke not a word, and as Amestris could not chuse but aske the eyes of Aglatidas what hee thought of this passage, so she looked upon him very oft, and the more shee did him that favour, the more did he suspect her of infidelity: Since it was now very late, the company was forced to break off, and Tharpis also ret|yred, because Amestris made it knowne she would sup with Menasta.

Aglatidas would have gone away before he had rendred an account of his businesse, but she making that her pretence to stay him longer then the rest, Aglatidas said shee unto him; I beleeve you have some businesse with me which concerns my felfe, and therefore I would speake with you. Madam, said he unto her, I did not thinke you had beene very earnest to know it, since you caused some to tell me you were not with|in the same day I was to render you an account of it. Doe you think (said she unto him, seeing none but Menasta and my self in the chamber) that it was by any order from me you did not enter? Madam, said hee, I had good cause to think you ought to bee obeyed in your own house. And doubtlesse you believe, said she, that Megabises was permitted to enter when every one else was denied? speak Aglatidas (said she seeing him silent) what doe you think of it? I respect you so much (said he and sighed) that I dare not tell you what I think. You tell mee enough said shee, in telling mee no more: but since I confesse that there are circumstances and appearances against me, I will be so favorable as not to condemne you of any lightnesse, but will justifie my self in the presence of Menasta and Artaban; but after this Aglatidas, I doe expect to bee obeyed in all things, without any exception. And as soon as hee promised an absolute obedience, Amestris related all the discourse which had passed between her and Me|gabises, her vexations and anger, to see that none came in to relieve her, and her su|spition that there was some trick or other put upon her; so that to cleer the matter, shee sent for the Porter; when hee was come, she asked him, why he told every one that day shee was not within, since hee knew very well she was? Pardon me Madam, I Page 280 beseech you, said hee unto her, for the fault which I committed against my will, thinking you to be gone out at the garden back dore. But if you had thought so, replyed shee, you would not have let Megabises enter. Megabises! Madam (replyed hee, and seemed to wonder) I did not let him enter; if he did come in, it must needs be very timely, whilst I stept into the Town about a little businesse, immediately after dinner, not thinking any would come so soon; at my return I asked a boy whether you went out since I went, and he told me you were gone out at the back dore; and certainly he took one of your women for you; and I doe assure you I saw none of Megabises his men at the gate, for if I had, I should have known he had been there; but since I saw none, I could not imagine he was entred, since hee never comes alone. And how came it to passe (said Amestris to him) that you were from the gates when I went out. Be|cause I went to the garden dore, replyed hee, thinking some had knocked: and to tell you the truth Madam, when I understood that you were not gone forth, but had gi|ven orders to make ready your Coach, I was so much ashamed of my fault, that I durst not look you in the face; but I can tell you the names of all those who came to wait upon you: Then did he begin to number up all that came to ask for her that day, beginning with Aglatidas and my self, and went on with Tharpis and Artemon: But Amestris stopping him, was angry that the answers of this man did not handsomly justifie her self, and did let him know by her threatning language, that he was to pro|vide himself of another Mistris. When hee was gone out Amestris looking upon A|glatidas, did know by his eyes he was not satisfied: I perceive, said shee unto him, that the answers of my Porter have not justified me in your opinion. Truly Madam, replyed he, it was not from him I expected the satisfaction I have need of. Yet it was hee who denyed you the Gate, replyed shee, and let Megabises enter. I confesse it, replyed Aglatidas; yet if Megabises was not preferred unto that honour by your own orders, it troubles me much lesse; and to know that Madam, I must appeal unto your own mouth.

If you will take my word, said shee unto him, you shall bee quickly satisfied: for I doe protest unto you Aglatidas, I gave no order at all that day eyther to open the gates or shut them, or deny my selfe unto any whosoever, and if I had excepted a|gainst any, certainly it should not have beene Megabises. Madam, said hee unto her▪ you give me most obliging satisfaction; but when I thinke of Megabises being a whole afternoone with you in private, and saw him come out alone presently after you had taken coach, I did conclude Madam, whether I would or no, that you were eyther not sincere (if I can speake it without offence) or else that your Porter had be|trayed you. Men of his condition are such block-heads, said Menasta, that there is nothing to be concluded by their impertinent words or deedes: This fellow replied I, seemes not to have done this, without some designe in it: What Artaban, said A|mestris to me, are you against me also? Pardon me Madam (said I unto her) for I thinke the more I suspect the Porter, the more I justifie you; yet Aglatidas, said she, I beseech you tell me what I should doe, not only to perswade you that I never con|sented unto the private conference with Megabises, but also to make the Towne believe it. I know one infallible way replied Aglatidas and sighed; but Madam, I am afraid you will not take it. It shall bee a very difficult one then replied she; for I assure you I am so extremely vexed, that any should think I consented Megabises should be four hours together with me in private, as I would doe any thing to unde|ceive them; therefore tell me Aglatidas, how I should justifie my self, both in your opinion, and in the opinion of all the world. If you will appeare perfectly innocent Madam, said hee unto her, you must make me happy, and marrie mee; for I know no greater testimony of your innocency; therefore Madam, if you please, I beseech you resolve upon this way of justification. But Aglatidas, said shee, I very well see, that this way would justifie me to your self, but not to the world. I can assure you Ma|dam, replied hee, that your virtue is so generally known, as when they know you are fully resolved to prefer me before all the rest of your Lovers, they will never suspect you of any familiarity with Megabises: I must confesse unto you Madam, that the violent passion of my soul cannot endure the torment, to see you and not see you (if it be permitted me to say so) for I doe not call that a seeing you, when I passe away Page 281 a whol afternoon with you amongst my enemies; for so Madam all sincere Lovers use to call their Rivals: Doe not think, I beseech you, I say this out of any fantastick jealousy; No Madam, it proceeds from pure affection: and though the presence of my Rivals doe trouble mee much more then any others; yet a Lover in his height of sinceritie cannot enjoy the conversation of the partie Loved, when any shares with him: Love Madam, loves secrecy; and thoughts that passe from one heart into ano|ther, loves no witnesses; permit me therefore Madam, I beseech you, the happinesse to tell you, that I love you above all expressions, and loves not to tell you so, even Menasta her self shall bee present. Since Ottanus did use me very ill, said Amestris, It becomes mee to doe more then others: yet since there are more eyes upon me then upon others, I cannot be too cir|cumspect: therefore Aglatidas, in consideration of your good fortune and happinesse as well as of my own, it is good to bee well assured wee shall bee happie together, be|fore wee engage our selves too far. Ah Madam, cryed hee out, you need not doubt of my good fortune or your own. However, said she, I cannot give you a direct an|swer now. Will you then not justifie your self, replied hee? Yes, said shee, but I would have you take my word.

All this while Menasta and I were talking together, but still overheard what they said: and fearing that Aglatidas and Megabises would quarrel, she left me and went to them: Truly Amestris, said she, I wonder at you; for doe you not resolve in your heart to marrie Aglatidas? If you doe, why doe you defer it? would you have him fight with two or three for you? Would you have him kill one, and fly for it, and return in a disguise? Would you have him finde you in the Garden again talking with some of your Lovers whom you would banish? Would you have him jealous again, and counterfeite a fresh love to Anatisa? would you marrie another Ottanus to justifie your self and punish him? Beleeve me Amestris, if you would avoid all these, you must marry Aglatidas presently, and lead a happie life. Menasta spoke all this with such a pleasant importunitie, that Amestris could not choose but laugh: and as for Aglatidas, hee thanked her in such a manner as made it appear hee thought himself much obliged. For my part, I added my prayers unto Menasta's reasons, and pressed Amestris so far, that she could hardly choose but answer our desires: And when shee went about to oppose against us, and demand time to consider, Menasta councelled Aglatidas to think that she consented to the private discourse with Megabises. But doe what we could, she would have two dayes time to consider, and then to give her positive answer. After this Menasta telling her in a low voyce, she feared a quarrel with Megabises; Amestris did absolutely command Aglatidas the contrary; and hee was forced to promise her he would not, provided shee gave him a favourable an|swer.

Thus Sir, this private conference which Megabises had so subtly contrived for his own advantage, was a cause moving Amestris unto resolutions in favour of Aglatidas. After this we retired: But notwithstanding all that Amestris had said, Aglatidas was very unquiet in his soul, and what he had seen had such an influence upon his minde, that all the night I could not move him to speak of any thing else. In the mean while Menasta made Amestris to declare openly unto all the world in favour of Aglatidas, knowing then that none durst bee so bold as to interrupt his happinesse, considering what favour hee was in with Ciaxares. But since shee had a great desire to discover whether her Porter had told her true or cozened her, when shee was returned home and in her chamber, she employed one of her women, who was very wittie and subtle, to enquire very narrowly, whether the Porter held any familiarity with any of Megabises servants. Madam, answered she, I know not whether he hold any intelligence with any of his servants, but I am sure, that as I returned from the Temple these two mornings, I saw Megabises talking with him at the corner of a blind street; yet since I thought that Megabises only asked him whether you were at the Temple, or whe|ther you would presently goe abroad, or some such questions, I went on and took no further notice of them.

No sooner had the woman told this to Amestris, but shee imediately sent for the Porter again, to ask him what Megabises said unto him such a day, such an hour, and Page 282 in such a place. The man was so startled at this question, that he trembled, and gave but a very bad answer: So that Amestris not giving him so much time as to invent a lye, began to threaten him, and tell him that if hee would confesse the truth, she would pardon him: Then after many ill answers, which would be too tedious to relate, hee confessed that Megabises sent one of his men for him, that hee gave him monie; and indeed told the whol truth. After this, Amestris, fearing some future misfortune might be occasioned by Megabises, resolved to marry Aglatidas.

In the meane time Tharpis and Artemon. had their shares in vexations as well as o|thers: The first of those two had not the happinesse of complayning to Anatisa, for she was gone into the Country, yet since she was not above fiftie furlongs from Ec|batan, he writ unto her; as for Artemon, as deepe in love with Amestris as hee was, yet being more wise, and seeing how she lived with Aglatidas, he desisted, and durst attempt no further manifestations of his Love; but yet, since hope never leaves L|overs till the last gaspe, before he quite excluded the Image of Amestris out of his heart he would know a little more certainly upon what terms Aglatidas stood with her: So that since we two were a kind of friends together, and knew that I was very much one unto Aglatidas, he came unto me and desired me to tell him, in generall, whe|ther the heart of Amestris was so deeply engaged that there was no hopes at all left for those that loved her: I know very well, said he unto me, you ought not to reveale a|ny secret wherewith you are trusted; but however, being your friend, as I am, I know you will not refuse to advise me, in a businesse upon which depends the misery or happinesse of all my life; give me leave therefore to tell you, that I am extremely in love with Amestris; but for all that, if I were sure her heart were engaged unto a|nother, I would endeavor to recall my owne; therefore I beseech you, tell me what is my best to doe: Artemon spoke this with so much ingenuity, that I thought my self obliged to counsell him sincerely, and to doe good service unto three at once: To Amestris, in delivering her from Artemons importunity: To Aglatidas, in taking a Rivall off his hand: And to Artemon, in curing him of a passion which would never be accepted; yet since there is no trusting the sinceritie of a Lover, I acquainted him with nothing of what I knew concerning Aglatidas and Amestris, but I advised him to try whether he could possibly quit his affection; for I knew Amestris would never accept of it; I coloured my Councell with other reasons; I told him, that since Megabises and Aglatidas, who were in great favour with Ciaxares, did pretend unto her, there was no hopes for him against such Rivals, for they had beene both in love with her before she married Ottanus, and that in all likelihood, if ever she married againe, she would chuse one of them two: However, his best way would be to stay and see what time would produce: Artemon gave me thanks for my advice, though it went against the heart of a Lover. In the meane while Amestris, who had sent for Menasta, to discover unto her what she knew concerning the trick which Megabises put upon her, resolved now to deferre it no longer, but to declare openly for Aglatidas, and to tell him as much; But Amestris conceived, that since Megabises had ever ex|pressed much passionate affection to her, it would not be amisse if Menasta spoke unto him, and endeavored to prevent any quarrell; yet there was no such neede: for as soon as Aglatidas did ask the Kings permission to marry Amestris, Ciaxares knowing the pretentions of Megabises to her, did absolutely command him, not to hinder the good fortune of Aglatidas; So that hee durst not oppose it. Then since the businesse made a great noise, Artemon was glad hee took my counsel, and Tharpis seeing Megabises durst not complain against the happinesse of his Rivall, out of obedience to the King, hee was forced to follow his example, and hide his sorrows.

Thus Sir you see Aglatidas as happie as he could desire; for Amestris had made the plot of Megabises so apparent unto him, that not the least suspition remained in his mind. All the Kindred and Friends of Amestris approved of her choice, and all those that loved Aglatidas was glad of it; not a Rivall durst appear: Megabises shunned his Rivall and his Mistris both: Artemon complained unto none but me, and sweetened his sorrows by relating unto me the virtues of Amestris whilst Ottanus lived: And Tharpis went into the Countrey to Anatisa, who was vexed in so high a measure, that it may be tearmed rage rather then sorrow or revenge. In the meane while nothing Page 283 hindred Aglatidas from his happinesse, and he had no other torment but impatience, which never leaves Lovers untill all be compleated: All the Court and Towne rejoyced at this intended marriage; for the solemnitie of which, a thousand publique diversions were preparing: The day was set down by the King himself, who would honour this feast with his presence: The invention of all the Ladies in Court and Town were upon the rack for new dresses against that day. Amestris and Aglatidas, dis|coursing together with more freedom then before, did so infuse their souls into each other, that their loves increased, and by consequence their happinesse, it being certain that the felicitie of Lovers does not lesse consist in the reciprocal opinion of each o|thers merits, then that of their passion.

This being the state of things, and there being but three dayes untill the marriage, a chance happened which did extreemly trouble the joyes of Aglatidas and Amestris; I think I already told you that Anatisa was fiftie furlongs from Ec|batan, and that Tharpis went unto her. As they were one day walking together neer the way which goes to Ec|batan, and consulting which way they might trouble the felicitie of Aglatidas and Amestris, they spied a man on hors-back, who left the high-way and came towards them. Anatisa, who was not in any humor to receive visits, would have avoided him; yet imagining that perhaps it was one who came to see her Aunt, with whom shee dwelt, she continued her walk as if shee took no notice of him who was coming towards them: But a woman which waited upon her, knowing him to bee her brother that waited upon Ottanus, she cryed our, and went with open armes to em|brace him, for hee was lighted from his horse, and gave him unto a man which waited on him. Anatisa, at the cry of her woman, who thought her brother dead, looked upon him and knew him to be Dinocrates, who had done her much service in augmenting the jealousy of Otanus, and persecuted Amestris: So that in consideration of these offices she talked with him, and asked how he lost his Master, and why it was so long be|fore he returned. Then hee made a relation, how Otanus perished under the Mount|ains of Artaxates, unto which the King of Armenia retreated; how hee saw his body in the Torrent, and how hee sunk to the bottom of the water; and how hee himself fell sick in a little Town; how afterwards hee had got him another Master, but not liking his service hee quitted it and returned: and since hee was to passe so neer a place where hee thought she might bee, hee came thither. But Dinocrates, said shee unto him, tell mee, I pray you, whether Ottanus when hee died did hate Aglatidas. Hee hated him so much, answered hee, that I beleeve it was the cause of his death: for hee would not have engaged himself so far amongst the enemies, but in hopes to meet with him, and to kill him: for my part, said hee, since the fight-was in the night, I cannot tell how the misfortune happened, but I saw him dead with these eyes, and so did ma|ny others.

Whilst hee was speaking thus unto her, shee looked upon the hilt of his sword, which was much too rich and magnificent for a man of his qualitie to wear, and con|sidering upon it, shee knew it to bee the sword of Aglatidas. Those who doe not know the power of love, would wonder Anatisa should take any notice of this sword: but for my part I think it not strange at all; for I am perswaded that every thing which belongs unto the party loved will never out of memorie. Moreover this hilt was so very rich and extraordinarie, that it was the more remarkable, and shee had seen it a thousand times before. Anatisa no sooner knew it, but shee asked who gave it unto him: And he told her, that a few dayes after the death of his Master, as he was in Artaxates, he bought it of a Persian Soldier, who told him hee pulled it out of the bodie of a dead Armenian at the bottom of the Mountains where they fought. Anatisa, after this knew that Aglatidas had left his sword (as sometimes it may happen) in the body of him hee killed. And saying no more, shee left Dinocrates with his si|ster, and continued her walk with Tharpis; but so taken up with her own thoughts, that he could not choose but ask her, why her minde was more musing then ordinary. I am studying, said shee unto him, how to make you happie if I can, or at the least to disturb the felicitie of your Rivall. Hee stands upon too sure terms, replied Tharpis, for mee ever to hope for it. Not so sure, said Anatisa, but if Dinocrates will bee as faithfull unto mee as heretofore he hath been, I shall bring it easily to passe. Tharpis Page 284 was so impatient to know her designe, that he assured her he would suborn him though with half his estate rather then faile; so that she told him her plot, and he did so well approve of it, that he was ready to thank her upon his knees, for finding out so rare an invention: After this, without any delay, Anatisa called Dinocrates, and told him she would make him a fortune if he would doe as she desired; Tharpis also assured him of a very rich present.

Dinocrates was naturally apt enough for such designes, and therefore promised to obey them, whatsoever it was they would command; Then did they tell him their desires, after they had well agreed upon the businesse, and given Dinocrates full instructions what to doe and say; they found it not expedient it should be knowne hee had seen them; so that after they had expresly charged his sister to conceal his return from every one, they sent him to lodge in the Towne close by, and the next morning meeting in the same place, Tharpis was as good as his word, and charmed him with a very considerable gift, after which she gave him his last instructions and sent him away charging him to be sure that he did not goe unto Amestris untill there was much company with her.

One afternoon then, just three dayes before the intended marriage, he went unto her whilst Aglatidas was with the King, but he found Menasta and four other Ladies with her, who were of kin to Ottanus, and because they loved her they came upon a visite; Dinocrates watching his opportunity, went into the Chamber of Amestris: As soone as she saw him enter, she blushed, and the very sight of him brought fresh into her memory the persecutions of Ottanus, and all the ill offices which he had done her; yet thinking it more generous and handsome to dissemble her resentments against Dinocrates, and to looke upon him as one whom her husband loved, she recollected her selfe, and speaking very mildly unto him; how comes it to passe Dinocrates, said she, that it is so long after your Masters death, before you returne. Madam, replied he and sighed, I was so troubled at the accident, that I fell sick for sorrow, but as soone as I recovered I returned, Madam, to give you an account of my Masters misfortune: I saw you, said I unto him, when you sought for his corps and found it in the midst of the Torrent: It is very true Sir, replied he, and you were a witness of part of my sorrowes that I could not get it out of the water: Were you in the fight when he was killed? said Amestris. Yes Madam replied he, and I touched Aglatidas, whom I knew by his voice when he ran his sword through the body of my Master and could not draw it out againe: Your Master (replied I, extremely astonished, but lesse then Amestris) was he killed by Aglatidas? thinke well what you say Dinocrates, for how could you know him in the tumult of Combat, and when there was no light but starres? I told you Sir before, answered Dinocrates undauntedly, that I knew him by his voice; for when he fell upon my Master, who was then in the head of a Partie, he spoke something unto the men which followed him by way of encouragement: So that my Master, knowing the voice of Aglatidas better then I did, turned towards me and said; Ha Dinocrates, yonder is Aglatidas whom I looke for, doe not forsake me: I cannot directly say that Aglatidas knew my Masters voice; but I am sure they charged one another very fiercely, and Aglatidas, more happy then Ottanus, ran his sword to the hilts through his body, who immediately falling Aglatidas could not draw out his sword againe: then I seeing my Master fall, knew not whether I should fall upon his murderer, or endeavor to recover him from the feet of those who were fighting; but the tumult of the combat, removing a little from that place, I tooke up the body of my Master, to see if he had any life; I pulled the sword out of his body by little and little, and finding no breath nor life, I began to defend my selfe; Then Aglatidas having got another sword, and I knowing him better then I did before, resolved to revenge the death of my Master; but our Partie was growne so weake, that we <...> were forced to fly, and I could not returne to looke for the Corps of my Master untill <...> such time as a truce was made, and then when I had the liberty to looke for him, <◇> could not find him in the place where I left him, but immediately after I saw him in th <...> midst of a violent torrent, as Artaban saith, not knowing who it was that cast him <...> in. All the while of this discourse Amestris was infinitely perplexed and durst <◇> looke up: The Ladies which were present, and understood the state of things, w <...> Page 285 very sorry to hear this Relation: for my part, my choller was so high, that I could hardly refrain interrupting Dinocrates, who seeming to be altogether ignorant of any intended Marriage betweene Amestris and Aglatidas, did peremptorily justifie that it was hee who killed Ottanus, and that the sword which hee drew out of his body, was the sword of Aglatidas, for it was a sword which was very remarkable, and hee had seene him weare it severall times: Then Dinocrates, seeming as if he were very ingenious, I will not say (said hee) that for this Aglatidas is in any fault at all; for in war none whosoever of the enemies partie are to bee spared. But where is this Sword? replied I. Sir (answered hee with tears almost in his eyes) I dare not shew it in the presence of my Lady, for I cannot indure to looke upon it my self, nor know I upon what considerations I have kept it.

As hee was saying so, Aglatidas, who yet knew not that Dinocrates was returned, came into the Chamber of Amestris with eyes as full of joy, as if nothing could hinder his happinesse; but perceiving an extream sadness sit upon the soul of Amestris, seeing Dinocrates there, and observing much astonishment in me and all the Ladies present, hee stood still, and bethought himself what misfortune could possibly happen. Aglatidas (said I unto him) come and justifie your self; for Dinocrates here, says you killed Ottanus that same night when wee fought at the bottome of the Artaxaten Mountains. Who I? (replied Aglatidas in a strange amazement) how can that be since the illustrious Cyrus told mee hee heard a crye that Ottanus was dead, in a place where I was not? And I my self heard Ottanus named far off the place where we fought. Sir (replied Dinocrates most impudently) I am very sorry that I have uttered a truth which I see doth much trouble you; yet, as I said before, when any one is killed in warrs, the person who killed him is never looked after. But Sir (said one that was Cozen to Ottanus and thought to justifie Aglatidas by the question which shee asked) Did you lose your Sword in that fight? Yes Madam, answered hee; for I could not pull it out of the body of an Armenian, but was constrained to leave it in him, and snatched another by good fortune, out of the hands of another Armenian. Ah Aglatidas, said Amestris, what doe you tell me? Since he could not imagine why Amestris should speak so, or why the other Ladie should speak of his Sword, nor how they should come to know hee had lost it; hee turned towards mee, and I told him that Dinocrates affirmed he had the Sword, and that he drew it out of his Masters body. The Sword, said Aglatidas, is so knowable, that none can mistake it for another, and I believe that every one of my friends and acquaintance knows it; but where is it, added hee? Sir, replied Dinocrates, if it be your pleasure I should send for it, I will let you see it in the outer Chamber. Then Aglatidas pressing him unto it, Dinocrates went out: during which time hee looked upon Amestris, who had no disposition to looke upon him: Madam, said hee unto her, I see very well, that if Dinocrates shew me my Sword, and affirm hee pulled the same out of his Masters body, I cannot make it clear that I did not kill Ottanus, since I must ingeniously confesse, that I left it in the bodie of a man who was in the same Partie Ottanus was; yet for all that Madam, I must needs believe the relation of Dinocrates to be false, since he hath ever been your enemy in all things; he is brother unto a woman who waits upon Anatisa, and therefore what ever proceeds from the testimonie of his tongue ought to be suspected. But Aglatidas, said Amestris, I finde by your own confession, that you left your Sword in a dead man; Dinocrates says that man was Ottanus; and if once he shew you your own Sword, you can then no way contradict him, but by saying, that you did not know it was Ottanus whom you killed: and that's too little, abundance too little against so strong and circumstantiall a deposition as this; therefore I conjure you to see me no more, untill you can better clear your self. Oh Madam, cryed hee out, what fatall request is this?

As Amestris was ready to reply, one came in and told us, that Dinocrates was in the outer Room, and had brought the Sword: Aglatidas therefore went out, and so did all the Ladies except Menasta, who stayed with Amestris. As soon as this Sword was shewed, which wee knew well enough, Aglatidas looked sternly upon Dinocrates, and not knowing what to say in his own justification, hee searched in his eyes to see if he could know by them whether hee was innocent or culpable: But Dinocrates did so subtly dissemble the matter, that it was not possible to discern his malice. Aglatidas Page 286 was so full of furie in his looks, that sometimes I thought hee would have killed Dinocrates; and had he not imagined that he should have appeared more criminall by the Act, I doe believe hee would have fallen upon him: But at the last, not knowing what to say, nor being able to ascertain himself that hee had not killed Ottanus, hee went towards the Chamber of Amestris, with intentions to cast himself at her feet though hee knew not well what to say: But Menasta met him with absolute commands from Amestris that he should not enter, and that he should be so respective of her as never to see her untill he could make his innocence better appeare. Aglatidas could hardly yeeld obedience, but Menasta used such arguments as perswaded him. Then we went out both he and I, after we had examined Dinocrates, by a hundred crosse questions, in hopes he would contradict himselfe; but he was so subtle in all his answers, and in the least circumstances, that the most exact Judges would have beene fully satisfied with them, and condemned Aglatidas: After we were gone out, the Ladies stayed a while with Amestris, and afterwards went out, all except Menasta, who stayed with her, as I did with Aglatidas. Dinocrates went downe also, and told all the story unto the servants of the house, to the end the noise of it might be the lowder; but he might have saved that labor, for within foure houres after he had spoken with Amestris, nothing else but the oddnesse of this accident was discoursed of in all Ecbatan.

In the meane time, I knew from Menasta that she had no sooner beene in private with Amestris, but that faire and wise Lady, looking upon her with eyes so full of melancholy, as plainly spoke the trouble of her soule; Truly said shee unto Menasta, it must needs be acknowledged that my fate is lamentable, and that I was too blame in ever hoping for any quietnesse, after so long and so cruell a torment; but I am at this day arrived unto such a height, that hope can never againe elevate my heart, and therefore can never augment my torment since I shall endure no more miseries then I looked for. I must needs confesse (said Menasta to her) that the accident is very strange; but yet since Aglatidas doth verily believe that he did not kill Ottanus, and since there is only the relation of Dinocrates against him; why should you make your selfe miserable all the dayes of your life by any such tormenting thoughts? Because replied she, I can never have any contentment of minde without honour, and will never be accused for doing any thing against decency and virtue. As soone as she had thus expressed her selfe, Dinocrates came into her Chamber, who apprehending as hee seemed that he should incur the hatred of Amestris and Aglatidas. Madam, said hee unto her, I most humbly beg your Pardon for the fault which I have ignorantly committed, for since I came directly to your Chamber, before I had spoken with any, I did not know of the designes betwixt you and Aglatidas, for if I had, questionlesse I should have concealed some part of that truth which I have uttered: But perhaps Aglatidas killed my Master and knew it not, or if it be your pleasure Madam I shall contradict what I have already said, and never shew the sword unto any, to the end it may not be knowne: Dinocrates spoke this with so much counterfeit ingenuitie, that though Amestris had heretofore seene a hundred demonstrations of his malice, yet shee was deceived, and thought that now certainly he spoke sincerely; yet she would not accept of his offer, but told him that though none upon earth knew of the businesse but her self, yet she would doe what became her. After this shee dismissed him, and assured him she would desire Aglatidas not to be revenged on him, for being the cause of his misfortune. Doe you then intend never to see him again (said Menasta after Dinocrates was gone.) There is no question to be made of it (answered she) for how can any reason permit me to see the man that hath killed my Husband? But Madam, said Menasta, hee never intended it, nor can I beleieve he killed him. That is not sufficient, answered Amestris; for though I were most certain, hee did never intend it, yet all's one, I would doe the same only because the world believes it, and will suspect I knew of it: Not that I can accuse Aglatidas for killing him; but yet for all that, since it is known hee dyed by his hand, there needs no more to oblige me never to see him again, nor to render my self the most miserable person in the world. Whilst Menasta was talking thus to Amestris, I was no lesse busie in comforting Aglatidas, who could not chuse but admire how the Fates did interrupt his happinesse: for, said hee, how can I possibly justifie my self, since I am not certain whether Dinocrates Page 287 speak true or false? I am most certain that I knew him not to bee Ottanus, and that I heard him named far off me: but yet for all that, I know the Sword which they shew mee is mine, and that I could not draw it out of the body of an enemy which fell dead at my feat, and it might bee Ottanus, since he was in the fight. But, said I unto him, why did you not disclaim your Sword? for I am perswaded that Love does admit of some handsome innocent lies, which does no hurt unto any. I should rather prejudice then justifie my self, said Aglatidas, if I should have disowned the Sword, since all men of any qualitie in the Court doe know it: And Megabises amongst the rest could have known it to bee a lye, for hee hath seen it a hundred times; so that Amestris might well have suspected that I knew him to bee Ottanus when I killed him: neither doe I think it generous to become happie by lying. But I doe so plainly see the gods intend my ruine, that I verily believe I cannot better observe their wills then by destroying my self: yet first I am resolved to see Amestris, and therefore I conjure you to goe unto Menasta, and procure her to obtain this favour for me; for truly I can not conceive it just to condemn me before shee hear my reasons. Then did I go accordingly to doe him this service; but Menasta told mee shee thought it would bee no easy matter to obtain, yet shee would doe what shee could. In the mean time Analtisa, to take the fuller joy in her plot, returned to Ecbatan, and divulged that Aglatidas knew well enough when hee killed Ottanus, and that Amestris, as innocent as she made her self, knew it also. This last report found credit but with very few; Yet since Amestris was very inquisitive of what the Town talked, and hearing of all the impostures, she did so confirm her self in her resolutions, never to marry Aglatidas, or see him again, that Menasta could not obtain leave for him to come and plead his reasons; So that there was a necessitie in deceiving her, and to see her, whether shee did consent unto it or no: not that shee did not all this while love him with abundance of tendernesse, but it was the consideration of her honour that was predominate in her soul, Whilst Aglatidas and Amestris were thus miserable, Anatisa and Tharpis rejoiced, Artemon and Megabises were glad; and to drive the nail unto the bottom of the plot, Anatisa did cause reports to bee blown in the ears of Amestris, that the world did infinitely commend her resolution of never marrying Aglatidas or seeing him again, so that shee gave such resolute answers unto Menasta, that there was no hopes of obtaining any thing for poor Aglatidas.

Three or foure daies passed on in this manner; but at the last Menasta, feigning her selfe to be sick, purposely that Amestris might come to visit her; her plot took effect, and Aglatidas, with my selfe knowing it, went thither: Menasta gave orders that none should enter except us: as for Amestris, though her Coach stood at the doore, yet every one, knowing the great familiarity betweene them, were not at all offended that she should enter and none else. When we came into the Chamber, Amestris was sitting upon Menastae's bed, so that Aglatidas was upon his knees before her, ere ever she knew he was entred. Madam, said he unto her, and would not let her rise, I beseech you give me leave to present you with my reasons, before you shall proceede to judgement, lest you should be guilty of some injustice. Amestris, without answering Aglatidas, looked upon Menasta, as if she accused her for deceiving her, and indeed had gone out, if Menasta had not held her by the gowne. Alas Menasta, said she, what will the world think of me, if it be knowne I permit Aglatidas to see mee? Alas Madam, replied I, what shall we say of you, if you will not so much as heare the complaints of a man you have made most miserable? If he could say any thing which could justifie himselfe, replied she, I should heare him with abundance of delight, but since he cannot, why should you desire mee to lay such a staine upon my reputation, as nothing can possibly efface? I know not Madam what Justice there is in crediting the relation of a man who heretofore has told a thousand lies against you. I doe confesse his tale is told handsomly and confirmed with strong conjectures; but for all that Madam, I doe assure you with all possible sinceritie, and doe conjure you by all the gods whom we adore to beleeeve it, that I did never intend to kill Ottanus, nor did so much as know whether he was in the fight or no: And I doe also most seriously protest, that though I did alwaies hate him, yet if I had knowne him amongst mine enemies, I should for the love of you have shunned meeting with him; therefore Madam, though Page 288 it be true that I did kill Ottanus, as I cannot beleeeve I did, yet was not the act to be imputed unto me as a crime, since I knew him not, yet upon the bare deposition of one of your grand persecutors, who hath accused me for killing a most extreme Tyrant in the wars; you Madam, will make me the most miserable man upon Earth, and you will be so highly severe against me as not to heare my complaints. I conjure you Madam in the name of the Gods not to condemne me so sleightly, or at the least not to condemne me so soone. I wish to the gods whom you invoke, said Amestris, that I could never condemne you, but that your innocence might appeare as cleere as the day; but Aglatidas it cannot, for truly to speake sincerely unto you, although I were most certain that all Dinocrates sayes were false; yet were I not able to undeceive the world, and therefore I must never marry you: your amitie, replied Aglatidas, were built upon a weak basis if it were not able to withstand such a consideration as this; for bee pleased to know Madam, that true virtue is not built upon the opinion of others; but when one hath that secret Testimonie of a cleere Conscience on their side it is satisfaction sufficient, and one never neede to make ones selfe miserable for the satisfaction of others. But Madam, said he and sighed, I am afraid you are not sensible of my ruin.

Yes Aglatidas, replied Amestris, do not deceive your self, for I have so high an esteeme of you, and if I durst say, it, so great an affection, that I cannot think you guilty of any crime. I doe believe all you say, and consequently doe think, that if you killed Ottanus, it was ignorantly; yet for all that, if I should marry you, the censorious world would perhaps be apt to say, that you did it by my appointment; So that this thought doth so deeply wound my imagination and my honour, that I must use all expedients to make my very enemies think me innocent: and in order to that Aglatidas, I must not only refuse to marry you, but also never to see you again; and if you have any power over your own soul, you will finde out some handsome pretence to depart from Ec|batan: yet for your comfort I doe assure you, because I think I may doe it without a crime, that I think it an easier matter for me to dye then part with you. I doe most heartily beseech you Madam (said Aglatidas with most sorrowfull eyes) eyther bee all severitie or all sweetnesse; either content your self with the innocency of my heart and let m enjoy yours, or else expresse so many signes of scorn and inhumanitie, that I may die with sorrow at your feet; for what delight can you take Madam, in prolonging my life by giving me such obliging language, and to augment my misery? How doe you think it possible I can shake hands with death, as long as I think the divine Amestris loves mee? And how doe you think I can endure my life when I certainly see shee shall never be mine? and when as I am in some fears (if I du-st say it) some other hereafter shall enjoy her? Never fear this last, replied Amestris, but on the contrary, be certainly perswaded, that the heart which I had given you shall never bee in the power of any other.

Your expressions are most obliging, replied Aglatidas; but Madam, the miseries which I suffer are so great, that I cannot handsomly resent that joy which those advantageous words might give mee; for I see it is your pleasure I should never hope for any thing either from tedious time or your divine affection, or my most loyall fidelitie: whosoever should have told me, when Ottanus lived, that I should have been more miserable after his death, I could not have believed him; and yet there is no comparison between then and now; Ottanus in his grave doth more cruelly torment mee then hee did alive: Yes Madam, I doe most ingeniously confesse, that without ever any contrivance of his death when I went from you, I had some hopes that it was not impossible I might overlive him: But the reason by which you now ruine mee and all my hopes, is a perpetuall reason, and will last for ever, unlesse the gods will work miracles, and make my innocencie visible to the world; so that I see no other end of my miseries but death: doe not then hinder me of my only remedy by giving me any smooth and unprofitable language, which perhaps are but bare effects of your pittie, and proceed not from any such affection as you promised me. Whilst Aglatidas was thus in discourse with Amestris, I perceived in both their faces such an extraordinary sadnesse, that I never in my life saw the like: Amestris could hardly speak, because shee thought all her obliging language a crime; yet was her silence Page 289 so eloquent and significative, that Aglatidas could not make any doubt but his dear Amestris did most tenderly love him: yet making some scruple at the length of this sad Conference, she would needs go away: But Aglatidas holding her, I most earnestly beseech you Madam, said he unto her, to tell me precisely what I must do. I would have you live, replied she, but that you live far off from me. O Madam, said he, I beseech you do not command me things impossible; or at the least so difficult, that death is much more sweet and easie then obedience to them. But I require more from you, replied she, for I would never have you send me any Letters, nor expect any from me. This is much Madam, replied Aglatidas, and much too much; nor know I how to yield obedience, unless I were able to forget you, and leave loving you. In the contrary, said she, I am so perfectly perswaded of your innocency, that I make no scruple to desire that you will love me as long as you live. In the mean time Aglatidas let me be gone; for when I think how all the Town beleeves you killed Ottanus, and should know I permit you to be thus at my feet, I blush for shame, that I should thus long suffer it. But Madam, said Aglatidas, do you not consider, that by banishing me from you, I leave Megabises, Artemon and Tharpis with you? It is very true, replied she, you do so, but since I am not able to banish you out of my heart, you need not envy them at all. But Madam, said Aglatidas, will you ever endeavor to banish me out of your heart? I ought to do so at the least, replied she, and if I do not attempt it, it is because I know I should lose my labor. After these obliging words Amestris rise up, as being ashamed for pronouncing them; and Aglatidas seeing she was fully resolved to go away if he did not, he rise up also, and looking upon her eyes so full of excessive sorrow; Madam, said he, and breathed a profound sigh, I had rather I should leave you then you should leave me, for perhaps Menasta will plead for me when I am gone. I do promise you, I will, (said that faithful Kins woman.) And I do absolutely forbid you, said Amestris, unless you have a mind to double my sorrows. But Madam (said Aglatidas) is it possible my Ruine should so much trouble you? must I perish for ever? and must this be the last time that ever I must see you? No, no, Madam, I cannot imagine it; questionless you will permit me to return again, and to see you: for though I would yield obedience unto such Commands, yet I sensibly see I am not able: Indeed Madam, I must needs return, whether I will or no, or whether you will or no: and though I see nothing but the top of that Palace where you dwell, I shall come and wander over the tops of those Mount|tains beyond Orontes to receive that delight. Aglatidas expressed himself so cordially, and with so many raptures of real love, that Amestris was extremely moved: so that not being able to retain her tears, she pulled down her Hood, and making a silent sign with her hand that he should go away, he took her hand, and intended to kiss it, but she hastily pulled it back, as if the hand of Aglatidas, who was (though wrongfully) accused of murder, ought not to touch hers: My heart is so purely innocent Madam, said he, that I did not think my hand could prophane yours; yet since you think it so, permit me at the least I beseech you to kiss your garment; and then he stooped with intentions to do so, but Amestris putting forth her hand to forbid him, and Aglatidas seeing her hand so near his mouth could not chuse but kiss it, she not being able to prevent him, though by her face she seemed very angry at it. After they were risen up, Is it then your positive pleasure Madam, said he unto her, that I must depart? I wish you might never depart from Ecbatan, answered she; but since the Fate will not handsomly permit it, I would—Amestris stopt at these words; and not being able to speak any more, she made a second sign with her hand, that he should go a way; and so he did, but with so much sorrow in his pace, as a sadder sight could not be seen. Amestris was no less grieved then he; and, as I after understood from Menasta, he was no sooner gone but she threw her self upon her bed, and watered it with a flood of tears, which she restrained as long as we were present.

After much discourse in Commendations of Aglatidas, Amestris desired Menasta to go with her into the Country, since she was not able to hide her sorrows for the loss of Aglatidas; and without any more delay, it was resolved upon to go the next morning: Menasta went to Aglatidas from Amestris, and charged him not to follow; and Amestris was no sooner gone, but Menasta writ a Letter, which did so fully charge him to obey Amestris, that if Aglatidas had less Love or Reason then he Page 282 had, he would have punctually obeyed her. In the mean time seeing he was not able to alter the Resolutions of her, who only was able to make him happy, and since he was not able to endure the world, he resolved upon a departure; and presently addressed himself unto Cixares, and importuned him to send him unto you Sir, and obtained his desire. Before his departure he was full of many strange designs: for sometimes he thought of killing himself; other times again of fighting with Megabises, Artemon, Tharpis, or any Pretender to Amestris: but I was so opposite unto all these fatal Resolutions, that I perswaded him to depart, and let all these violent resolutions alone: sometimes I employed your name Sir, telling him it was more honorable to dye in your service, then any other way. But Sir, though Aglatidas went out of Ecbatan at a quite contrary Gate to that which goes unto the place where Amestris was, and intending fully to obey her; yet for his heart he could not; and he was no sooner got some fifty furlongs from Ecbatan, but sending all his men some two days Journey from Ecbatan, he went with one servant only to the place where Amestris was: In the mean while his departure was very welcome news to Megabises, to Tharpis, and to Artemon: It was very pleasant also unto Anatisa, but not so much as to the rest: for her design was only to break off the Marriage, but not to exile Aglatidas; yet her revenge upon a Rival was very sweet, and she was very well pleased with the fruits of her Project: Dinocrates also enjoyed the fruit of those Presents which Tharpis conferred upon him, and was wondrous well contented.

But Sir, to return to Aglatidas, he went straight unto Amestris to bid his last adieu: She was so amazed and infinitely angry at him, that Menasta assured me, he was ready to take horse again, before he had spoke four words; yet by the Rhetorick of some pithy perswasions, he obtained the liberty of an hours Conference, during all which time he could not alter one jot of her resolutions: This last parting went nearer the heart then the other, and both of them were in a most lamentable condition: When Aglatidas was gone, Amestris could talk of nothing but his misfortune; and she repeated all the passages of his life, watering his memory with abundance of tears, which trickled down not only her cheeks, but her very neck and breasts. Whilst she was thus sitting and lamenting with Menasta in her Couch, and whilst Menasta was perswading her to moderate her excessive sorrow, they heard a great noise below in the Court, and presently after, hearing the same upon the stairs, and then the Chamber door open suddenly, Amestris saw Ottanus enter, with the same fury he used heretofore, when he brought persecuting resolutions with him. Ottanus! said Cyrus in a great amazement, how could Amestris see Ottanus enter, when you say you saw him in the midst of a Torrent, and sink afterwards unto the bottom? Give me but a little patience Sir, said Artaban, and you shall know: But yet I beseech you give me leave to go on with my discourse.

Ottanus being entered then, as I told you, said Artaban, the sight of him made Menasta cry out, supposing it had been an Apparition; and struck Amestris into such a wonder, that she was not able either to speak or rise up; and it was a long time before they could certainly know whether it was really Ottanus, or his shadow: at last, he looking upon Amestris, whose eyes were swell'd with tears, and yet sparkled with rage and fury, and assuming a tone that was able to strike terror into the mind of the boldest and most innocent woman in the world; You have reason, said he unto her, to be troubled at the sight of me, for I should never have returned but to punish you for all your faults at once. Amestris then knowing him to be really Ottanus, and having a little recollected herself, she rise up, and bowed unto him with much reverence, Sir, said she unto him, you have heretofore so well accustomed me to endure unjust reproaches, that I have not yet lost the habit of it. Infamous woman, said he unto her, dost thou call the charge of all thy present actions, unjust reproaches? Canst thou believe me dead upon any light report, and not so much as cry? and must I find thy face all swell'd with tears now for the absence of thy Lover? Know, that I have been hid six days in Ecbatan, in a place where I have heard of thy intended Marriage, and all thy unworthy and wicked actions; and I came hither to kill Aglatidas before thy face, hearing he was come hither to thee, but since I understand I came a little too late, I find none but thyself to be revenged on. Sir, replied Amestris, since you say yet Page 283 know all my actions, then you know also, that as soon as Dinocrates told me that Aglatidas killed you in the Wars, I broke off with him, and resolved never to marry him. Yes, replied furious Ottanus, you seem so before the world, but not in private, for if thou hadst, thou wouldst never have come hither. I can assure you Sir, said Menasta, that Amestris did strictly charge Aglatidas never to see her again. And I can assure you, answered Ottanus, that I came hither with intentions, that she never shall see him or you again.

To relate Sir, all the crabbed passages which Ottanus used, would be to abuse your patience: Let me only tell you, that he spoke as much as jealousy, rage and despair could invent, both against Amestris, against Aglatidas, and against Menasta: Then causing a Coach to be made ready, he forced Menasta to return to Ecbatan, and shut Amestris up in a Chamber with one woman only to wait upon her; threatening her with all imaginable severity: That which did most wonder Amestris was, that she saw out of her window Ottanus treat Dinocrates as formerly. But Sir, since I know you desire to hear of the Resurrection of Ottanus, you, I say, who in the fight did hear it cried, Ottanus is dead, I shall relate what I have heard from several reports: Be pleased to know then, that Ottanus was in the fight that night, and fighting next unto an Armenian who was his intimate Crony, he let fall a Bag of Jewels which he had, and stooping to take them up again, this Armenian thought that his reason of stooping was some wound with a Sword, or Javelin, and therefore cried out, Ottanus is dead, though he was not: It is very true, that he had much ado to rise again, because the fight was very hot in that place, and he was several times tumbled over and over: after this, as you know very well Sir, the Armenians were all vanquished, and could not possible recover their Mountains: Moreover, you know Sir, that Phraartes retreated into a little valley, whether you followed him, so that Ottanus saved himself as the rest did: But since he feared nothing more then to fall into the hands of Ciaxares, because he was a Traytor to his Country, and principally because Aglatidas was in his Army, therefore in lieu of going with Phraartes, he stole away, and by the favour of night did hide himself amongst some high Rocks which are close by the side of a River: but because the Arms he wore were very remarkable, he thought it would not be easie for him either to hide himself, or to cross the field in the day time without being stopped: When he saw that none remained in the Valley, whither Phraartes retreated, he found one dead, and changed his rich Arms for those of a common Souldier, and changed all his Clothes also, so that he passed through all our Army without a stop, taken to be one of our Party by reason of his habit; and going on foot to the first Town, there he fell sick.

But Sir, to satisfy you concerning the mistake of Dinocrates and my self when we saw the Arms of Ottanus on the back of a dead man in the midst of a River: Be pleased to know, that after Ottanus had changed Arms, a Cicilian Souldier going to plunder Clothes amongst the dead, happily light upon these by the help of the Moon, and being ravished at his happy encounter, he put off his own, and put on these: Presently after two other Ecbatan Souldiers met him, who seeing these rich Arms upon his back, would needs be sharers with him; but he denied them, saying, as it may be conjectured, they belonged to him because he found them: yet because they understood not the language of one another, they fell to fight for them; and so near the River, that being wounded he fell into it, and stuck upon the Point of a Rock in the River, where Dinocrates and I saw him the next morning: one of these two Souldiers who fought with him that wore the Arms of Ottanus, being the next morning by the River side, and heard Dinocrates say it was the body of his dead Master, durst not confess what he knew; but being weary of War, and returning to Ecbatan, I entertained him into my service: so that when the return of Ottanus was divulged, and this man hearing me wonder that his Arms should be seen upon a man in the midst of a River, he confessed unto me the whole truth as I have related it unto you.

But Sir, to return unto Ottanus, whom I told you lay sick in a little Town; be pleased to know, that he was so extremely sick, and continued so so long, that he thought twenty times of death: yet the Gods intending to make a further trial of the constancy of Amestris, they spared him: and when he was well recovered, he bought a horse, (for he had Jewels of sufficient value to supply himself with all accommodations) and departed, Page 284 not knowing all this while, that the news of his death was carried unto Ecbatan, with so many probable circumstances: And thinking to find Amestris in the same Castle where he left her, he went thither, not daring to return to Ecbatan, unless in a disguise, because he had been in Arms against Ciaxares: But he was much amazed to hear that every one should think him dead, and that Aglatidas was not only in Ecbatan, but ready to marry Amestris: To make you the better apprehend what were the thoughts of Ottanus upon these reports, I need only tell you, that though he was an high Delinquent against the King, and State, yet he resolved to go disguised unto Ecbatan, and hide himself in some secret place where he might know all the actions of Amestris and Aglatidas, to the end he might disturb their felicity when he saw occasion, he disguised himself in the habit of a Merchant, and coming in the night, lodged with one who heretofore had been his Tutor; expressly forbidding him to discover that he was alive: he enquired how the state of all things stood, and understood that the happiness of Aglatidas was prevented by the return of Dinocrates, who arrived two days before him: This news was very agreeable to his fancy, and surprized him, not but being able to imagine why Dinocrates should devise so many lies. However, in this juncture of things, he resolved to keep close, and hear how Amestris disposed of her self; and since he ever loved Dinocrates, he sent for him to the house where he lay concealed: Dinocrates came accordingly, and Ottanus received him with a thousand welcomes: And though he did not know only why he had vented these lies, yet since they disturb the hopes of Aglatidas and Amestris, in preventing their marriage, he thought himself much obliged unto him. In the mean time, Dinocrates seeing his Master alive, and being of a quick and subtle wit; Sir, said he unto him, I thank the Gods for so happily inspiring me, otherwise you had found Amestris in the Arms of Aglatidas: Then Ottanus asked him, why he had dissembled the truth as he had done. Sir, replied he confidently; hearing at my first coming unto Ecbatan, that Amestris was within three days to marry a man whom I know you hated; I did so much abhor to see she should be so little sensible of her own honour, as to marry Aglatidas, of whom you had so many causes of jealousy, that having in my possession a sword which I knew to be his, I told Amestris, that Aglatidas had killed you with it, thinking that if she had any spark of honour in her, she would never marry him after this: or if she did, I should at least have so much satisfaction, as to see that all your jealousies were not without good ground: you may well conceive Sir, how Ottanus was pleased with Dinocrates, and what rewards he promised him, for that which he had been so well recompensed before by Tharpis.

In the mean time he understood by him that Aglatidas after this had been with Amestris, at Menasta's house; and before he would shew himself unto any others, he would observe a while, whether Amestris was really broken off with Aglatidas, or whether it was only so in shew, expressly forbidding Dinocrates to tell any he was alive. And he obeyed him, not speaking of it so much as to Anatisa, or Tharpis: But afterwards, Dinocrates telling his Master, that Amestris and Anatisa were to go into the Countrey, and that Aglatidas was to depart also, Ottanus thought this to be a business concluded upon between them, and that perhaps they would marry in secret: so that preparing for his departure as well as Aglatidas, he went unto a Wood, by which he imagined he would pass, with intentions not to fall upon him by the way, but to follow him at a distance, & not to shew himself until he was come unto the presence of Amestris: But since Aglatidas went out of another Gate, and took another way, Ottanus missed of him; and waited so long as his patience could last, so that he came an hour after Aglatidas was departed: Then coming unto the Court, he asked who was with Amestris, and they answered, no body, but that about an hour before Aglatidas was with her, and now gone: so that coming furiously into her Chamber, as I told you before, he shut up Amestris, he sent away Menasta, and ordered Dinocrates to procure some souldiers to defend him in case the King would arrest him. I shall not lengthen my story, by reason of the excessive sorrows which Amestris and Menasta expressed at parting; but give me leave to tell you, as since she hath told us, that notwithstanding all the hatred which Amestris had of Ottanus, and all those cruel persecutions which she was to expect, she had a secret joy and comfort to see that Aglatidas was just; Page 285 and that she might without any scruple preserve him in her esteem, and friendship.

In the mean time, Menasta was no sooner come to Ecbatan, but she sent for me, to tell me Ottanus was living, and returned, and Amestris was prisoner, and perhaps in some danger of her life: I could not believe all this at the first, but seeing so much real sadness in her face, I suspected not the truth of her words: I grieved as well as she; and for Amestris sake I wished that Aglatidas had not been so well justified in her opinion, Then did we consult which way possibly Amestris might be delivered from this tormenting persecution, and considering that Ottanus was an high Delinquent against the King and State, I resolved to advertise Ciaxares that Ottanus was living, and of the place where he was: Amestris approved of my design, and hastened me to put it into execution, because she feared Ottanus would either kill or poyson Amestris, so that I went unto the King the very same hour, and knowing his goodness towards Aglatidas, and acquainting him with the place where this Delinquent was, I told him he would perhaps save the life of a Lady whom Aglatidas loved above all the world, if he would punish this Traitor to the State, and himself. Ciaxares no sooner heard my advice and request, but he presently commanded the Lieutenat of his Guard to take some forces with him, and secure the person of Ottanus, and to release Amestris, bringing them all to the Town.

In the mean time, Menasta published about the Town that Ottanus was alive, and returned; and how he began to persecute Amestris, every one wondered, and could hardly believe it: Tharpis was desperate, Megabises and Artemon were quite down in their fancies: As for Artemon, he no sooner heard how coarsely Ottanus used Amestris, but he resolved to go and see her persecutor, in hopes to qualify his severity, but he found he was mistaken: for since Ottanus knew that not only Aglatidas intended to marry her, but that Megabises, Tharpis, and Artemon also, were in love with her: he received him very ill, and was ready to quarrel with him; though he had hardly any leisure for it, because Artemon was no sooner entred, but the Lieutenant of the Guard followed him with above an hundred men; so that Ottanus found himself in a sad condition, knowing himself to be a Traitor to the State, and seeing he was not able to resist them: Dinocrates, who went to procure some souldiers, was not yet returned: so that having but a few men with him, and they not very affectionate unto him, he knew not what to resolve upon: he had a desire to fly for it, and first perhaps to have killed Amestris, but when he perceived that the Lieutenant of the Guard had seized upon all the passages, he was in such an extream fury and rage, that Artemon thought (as afterwards he told me) he would immediately have killed himself. In the mean time, the Captain of the Guard demanded entrance, and receiving no satisfactory answer, caused the doors to be broke open, and entred with all his men: Ottanus hearing this noise, went towards the Captain of the Guard with his sword drawn, and Artemon seeing he was not able to defend himself, enterposed between them, but Ottanus struck at Artemon, whilst three of the Guard seized upon him, and his sword: Ottanus finding himself disarmed, and seized upon, vented a thousand most horrible imprecations; However they caused him to go into his Chamber again, until orders was taken for the departure of Amestris, Artemon being a friend unto the Captain of the Guard, went with him unto her Chamber where she was locked up: Madam, said he unto her, since you were pleased to permit me the continuance of friendship, I beseech you permit me that I help to release you: Amestris was so amazed at the great noise, and at the language of Artemon, that she knew not what to answer: But the Lieutenant of the Guard coming to her, and telling her he had orders from the King to carry her unto Ecbatan: She asked him from whence proceeded her liberty, and when she understood that it was by the imprisonment of her Husband, she expressed no joy at the news: However she was put into a Coach with her women, and was waited upon by Artemon, and a dozen Gallants which accompanied him: As for Ottanus he was carried on horseback, and conveyed into a Chamber at Ecbatan, where Traytors to the State used to be put: Never did any thing make a greater noise than this return of Amestris, and the imprisonment of her Husband; I dispatched one of my men immediately towards the Army unto Aglatidas, and went in all haste unto Menasta, to carry her unto Amestris.

Page 286 In the mean while, Anatisa, who suck'd poison for Amestris out of every thing, did report about the Town a very base report, that Amestris had caused her Husband to be imprisoned, and that Aglatidas did lie lurking in some concealed corner of the Town, whilst he employed all his friends to the King against Ottanus, and an hundred such falsities as these: But this imposture took no deep root, though Amestris never heard of it; for our of a magnanimous generosity she told Menasta and my self, as soon as we came into her Chamber, that she would solicit for the liberty of her Husband; when she told us this, we wondered and endeavoured to hinder her from it, but all in vain; for since she saw there was glory and nobleness in the act, no arguments could dissuade her from it: Then did she assemble together some of her Husbands kindred, who rather in respect of their family, then of any amity to him, did wish him out of prison: Then she and they together did cast down themselves at the feet of Ciaxares, and begged pardon for Ottanus. This Generosity seemed so high, that the King was charmed with it: at the first, to try her virtue, he refused, and said, Ottanus was unworthy to be her Husband: yet she seconded her petition with so much spirit, and such pressing importunity, that Ciaxares promised her the life of Ottanus, but as for his liberty he would never consent unto it, until Ottanus did solemnly promise never to carry Amestris out of Ecbatan again, or to use her any wayes unkindly: Amestris thanked the King for the cares he had of her, but still humbly desired him to release Ottanus without any conditions at all, yet he would not by any means: since Ottanus was extremely hated, though the goodness of Amestris did solicit for him, yet there was many which did solicit against him, and amongst the rest, one ancient enemy unto his family, did negotiate against him so openly before all the world, that Ottanus himself was acquainted with it.

The King within a few days after sent for Ottanus into his presence; and after he had told him of his perfidiousness towards him, and his injustice towards Amestris, yet that virtuous Lady notwithstanding all his cruelty to her did with much importunity beg his Life and Liberty: He told him also, that at her request he had consented unto the first of these; but denied her the second, unless he would solemnly promise never to carry Amestris any more into the Country, or any manner of ways use her unkindly: Ottanus hearing the King say so, in lieu of thanking him, or accepting of his offer, was so insolent as to ask whether these Conditions were mentioned by the consent of Amestris? The King wondering at this strange effect of Jealousie, answered him very sweetly, that Amestris on the contrary desired it without any conditions at all: Yet say what the King could, Ottanus could not directly promise it, but asked three days time to consider; during which time doubtless he endured intolerable torment: for he apprehended, that unless he would ruine himself, he must punctually keep promise with Ciaxares, and he perceived by himself that he was so absolutely unable to do it, that he knew not what resolution to pitch upon: yet since present miseries are apt to lay hold upon present remedies, he sent word to the King, that he would promise what he desired, so he might be set at Liberty: he was caused to solemnize this promise with all possible Ceremonies that might make it inviolable, and afterwards he was released, maugre all the secret solicitations of all the Lovers and Friends of Amestris; and maugre all the malice of that declared Enemy unto Ottanus, who opposed it as much as possibly he could. But here Sir, may be admired the contrivances of the Gods: for as soon as Ottanus was out of prison, and had rendered thanks unto Ciaxares, he met with this declared Enemy whom he knew had solicited against him; he began to speak fiercely unto him, and to affront him so far, that he drew his Sword, which moved Ottanus to draw his also, and fighting, Ottanus was left dead upon the place, before any could come in to part them: his old Enemy was in little better state then he, for within three days after he dyed of his wounds; though Amestris out of her constant generosity caused him to be apprehended, and resolved a revenge upon him for the death of her Husband. Since Ottanus was once thought to be dead when, he was not, every one to satisfy their curiosity would see him whether he were really so or no; and to speak the very truth, every one rejoiced at it, except Anatisa, Tharpi, Megabises, and Artemon; for though it be the natural disposition of all Lovers not to grieve for the death of him that enjoyed their Mistress; yet since these three Rivals were sure that Aglatidas would now enjoy her before any of Page 287 them, they had rather she should have still continued the wife of Ottanus, then become the wife of Aglatidas. All this while Amestris carried her self according to her accustomed modesty and wisdom: But that Dinocrates might be punished for all his navy at once, it chanced that coming one night to Ecbatan to fetch away all that he had there, intending to change his habitation (for he had heard of his Masters imprisonment, when he was bringing Souldiers secretly unto his house) he met, the night after Ottanus was killed, a servant belonging to Aglatidas, who knowing him by the help of a Candle which accidentally passed by, did assault him so vigorously, that Dinocrates flying away, and not knowing what he did, came to save himself in my Lodging, where he fell, being wounded in three places, just as I entered: But though I knew him, yet since he fled into my house for sanctuary, I my self stopped the servant of Aglatidas which followed him, who out of respect to me retreated: yet his life could not be saved, for he dyed within six days after: yet before he dyed, he confessed many things, which I was very desirous to know, amongst the rest, the plot of Anatisa and Tharpi. In the mean while I was vexed to the heart that I could hear no news of Aglatidas, of whom I durst never speak unto Amestris, but continually unto Menasta: But at the last, he whom I sent unto him returned, and told me it was long before he could find him, and at last found him sick of extream sorrow three days journey from Ecbatan. Then Sir, to trespass no longer upon patience, let me in short tell you, that the news of Ottanus his death was such a present cure of Aglatidas, that within eight days he was able to take horse: Before he would come into Ecbatan he sent me unto the King to obtain permission to return, with as much earnestness as he asked to depart; commanding me to acquaint Ciaxares with the true cause of his departure, and desire of return: Then went I presently unto the King, who was most willing to do any thing in advantage of Aglatidas, and assured me that he would perswade Amestris not to be over ceremonious in her mourning for Ottanus; but it was not possible to obtain it of her: for notwithstanding all the requests and desires of Ciaxares, of Menasta, of Aglatidas, and my self, she would by all means continue out the time of mourning according to the Custom of Ecbatan. In the mean time, to prevent all new misfortunes, Ciaxares gave express command unto all the Rivals of Aglatidas, never to think any more of Amestris, and that so absolutely, that they were forced to yield obedience. After this, I shall not need to tell you Sir, how great was the joys of Aglatidas and Amestris, not how blank all the Rivals were, nor how furious Anatisa was, for if I should, the day would be too short to relate them all: But give me leave to tell you, that as soon as Amestris had left off her mourning, the day of Marriage was appointed; all the Gallants of the Town came to the Feast; all her rejected Lovers absented themselves as well as Anatisa; our two happy Lovers swimm'd in a Sea of Joys, and were married in the presence of the King and all the Court. After this Sir, I have no more to tell you, but that though Aglatidas does love Amestris much more then ever he did, yet the love of Glory, and the honour to serve you Sir, is so prevalent with his Soul, that he most willingly accepted of the employment which Ciaxares conferred upon him, to bring ten thousand men unto you: though let me also tell you Sir, that he did not leave Amestris without abundance of sorrow; and I can assure you, that as we conducted this fair and admirable Lady a days Journey from Ecbatan, (for she resolved to spend all her time of absence from her husband in the Province of the Ariantines) I saw them both as sad, as before they were full of joy. And so Sir, you shall see Aglatidas again both a Husband and a Lover as unquiet and reserved as he used to be.

I thank the Gods (said Cyrus, when Artaban had ended) that Aglatidas has no other torments then such as absence causes; and I wish with all my heart (said he and sighed) that all those who love him, may one day be in the same condition that he is. After this Cyrus <...> illustrious Friend, the novelty and strangeness of which he could not cause but admise: Then was he forced to break off further Conversation, because he was told that the King of Phrygia and the King of Hircania had some business of importance to communicate unto him: So that he embraced Artaban, and went out of that Room into another, where those two Princes, accompanied with Tigranes, Phraartes, Artamas, Persoldes, Page 288 and many others, expected him; and that with so much Majesty, as it can hardly be imagined that a Prince of so high a Soul should be so sweet as to harken unto a long amorous Discourse, in which he had no other interest, then as relating unto a man whom he loved, unless it were by comparing the torments which other Lovers suffer, with those which he endured for Mandana.

The End of the Second Book.

ARTAMENES, OR CYRUS the GREAT. The Fourth Part. BOOK III.

When Cyrus came unto those Princes which expected him, the King of Phrygia told him, that the Lacedemonians had contracted alliance with Craessus, and that he thought fit to acquaint him with it. The King of Hircania also informed him, that the Thracians and Egyptians did arm themselves in the King of Lydia's quarrel. As for the Lacedemonians, replied Cyrus, I do not wonder they should do so, since it had been most unjust in them to deny aid to a Prince who did so liberally furnish them with as much gold as they stood in need of, to make that prodigious Statue of Alpollo, which in my Travels I saw near the Mount Thormax in Laconia: But as for the King of Egypt, I do not see any reason he hath to contract alliance with Cressus, or why he should decline Ciaxares. But however, said he, the more enemies we have to fight against, the more glory we shall have in overcoming them: This huge body of strange Troops will do them no other service but sow divisions amongst them, and put their Army in disorder; for it is impossible that men who fight after different orders, should in so short a time be conformable unto one and the same discipline. After this Cyrus acquainted them with the fresh supplies which Ciaxares had sent him by Aglatidas: So that rousing up their hearts by the sprightfulness of his own courage, the same spirit which he infused into these Kings, they also infused unto the Captains, and the Captains unto the Souldiers; so that the great noise which all the preparations of Cressus did make, and was spread amongst them, did not at all astonish them, and they never despaired of victory, as long as the illustrious Cyrus commanded them. Their impatience to fight, though the Spring was neer, yet it made them think it long in coming: The Persians prayed unto the Sun, which they adore, to be swifter in its course for their sakes; the Medians were no less importunate with their gods; and such was the zeal of every Nation in particular, to see their illustrious Generall at an end of all his travels by the defeat of Cressus and liberty of Mandana, that they presented their prayers unto their gods to bring them unto a speedy fight. As for Artamas, he was extremely impatient to see the Princess Palmis out of captivity. As Page 290 gallant as he was, he did not desire it should be obtained by battle; for though Craessus had treated him very hardly, yet could he not wish his overthrow. In the mean time the Prince of Phraartes went very often to visit the Princess Araminta, who was much displeased that he should continue loving her, since she had said as much as any sprightly and virtuous Lady could do to make him desist. A few dayes after Aglatidas arrived with his fresh Auxiliaries: Cyrus received him with so many expressions of love, that Aglatidas did most obligingly desire him not to lay any greater load upon him, lest his heart should not be able to contain his excessive joyes. But Cyrus, thinking a man that was so far from her he loved, as he was, could never die with overmuch joy, did still press upon him with a hundred most obliging expressions, and assured him that Amestris was not more sad in parting with him, then he was glad to embrace him. Afterwards being desirous to view those Forces which he had brought up, and which Aglatidas had left in Battalia some twelve furlongs from the Camp, Cyrus with many of great quality went unto the place where they were, and standing upon a little hill he viewed them, and found them to be handsome and well armed men: So that being very well pleased with them, he appointed them their Quarters, and returned unto his Tent to talk with Aglatidas, not only of Ciaxares from whom he brought Letters, but also of all their misfortunes both past and present. Within two dayes after Aglatidas arrived, Artabases, whom Cyrus sent into Persia to the King his father and the Queen his mother, returned back, Madates still staying with Ciaxares. He received him with as much joy as his soul was capable of, considering the state in which Mandana was, since he brought Letters from two such as he did most highly reverence: He read these Letters with much delight; when he found they contain'd that Pardon which he desired, expressed in such tender and obliging terms, as did let him plainly see that Fame had spoke unto them in his behalf. Artabases told him so many things from them, as did let him see they had great and heroic souls: He was also loaded with most magnificent Presents for Cyrus from them; and moreover assured him, that Cambises would presently make new Levies to send unto him. So that when Cyrus did divulge this report unto his Army, the Soldiers roused up fresh hearts. Artabanes also brought another Letter from the Queen of Persia unto Chrisantes, which intimated, that in lieu of quarrelling with him for so long concealing her son, she gave him many thanks for bringing him so well up. A few days after, Timocreon and Tegeus understood by those whom they sent unto Sardis, that the Princess Mandana and the Princess Palmis would certainly be brought thither: That a chamber was making ready in the Citadel for the Princess Palmis, and another in the Kings Palace for the Princess Mandana; and that as near as they could guess, they would be conducted thither within 15 or 20 days; and that Cressus intended they should come by a way which should almost always have the River Hermes between them and the Army of Cyrus. This intelligence was confirmed the same day by the return of Feraulas, who reported how the friends of Menelaus assured him, that within fifteen or twenty days the King of Pontus would carry the two Princesses unto Sardis; though he caused it to be published in Ephesus, that they would not carry them, until all the Army of Craesus was come together, the Rendezvous whereof was to be upon the banks of Pactolus. Feraulas, having been happier in his negotiations than heretofore, found out a way by the addresses of a friend unto Menelaus, sister unto Agisistrata, to send a Letter unto Martesia, and to receive her Answer, which he shewed unto his dearest Master: for since he had not writ unto her, but for him, he therefore had as much share in it as himself. So that after he had rendered him a full account of every thing, he shewed him this Letter which contained these words.

MARTESIA unto FERAULAS.

THE person of whom you spoke unto me being still the same she used to be, that is, the wise <...> and justest in the world, you may assure your illustrious Master that he need not to fear any thing, but still may hope for all that concerns her: O I wish unto the Gods, that fortune would put no other obstacle unto his happiness! For as much as concerns you, since I am persuaded that it depends upon him, it is sufficient that I tell you I have contributed as much as is in my power to make him happy, since I do every day pray unto the Gods that he may speedily triumph over all his Enemies.

MARTESIA.

Page 291 This Letter caused more joy in Cyrus than he was able to express, though he did secretly murmur a little, that the Princess did not so much as write one word with her own hand in this Letter; yet seriously considering all circumstances, he was not angry at all, and thought himself as happy to know her thoughts by Martesia, as a common Lover would have been in the enjoyment of his Mistress: It is an infallible testimony of a real and high passion, to be most sensible of the least favors; and so, since that of Cyrus was the most violent and tender that ever any was, he apprehended the most inconsiderable circumstance which proceeded from Mandana, with an extasy of joy; for he imagined that Martesia had not writ any thing in this Letter, without the Princess knowledge and approbation, and he was as tender and dear of it, as if she had writ it her self: However, to lose no longer time in unprofitable imaginations, but the sooner to Procure the liberty of his Princess, he assembled the King of Assiria, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, the Prince Artamas, Tigranes, Phraartes, and several other of quality together, intending to consult with them upon the best expedients for it.

Artamas, who till then had ever a great respect of Cressus, considering now that he intended to continue the imprisonment of the Princess Palmis, since she was to be lodged in a Citadel, and not in the Palace of the King her father, he was so violently desirous to prevent her coming into that Prison, out of which he himself came, that he desired pardon of Cyrus, if he delivered his opinion the first; for being fully persuaded that none could propose a way so expedient as himself, he thought himself excusable for assuming that liberty. Cyrus and the King of Assiria hearing him speak so zealously, did both of them assure him, that they would most willingly hearken unto him: So that Artamas told them, how since the King of Pontus was to conduct the Princesses on the other side of the River Hermes, he hoped that they should be able to pass over that River without any opposition, because the Governor of that Castle which stands at the end of that bridge over that River, and is of the same name, is so absolutely for him, that he does not think he will deny him any thing: Moreover, he knew there was some discontent between that Governor and the King of Lydia, who intended to put him out of his Government: So that, said he to them, if that bridge can be obtained, and since the wood which I already told you off is not above thirty furlongs from thence, it will be a short cut for us to be there in convenient time, when we shall have intelligence that the Princesses are to pass. Cyrus finding much reason in the advice of Artamas; it was resolved, That without any further delay, to send and make sure of this Governor, and after that, when they should receive further intelligence from the friends of Menelaus of the prefixed day when these Princesses and their convoy should set out, that then they would the same hour set out with equal, or rather stronger number than those of the King of Pontus, to execute this glorious enterprise: for they might the more easily effect it, because they were nearer that place when they were to pass over the River Hermes, by a days journey then Ephesus was. The thing then being thus resolved upon, it was thought the best expedient, that Artamas should send one of his own servants to negotiate with this beforenamed Governor: But Love was so violent in the soul of that Prince, that he would not trust the transaction of a business upon which the liberty of the Princess Palmis depended, unto any other than himself. So that not imparting his design unto any but Sosicles, he disguised himself the night following, and went to act what himself had proposed, leaving a Letter for the King his father, by which he desired pardon for undertaking this business, without first asking his leave; for fearing lest he should deny him, he would rather run the hazard of his displeasure, then ruin a design upon which the happiness both of Cyrus and himself did so absolutely depend. The King of Phrygia was at the first a little angry with the Prince his Son; but Cyrus did so highly commend the act, that he durst not openly shew his anger. In the mean time, they which commanded in the Frontier quarters towards Lydia, were making continual incursions upon the enemy; and not a day passed, but they had some skirmishes, in which they got good plunder, which did animate the hearts of the Soldier to fight: Cyrus never reserved any thing of what they got, but the glory, and the Prisoners, to the end he might release them; yet did he so largely recompence those which took them, that what ransom soever the Prisoners were to give, they had it all with advantage. Chrisantes, who commanded in the utmost quarter, understanding by his Scouts, that two hundred of the enemies horses were guarding a Coach full of Ladies, going towards the Castle of Hermes, intending to pass the River there; he commanded out four hundred horse to intercept Page 292 them, conceiving that the inequality of number would effect it, and indeed so it succeeded: Though he who commanded those two hundred horse did most gallantly behave himself, but his timorous followers forsaking him, he was forced to render himself, desiring Chrisantes that he would let the Prince Artamas know that he was a Prisoner unto Cyrus, and that he might obtain so much favor from him, as that these Ladies which he conducted might be carried unto the Queen of Susiana: Chrisantes was too gallant a man to treat so brave an enemy (as he found him) ill; and told him, that according to the Laws of war, he must carry him to Cyrus, but promised to obtain of him what he desired: In the mean time Chrisantes did provide the most convenient lodgings that he could for those Ladies, amongst which one of them was a most ravishing beauty; and the next morning himself did Conduct these Prisoners unto Cyrus: But in going thither, they were to pass through a little town where the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess Araminta was, and they went by the Temple there, just as those Princesses were coming out of it: Chrisantes out of his respects unto them, made a halt, and the coach in which the Captive Ladies were, staid, and one of them knowing Panthea, cried out so loud, as that Princess turning towards her, looked seriously upon, and knew her; And being well acquainted with Chrisantes, she sent unto him, desiring the favour that she might speak with those Ladies which he conducted: And since he was not ignorant what Respects Cyrus would have rendered unto that Queen, he went himself unto her, and said he would bring them unto her house, as soon as she should be there; and he was giving orders accordingly for it, when news was brought him that Cyrus was coming to see Panthea, and the Princess Araminta: So that Chrisantes seeing the disposition was no more in him, since his Master was present, he left the Queen, who was going into her Coach, and went to acquaint Cyrus with her desire: This Prince then, passing by the Captive Ladies, saluted them with as much civility as if they had not been Prisoners at all; and going straight to the Queen of Susiana, with whom the Princess Araminta was, Madam, said he unto her, and bowed down to the very ground, you will find more convenience at your own house than here, to entertain these Ladies which are of your acquaintance; Panthea then commanding they should obey Cyrus, went to her own Lodging, and the Coach in which the Captive Ladies were, followed hers: In the mean while Chrisantes presenting his Prisoner unto his Prince; Sir, said he unto him, this enemy which you see here, is unquestionably worthy of your protection, since he assures me that the Prince Artamas is his friend: if so, said Cyrus, and embraced him, I am sure to be his also, since I think my self obliged to love all that he loves. That honor, sir, replied the Prisoner, would be too great for me; and it would be enough if you will be pleased in consideration of him, to treat those Ladies whom I conducted with all civility: The consideration of the Queen of Susiana, replied Cyrus, without any addition of the Prince Artamas, is sufficient to oblige me unto it; and your own merit, without that Prince, is also enough to make me your honorer; for finding by your face, that you are a man of quality and spirit, and understanding by Chrisantes, that you have as much soul and heart as a man can have, there needs no more to induce me to it; and to let you see I am serious before I certainly know what you are, pray go with me to your Ladies, who are with the Queen of Susiana: In saying so, they alighted from their horses, and went unto Panthea's chamber, whom he found full of expressions of friendship and affection unto one of those Prisoners: My dear Cleonice, said she unto her, am I so happy, as once to see you again? And can I grieve for your imprisonment, since it makes my own more sweet? Madam, replied Cleonice, the loss of my liberty shall delight me, if it can any way add unto your happiness: however, it is not long of your illustrious Conqueror (said she, and looked upon Cyrus) that my Captivity is not sweet unto me: Cyrus answered Panthea, according to his ordinary generosity. After this, that Princess told him, how the father of this fair prisoner was born her subject, since he was the subject of Clasomenes, although he dwelt at Ephesus; and told him further, that she had known Cleonice a long time, and loved her exceedingly, and that she was of a most sweet condition; conjuring him to let her be with her, and all the Ladies in her company also, though she knew none of them. Cyrus consented unto all her desires; telling her, they should have their liberty, if he did not think, their presence would be more pleasing to her, and would divert her: Afterwards Cyrus asked that Lady whose name was Cleonice, whether she was any friend unto the Prince Artamas, thinking it impossible but she must needs know him by the famous name of Cleander. Sir, answered she, and blushed, I am a debtor unto that honor which Page 293 have, to be known unto the generous Ligdamis (and pointed with her hand unto that prisoner which Chrisantes took) and I make no question, but when by his mediation, Artamas shall know we are in your fetters, he will obtain so much favour from you, as that our chains may be as light, as the Laws of War will permit. The illustrious Cyrus (said the Princess Araminta, and interrupted her) does not use to impose heavy ones upon his prisoners; for he is much more observant unto the Laws of Generosity, than the Laws of which you speak: Whilst Araminta was speaking thus, Panthea looked upon Ligdamis, and thought she should remember the name; then addressing her self to him, I pray Sir tell me, said she, and smiled, whether your father be not Governor of the Castle of Hermes? and whether you are not that same Ligdamis, whom reports say, does make a publique profession to be a declared enemy of Love, and to all them that are in love? Madam, replied he, doubtless I am the man you mean, though I am not the same I was: Leonice blushed at the answer of Ligdamis, but to turn it as handsomly as she could, she said, when none asked her, that one of her Cousins being sick in the Country, she durst not venture to go from Ephesus unto her, if Ligdamis had not offered to guard her and one of his sisters, which she shewed unto Panthea, who indeed was very fair: Cyrus knowing by this discourse the name and quality of his prisoner, did use him more civilly then before, conceiving it might advantage the design of Artamas: So that after a long visit unto these fair Prisoners, he left them with Panthea; and charged Araspes to treat them with all possible sweetness and curtesie: As for Ligdamis, he carried him with him, assuring the Ladies that he would be as careful of him, as Panthea could be of them; and indeed in their return unto the Camp they talked together, and Cyrus to testify how dear the friends of Artamas were unto him, he let him have his liberty upon his parole, and told him he should have no other guards upon him but his own generosity: Ligdamis returned thanks with all imaginable submission and reverence, and made the greatness of his soul so fully appear by his judicious answers, that Cyrus to his honor said, That he never esteemed any in all his life so much in so little a time: When he was come into his Tent, he bad Feralus make much of Ligdamis, as of one whose friendship he desired to gain: In the mean time, as he had observed some words which Ligdamis uttered, and that Cleonice blushed twice when he was spoken of; so he imagined, or indeed knew that they were in love with one another: yet to clear the matter, he appointed Chrisantes to bid Araspes, as he returned to his quarter, to enquire as well as he could, whether Ligdamis was not in love with Cleonice, and inform him, for it would be of concernment to know it: and to tell him further, that if he could not finde it out any other way, then to go unto the Queen of Susiana from him, and entreat her to let him understand what she knew concerning it; also to assure her, that it might chance so to fall out, that by the knowledge of it, the war of Lydia might be composed without fighting, so that by the same consequence her dear Abradates would not be in any danger. Chrisantes was punctual in his obedience, and acquainted Araspes with their Princes desire: Araspes, though he was full of obedient desires, yet he thought his task very hard, since he had none but prisoners to enquire of: and it was to be imagined, that though he did put the question unto any of them, yet they would never tell him; so that he thought the best way would be to make address unto the Queen of Susiana first: and accordingly he went unto her chamber, where he found Leonice with her; but which way soever he turned his discourse, he could not discover any thing of his desires; so that he was forced to acquaint Panthea in a low voice with the orders he received from Cyrus, telling her that it did exceeding concern him to know the relations between Ligdamis and Cleonice. The Queen of Susiana hearing this, told him, that she knew nothing concerning Ligdamis, more then this, that when she came from Susa, he was such a professed enemy unto Love, that it was to be supposed he never would become a Lover; yet, said she, since I know that this curiosity in Cyrus is not without good ground, although I cannot understand it, yet I will promise him to enquire further; which that I may the better do, it is requisite that Cleonice and I be in private together: and in order to that, do you retire your self, and take such a course, as none come in to interrupt us: In obedience thereunto, Araspes went out, as if Panthea had sent him unto some place: Then after much other common discourse, Panthea asked Cleonice, whether Ligdamis did still continue in his heretical opinion concerning Love? Truly, replied Cleonice, he is very good company; that is not an answer unto my question, answered Panthea; for I would know whether he be still an enemy to Love and all Lovers. Cleonice blushed extremely at this question, and half Page 294 laughing, replied, since I was not the Confident of Ligdamis, when I had the honor to see you last, I know no reason you have, Madam, to ask me any such question: I ask it, answered the Queen of Susiana, because if Ligdamis do ever love any, it must needs be you. You have an ill opinion of his judgement then, replied Cleonice: No, replied Panthea, but on the contrary, a very good one, and that's the reason why I ask the question. But the truth is, Cleonice, I have a great desire to know the history of your life, since it is along time since I had the happiness to see you: Truly, Madam, replied she, you have most absolute power over me, though I must tell you it will trouble me to obey you in this: If you have any of your friends with you, replied Panthea, who is acquainted with it, let her take that pains, and I am contented to save you the labour; you would much oblige me, Madam, answered she, if you would be pleased to save us all that trouble: But the Queen of Susiana, seeing she was unwilling, was more importunate then before: So that Cleonice conceiving that the credit which this wise Queen had with Cyrus might be advantageous unto Ligdamis, if she were acquainted with the interest she had in him, resolved to obey her. But since her modesty would not give her leave to tell the story of her self: Madam, said she unto Panthea, I could well enough relate my own thoughts unto you, but I cannot so well tell you the thoughts of Ligdamis; therefore I beseech you permit one that is both a friend unto him and unto me, relate what you so much desire to know. Panthea consented unto the motion, and Cleonice calling for this friend of Ligdamis and hers, who was called Ismenea, she conjur'd her to satisfy the curiosity of Panthea; after which, she went unto the rest of her company, which came with her, whilst Ismenea began her story thus:

The History of Ligdamis and Cleonice.

Since I know that Cleonice has the honor to be known unto your Majesty, I need not speak any thing of her quality: But, Madam, since I know that she departed from Clasemone very young, to come and dwell at Ephesus; and since that time, she never had the honor to see you, unless at some short voyages which she made unto Sardis whilst you were there, I think it not impertinent to tell you, what humour she appeared to be of unto us, when she came to dwell in our Town. Doubtless you remember, Madam, that at that time Ephesus was one of the most pleasant Towns of all Asia; for when you came thither to visit the Temple of Diana, I remember you gave that Character of it, though you did not stay there above four or five days. And truly, he who is the Governor of it, is so gallant a man, and Polixenida his wife, is a Lady of such an excellent spirit, that they do much contribute unto the delights of all the people: and this Court, though less tumultuous then that of Sardis, yet is it more delightful. You know, Madam, that when the father of Cleonice, left Clasamone to come and inhabit at Ephesus, she was not above fifteen years old; and questionless you have not forgotten that Stenobea her mother was a gallant and virtuous Lady, and one who hath been very fair, and yet was reasonably still: So that when she came to Ephesus, she courted the world, as much as the world courted Cleonice, who indeed did appear like a new and glorious star, which eclipsed all the rest. You may well imagine then, that she being so admirably fair, and besides that, having the advantage of novelty, she did infinitely please: So that since Stenobea did forbid no company coming to her, resort thither was greater then unto any house in all Ephesus whatsoever: The lustre of the daughters beauty, did draw all the compleat gallants of the Town thither. Every one was ambitious of the honor to be her first servant, and pay her his first services: That quality which did most take those that saw her, was their observance that she knew her beauty, and was not proudly affected with it: and though she was one of the most sweet and civil Ladies upon the earth, yet she was so out of a natural inclination, and not out of any design to please or take others who came unto her: She took her pleasures as other did, but she did not greedily seek after them; and though she had one of the most charming wits of the world, yet did she rather endeavor to hide some part, then to shew all the rules of it; nor did I ever in my life meet with any, who knew better how to speak well, or how to be silent with less pain, then she did. Thus, Madam, you see a perfect description of Cleonice, at her first coming unto Ephesus: The Mother sought after all pleasures, and all pleasures sought after the incomparable daughter. Be pleased to know, Madam, that Page 295 there was then at Ephesus a Beauty, who bore the name of Artelinda, and one who was of a good quality; and to speak the very truth as it is, there was so many charms in every part of her, and such a sweetness in all her actions, as whosoever looked upon her, could not choose but love her: for their was such an obliging and captivating quality in her taking eyes, as made all hearts her own, before they knew where they were, or could consult with their reason, at the least, that great number of her lovers said so, to justify their passions: And, Madam, to describe Artelinda the better unto you, for she has so great a share in this history, as I must needs let you perfectly know her. Be pleased to know further of her, that never was such a proud insulting Minx as she was: for she would not only gain the hearts of her Lovers by her beauty and her wit; but also by all her endeavors, by her complacency and civility; and then when any of her private particular friends did contend with her, she would mock them; and jeeringly say, That as ambitious people think they can never get a Crown at too dear a rate; so one can never take too much pains to get a heart: and as Conquerors do always talk of their victories, but never speak of the pains they took, so would she brag of the hearts she had got, but never remember the cares and troubles which they cost her; and truly, I believe Artelinda was never melancholly, but when a day passed over her head, in which she had not made some new conquest: yet be pleased to know, Madam, that this Lady had a mother called Anaxippa, as wise and discreet a mother as ever was, one whose virtue was a little too severe, and condemned all innocent Recreations, and who had educated her daughter in so great a constraint, that no such things as diversions were ever named or heard of: And indeed, if Stenobea had been the mother of Artelinda, and Anaxippa the mother of Cleonice, there had been far greater suitableness amongst those four persons: For the frolicke and gallant humour of Stenobea made Cleonice often think time to be very tedious: and Stenobea would often complain against the too serious disposition of her daughter, and chide her for it secretly: Anaxippa could not endure the gadding humor of Artelinda; and Artelinda could not abide the strict severity of Anaxippa: The one would be continually in the Temple, at her prayers; the other would be always abroad to see and be seen: however, Cleonice and Artelinda were near neighbours, and visited one another very often; and the contrariety of disposition which was between them, and which in probability would have prevented frequency of visits, was a cause of their often being together then any others: For since Artelinda found always more company at Stenobea's house, then at her mothers, she went thither very often; and since Cleonice found less company at Anaxippa's house, then her mothers, she was there as oft as she could; so that these two beauties of contrary humors were almost continually together: Stenobea was glad that Cleonice was often with Artelinda, hoping she would drive her out of her serious and melancholly mood; and Anaxippa also was well pleased that her daughter should be ever in the company of Cleonice, hoping her modest and fevere example would correct the giddy inclination of the other. Thus did Cleonice seek her solitude at Anaxippa's houses, and Artelinda seek her servants at Stenobea's. Cleonice endeavored to reclaim Artelinda from her gadding humors, and from letting her chief felicity consist in conquering of hearts without number or choice; or having no other design in it but the vain-glory to make all that look on her in love with her. Yet Ligdamis was to be excepted, for she could never subject him with all her arts, do what she could: for the truth was, Ligdamis never loved any, and in all likelihood never would; and though he was a most accomplished gallant, yet was he so resolutely opposite unto that passion, that he not only would never be in love, but also would never love those that were; and upon that score he broke off with an old friend called Phocylides, because he was of the same disposition as Artelinda; and he had professed service to as many several Ladies, as she had captivated servants. Thus, Madam, you see the humors of these four persons, which were most spoke of in Ephesus. Ligdamis a most accomplished gallant, was esteemed by all, though he would be a friend but unto very few, nor would he love any at all: Phocylides he fell in love with all the Ladies in the Town, at least seemed so: Artelinda had many Lovers, and would have had all: And Cleonice without any intentions to captivate any at all, did captivate many; and the truth is, if she would have given entertainment unto all that addressed themselves unto her, the Empire of Artelinda had been ruined; but she carried her self with so much wisdom and discretion, and was neither severe nor lavish of her favours; so that she rid her self of that multitude of Lovers which were of Artelinda's humour, and she did so publish it, that her heart should be hard to conquer, as there Page 296 was very few in all the Town, who durst have so good an opinion of themselves, as to attempt it: Many a Lover sighed at it, but sighed in secret; yet one, whose name was Hermodorus, was to be excepted, for he did absolutely quit the service of Artelinda, and devoted himself and all his services wholly unto Cleonice: but she had no fancy at all unto him: and the jocund humor of her mother was so averse unto her disposition, that she did not at all answer his addresses, but lived in Ephesus with so great an indifferency, that she could be compared unto none but Ligdamis, who did sometimes see her. In the mean time, since it were strange that friendship between two of such contrary humors as hers and Artelinda's, should last long, Cleonice, as I told you before, would attempt to alter Artelinda, and would perswade her, that she did injure her own beauty, by suffering so many to hope for the enjoyment of her heart: For truly (said Cleonice unto her, one day when they were alone together) you can never make me believe, that this multitude of Lovers which wait upon you in the Temples, in the Streets, in the Walks, and in every house unto which you go, would ever wait, and so obsequiously follow you, without some hopes: and I can never believe they can have any hopes, unless you your self did give them life: For to speak sincerely unto you, I see some of your adorsers such ill-favored men, that they can never flatter themselves so much as to hope for any thing from you, unless you did flatter them, and beget those hopes in their hearts. I do ingeniously confess, answered Artelinda, that I do so; for it is one of my best recreations to deceive men by fooling so with them, that they should believe I love them. But, replied Cleonice, do you call that fooling, when you are in such earnest, as you make them believe they are in possession of your heart, and must hereafter, perhaps, be of your person also? Oh Cleonice, said Artelinda, you go a little too far! the most favorable action that I afforded my most esteemed Lover, can never move such a wicked thought in him. I believe I am not deceived so much as you are, replied Cleonice; for since it is commonly seen, that Lovers will hope even in the midst of the most severe behaviour towards them, how can you imagine that men who are loaded with favors, will not hope for any thing? No, no, replied Artelinda, mistake me not, I am not so lavish of my favors, as to loaden any with them; and if I were not afraid you would disclose my secrets, I would discover the bottom of my heart unto you, to the end I may justify my self in your opinion: But my dear Cleonice, I am very much afraid, that if I should discover my thoughts unto you, I should my self lose my Empiredome over so many hearts: for if you should but joyn a little cunning unto those charming features in your face, I were absolutely undone, since I am certain all my servants would then be wholly yours. You are so used to flatter, replied Cleonice, that you flatter even your very friends; but Artelinda, that is not my desire: however, to put you out of all fears, I do faithfully promise you never to make any use of your secret, and therefore be not afraid to disclose your reasons unto me, if you have any that can perswade there is any delight to be taken in being courted by a hundred servants whom you neither love nor esteem; for it is not credible you can at one and the same time love fair men, black men, great men, little men, men that are serious, others that are frolique, some that are pleasant and sprightly, others that are Clowns, Blockheads and Fools: I say it is altogether impossible, that all these can ever have any place in your heart. It is most true, replied Artelinda, and I assure you I do not desire they should. But why then, replied Cleonice, do you oblige them so much, since you do not love them? Because I would have the pleasure of being beloved, answered she; for truly, Cleonice, what is beauty good for, unless to captivate hearts, and to erect an Empire, without a Scepter, or Throne, or Crown, and yet one gets abundance both of subjects and slaves? But they are slaves, replied Cleonice, which are not serviceable, but in hopes to reign, and who puts you to a great deal of trouble to gild over their fetters: for my part, said she, if ever I take any delight in captivating any, my fetters should be so harsh and heavy, that I should never doubt of their fidelity who submitted to them. If I had any design to recompence them after their patience, said Artelinda, I should do so also: but since my ends are only to divert my self, it would not be just to loaden them with such severities. However, Artelinda, replied Cleonice, you do expose your self to a world of censures and dangerous consequences. But wherein am I in any fault? replied she. You are to blame in receiving Letters, answered Cleonice, and in answering some of them; you are continually abroad to see and be seen, you appoint secret meetings, and fail not to observe them; and though I know all this be but to talk two or three words in private, and to make a great secret of a business of nothing; yet for all that, Page 297 it is an appointment, it is a secret; it is made a mystery, and by consequence a crime; because to speak the truth, Innocency seeks no such Corners, but is open and free in all her actions. Moreover, you use to receive and send many tokens; you suffer them to steal your Picture, and sometimes gives it: and as for Ribands and such fantastical fooleries, there is not so many colours as you have given favors: I am not so much in fault as you conceive me, replied she; for there is not a man amongst them all, which can brag of any favor that ever I gave them, which in any reason deserved the name of a fault; for truly, I cannot call any of those which you have reckoned up by that name: nor can I see there is more sin in them, then there is in dressing my self, or curling my hair: for thereby we use to procure love; and by all those ways for which you chide me thus, I do no more but catch some few heart, which would not be captivated by bare beauty only: Is not that enough? replied Cleonice: what would you do more? I would interrupt the courtship of all others, answered she; make Wives and Mistresses full of jealousy, be loved of every one that looks upon me, move hopes and fears when I list, have a hundred diversions to chuse of, make men compose Elogies and Verses in my commendation, that they talk of nothing but me, and follow me into all places; and after all this, I will not engage my heart any further then I please my self in hearing others sigh; and the truth is, I do love the gallantry, but not the gallant: There is too much danger in that, replied Cleonice; for in the end your heart will be captivated before you are aware: Your cold reservedness (replied Artelinda, and laughed) does much more expose you unto that danger, then I am: I, I say, who am so accustomed unto tears and sighs, that my heart is not moved at them: but you who are so severe, you will never admit of any such things; if once a confident bold Lover chance to court you close, and force you to hearken unto him, alas, two or three tears will mollify your heart; or to speak more properly, will kindle such fire in it, as will make you love him, as well as you are beloved, and perhaps better: but pray Cleonice, tell me, What will you do with those fair eyes which the Gods have given you? I will observe, and wonder with them, replied she, how artificially you use yours, and take all that comes near you: yet for all that Artelinda, there is not one amongst all such kinde of Lovers as these, amongst ten thousand, that will make a good husband. Sooner then amongst those of your serious disposition, replied she; for to tell you truly, I am so afraid to meet with one of my mothers humour, that I am almost resolved never to have any at all: Do not think Artelinda (replied Cleonice) that youth will last ever. The antipathy between old age and yong gallantry is so great, that nothing can be more opposite: and what will you do when all your gallants forsake you? Never look so far before (answered she) for as for my part, I promise you I never will; nor will I be too prudent, lest I be too miserable: I will look in my glass, and when the Roses and Violets of my time begin to fade, I will sit down, and set my heart at rest: If souldiers should continually contemplate upon all the dangers that the fate of war may bring upon them, there would be but few Conquerours, or conquered. But the conquests of your eyes, replied Cleonice, have so bad a title, that I can hardly call them conquests: However, they are conquests (answered she) and admit I do lose part of those hearts which I have subjected, yet the honour is no less. Seriously, replied Cleonice, I am afraid you will never alter your minde. No, no, sincerely, answered Artelinda, I never shall: Why, do not you think my life is more pleasant then yours? and do you not repent of your too serious gravity? No, no, replied she, I do not, nor desire I to be of your temper; nor I of yours, replied Artelinda; therefore I pray you, let us both enjoy our own opinions, and I believe we shall love each other the better for it: for truly if you were of mine, perhaps I should extremely hate you; and if I were of yours, doubtless we should but jar and disagree, say what we could. Cleonice seeing she was not able to alter the minde of Artelinda, did change discourse, and presently after left her: but as she was ready to go out, she called her back, and prayed her in a laughing manner, to send back unto her that fugitive slave which she had rob'd her of, meaning Hermodorus. It shall not be long of me, replied Cleonice, if he do not come and assume his first fetters: But that's not enough, added she, for I would not have you captivate the heart of the insensible Ligdamis, whom I confess, I could never endure: There is so little wisdom in your language, said Cleonice, that I will not answer it; and you are so over-wise, replied Artelinda, that I think my folly to be much better then your wisdom: Thus did these two beauties part; Cleonice went unto her Closet to study, and Artelinda unto hers, to write unto some of her Page 298 gallants; for indeed, she had nothing else to do: Moreover, Madam, this Lady had yet a most Charming Modesty, in her looks, notwithstanding all her frolique humours; and she used such art in all her actions, that whosoever saw her, and did not know her, would believe, that she thought her self much troubled with that multitude of servants, which her self had subjected, and did carefully preserve them.

As for Cleonice, her business was quite contrary; for she did love her study and her books, better then all her Mothers Gallants, or Artelinda's Servants, or the Complaints of Hermodorus: And yet she was a lover of Company, but it was the company of choice and rational men; and since she was not Mistress of her self, because she depended upon her Mother, whose humours was so opposite unto hers, she did exceedingly force her self, and insensibly grew not only a horrible hater of all Gallantry and Gallants; but also a Condemner of Love in general, as a Passion the most dangerous of all others: yet did she see Artelinda every day, and continually saw her Mothers Chamber full of those kinde of men, who make open profession of never going unto any place often without some hid design; who are alwayes very earnest, and yet have not any other business but to make it thought they are loved, and are in love, and are ever more careful to perswade the first of these, then the second. Cleonice saw all this, but God knows, much against her minde, and therefore with no delight at all. About this time, I my self had the happiness to be in the Catalogue of her friends, my humour being not so contrary unto hers, as Artelinda's; and as Ligdamis was my Kinsman, so I was very well acquainted with him; and would often say, that since there was such a simpathy of inclinations between him and Cleonice, I wondered they did not see one another sometimes: when I met Ligdamis, I would say as much to him: so that acquainting both of them with each others humors, they knew one another better by my relation, then they did before; for their conversation was wont to be so general and confused, by reason of much company which visited Stenobea, that they very seldom spoke one unto another: yet after my discriptions of Cleonice unto Ligdamis, he used to see her often then usual; and since I was there almost every day, we met very often, and diverted our selves more conveniently then we were usually accustomed: for whilst Stenobea was entertaining one part of the company; and Artelinda busie in captivating new Lovers, or keeping the old ones; and whilst Phocylides was languishing for many Ladies at once and in the same place, Ligdamis, Cleonice and my self, did in the mean time make our selves very merry at them. And indeed there is no better sport then to stand by and observe this kinde of universal Courtship and Folly; for commonly all their actions and words are so contrary to all Reason and Wisdom, that questionless, better sport cannot be to an uninterested looker on, then to observe them. At the first, Cleonice was very shie, and had not any such confidence in Ligdamis, as before him to mock at the passages we saw: And being one day alone with her in her Chamber, I told her, she did wrong her self, in passing away her life without any particular Conversation with any. I do confess it Ismenea (said she unto me) for certainly in the humour I am in, if I had the dispose of my own self, I should let the sweetness of my life consist in the friendship and conversation of a select number of choice and rational men, who know what true honour is, and love it; such as are not capable of being deluded by gilded follies, but look upon things as really they are in themselves, and does not make their felicity to consist in ridiculous fooleries. But alas Ismenea, where are such persons to be found? For first, all women which I know, are of three or four several kinds; some are Weather-Cocks, others are wise, but dull; some have Wit and Vertue, but so crabbed and harsh, that they are not pleasant; others again are Crafty and Wicked: The fair ones, commonly are envious and jealous; the witty and sprightly ones, proud; the fools, are insufferable; and too much gallantry is horrid unto me: Who then would you have me keep company with? It is very true, replied I, for most of the Ephesian Women at this day, are such as you have described: Yet believe me, there is some compleat Men which are worthy of Friendship. Ha, Ismenea, said she unto me, it is as hard a matter to finde them amongst men, as women: But I do confess, that if it were possible to finde out such a rare man as can be constant in all his actions, not love a hundred at once as Phocylides, but can, as I doe, absolutely condemn this foolish affected Passion of Love, his Company were worth keeping: For I must needs acknowledge, that a well accomplished and rational Page 299 man, knows more then the wisest woman; his wit is of a higher strain, his discourse is more agreeable; he can be more complacential unto a Lady, then Ladies can be to one another; and to tell you truly, there is such a kinde of disposition in me, which proceeds from some cause which I am ignorant of, that makes me think such friendship more tender and solid then any other: But yet my dear Ismenea, this man I speak of, must be such a one as I speak of, and not at all amorously disposed; for I do profess if he be, I shall never trust my self with him.

As we were in this discourse, Ligdamis comes into the Chamber, who seeing Stenobea was not within, desired to see Cleonice. I no sooner saw him enter, but I rise up, and said unto him. Come Ligdamis, for if you be not such a man as Cleonice looks for, I shall never finde him as long as I live. Really Ismenea, said she unto me, I shall take it very ill, if you tell Ligdamis what I said unto you. You may take it ill if you please, said I unto her, and laughed, yet I must needs tell him of that wonderfully sympathie which is between you: And then I told him some part of what we had spoken. Must it not needs be confessed, there is a strange conformity between you and Cleonice, since you have cast off Phocylides, because he was too full of Courtship; and she hath almost cast off Artelinda, because she hath too many servants? How, said Cleonice, hath Ligdamis cast off Phocylides, because he was amorously disposed? Yes, Madam, replied he, for I will never trust any man of that passionate Profession; and more then that, I do not intend to trust any, for those which are not in love, may hereafter be, and therefore I will keep my secrets lookt up in my own heart. But Madam, Ismenea has forced me to speak that which perhaps will ruine me in your good opinion; since being fair as you are, and making many love you, as you have done, it is no discretion to tell you, I am a hater of that Passion which you have so often caused. Oh! Ligdamis, said Cleonice, I am infinitely joyed to see so compleat a man as you are, of my opinion: for truly I did think that nothing in the world could be more prejudicial unto us then an amorous friend: For my part, I am an enemy to the Passion, and I beseech you do me the favour to acquaint me with all the ill consequences that Love hath caused in you, to the end I may be more confirmed in my hatred against that Passion. Thanks be to the Gods, Madam, it has not done me much hurt, replied he, although it have my friends: But, Madam, not to tyer you with any long relations, let me only tell you, that as I was going into Greece, I met with Phocylides, and contracted a great league of friendship with him: So that travelling three Moneths together, I opened my very heart unto him: Yet we were no sooner returned to Ephesus, but he had communicated all my secrets amongst his Mistresses; and some of them being none of the most discreet, had squandered those things up and down all the Town, which I had so secretly kept in the Closet of my Heart: And therefore I have experimentally found the danger of trusting an amorous Friend. But Ligdamis, said I unto him, all men are not so foolish and indiscreet as Phocylides. I do assure you, replied Cleonice, all Lovers are alike, and no difference is to be made between them: For, said she, Love works such an absolute change in all those in whom it is Predominate, that there is no trust to be reposed in them. I remember, a little before I came from Clasomenes, there was a man whose name was Cleanor, who professed abundance of friendship unto me; he was perpetually at my lodging, he could not live out of my sight, he told me the whole Cabinet of his heart; I never saw him either reserved or unquiet, he was infinitely indulgent to please me, and all this without any professions of Love. But I wondered to see him altered upon a sudden: He fell into a constant mode of musing; and I do confess I feared that he loved me a little too well; I found presently after that, that I was deceived, for I knew his minde: His longest visits lasted not above half an hour; he would never tell me any news, or any more of his secrets; all such things as were wont to divert him before, did now displease him; and he was so absolutely altered from the humor he was in, before he was in love, that one would not have thought him the same man. One day as I taxed him with it, he to excuse himself, confessed the whole truth, that he was in love with a Lady; and after this, he would never talk of any other thing, but of her he loved; insomuch as he became so insufferable, as I could not endure him.

Then, Madam, since I was extremely glad, that Cleonice and Ligdamis were so well Page 300 acquainted, I put in my vie amongst them, to give them further subject of discourse, and to that end I made a third amongst them: Truly Cleonice, said I unto her, you go a little too far; for there is a vast difference between giddiness and love: you may condemn the one, but must make some exceptions of the other. Not at all, said Cleonice; for I assure you, a resolute Lover is as unfit to make a friend of, as any of those common Lovers, who love in so many places, that they love no where: And truly, I believe, these last sort are more pleasant company than the other. Truly, said Ligdamis, the fair Cleonice speaks abundance of reason: for they whose minds are not too much taken up with thoughts, are always best society; they talk of Musick, and Balls, and Walks and Feasts, and all delights, wherein others have a share; but a serious and real lover, the more amorous and faithful he is, the more reserved and more close he is to himself, and rather troubles, than communicates any joys unto others. But Ligdamis, said Cleonice, do you speak really as you think, without any dissimulation? But Madam, said he, I beseech you tell me truly, is it possible a woman that is admirably fair, and infinitely loved, can have a soul so great, as to contemn those trifles in which the felicity of fair ones do most commonly consist? Ha, Madam, if you be such a one, certainly men ought not to love you, but infinitely to adore you: for there is nothing upon earth more Rare, then to see a fair woman not desire that her eyes should burn all those they shine upon; for, Madam, all fair eyes are most commonly malevolent stars, the influence of which, brings misery upon men: For fair ones, to speak in general, are not contented that men should only render homage, and offer Incense; but they require more sad sacrifices: a thousand hearts reduc'd to ashes, can hardly appease them, a quick and speedy death cannot satisfy their cruelty, but they must inflict long and violent torments: Their highest felicity is to make men miserable. And since so, Madam, how can I believe that you, whose beauty transcends all others that ever I saw, can so absolutely renounce all the sweets of this imaginary Empire, which beauties does pretend to have over all hearts? you especially who can more solidly establish that Empire than any other. I cannot consent, said Cleonice, that I have beauty enough, either to conquer or reign: But had I as much as were requisite for it, yet the examples of others should preserve me from any such imbecility; for really, I thing nothing so cruel, as to make all that comes near us out of their wits, and to hazard the being out of them our selves; for let them talk what they will, love is a most pestilent contagious disease. You your self, replied I, were never yet infected by any, though I have often seen some in your company, who had that disease upon them: When by chance such a misery is upon me, replied she, I have such admirable Antidotes against it, that I do not fear my loss of that health which I enjoy. Madam, replied Ligdamis, though you cannot love any, nor will permit any to love you, yet I hope you will admit upon terms of friendship without offence; and will not forbid me to hope for the happiness of obtaining that honor from you? otherwise I should blame you. The choice of friends, replied she, is a business of so great a difficulty, that there is a necessity of more prudence, then civility or generosity, but I do think that friends and confidants to be a high happiness; yet (as I said unto Ismenea, before you came in) I will never have any amorous friends, nor one that is wholly engaged, nor any that is courted with a thousand gallants, neither will I admit of proud ones, or fools, or dotards, nor of one that wholly is taken up with the aconomy of his house. In a word, were I to choose a friend, he should have a pure minde, a good wit, and a high soul; one that I might love, as I might love a brother, without the least thoughts of gallantry and idle courtship; one to whom I might impart all my thoughts, and consequently one that is rational; but above all, one that is not in love, and gives me good assurance that he never will be. Ligdamis and I began to laugh at Cleonice's discourse: Madam, said I unto her, why do you not make choice of Ligdamis, to be this intimate friend you look for? I have not all those good qualities which she desires, replied he; and Cleonice is too fair to assure me of her friendship, since it is not credible, but some one of that thousand of her Lovers, and the disease which she hath caused in them, will be too strong for that Antidote which she saith she hath. I perceive Ligdamis, saith Cleonice, that you are afraid to be too far engaged; but let it not trouble you, since in the humor I am in, I shall not be over hasty to dispose of my friendship. You have good reason, said he un|to her, for friendship is a thing too precious to be contracted in so short a time: however Madam, I beseech you give me leave to esteem you with all the faculties of my soul, and stay until you shall think me worthy of your friendship. As they were thus in discourse, Page 301 Artelinda came in, with two or three of her servants at her heels, and made her change the subject of her discourse. Ligdamis staid still, and changed not his place, but did sit all that afternoon between Cleonice and me. Presently after her, five or six other beauties entred, and after them Phocylides and Hermodorus, who since they could not get near Cleonice, were so melancholly and disordered, as I could not chuse but laugh. After general discourse had lasted a long time, wherein the talk was of news, of horse-races, and fashions, and such like, Artelinda whispered one of her servants in the ear, and whilst she was holding him talk a long while, it was good sport unto us, that had nothing else to do but observe, to see how nettled the rest were at it; and I never passed an afternoon away with more pleasure: sometimes Cleonice would purposely ask a question of one of them, and then he would answer two words, and turn presently away to observe Artelinda, in hopes to guess by her countenance at what she said unto their Rival. When she laughed, we might see three or four of them at a time, knit the brows and frown, so that it was impossible but we must laugh for company: Then Artelinda, to appease one of them which she had nettled, would quit the other she had whispered with, and talk un|to him; then would she look whether any of the rest were jealous, and to comfort them also, she would talk with every one of them in their turn: on the other side, Phocylides was no less busie then Artelinda; for being desirous to make Cleonice and three or four others believe he loved them, his looks, his heart, his minde, his wit and tongue were all so divided amongst them, that he seemed to be a little distracted; for he had no sooner done speaking with one, but he immediately accosted another; he looked upon one, and talked with another: he sometimes talked, and sometimes sighed so much, and was so extremely puzzled, that we pitted him. All this while the poor Hermodorus spoke not a word, and was so vexed, that he could not speak in private with Cleonice, that it was good sport also to observe him: when he was forced to speak, he would contradict every thing in the world, unless when one commended the beauty of Cleonice. But to augment the aversion which Cleonice and Ligdamis had unto love; by chance there was a very compleat gallant of the Town, who had been long in love, came to see Cleonice, since his affection was very well known, there was many eyes upon him. When this Lover entred, it was good sport to see with what care he endeavored to seat himself next her he loved: and at his first entrance, he was not so observant to salute Cleonice, as he was to see where his Mistress was, that he might seat himself close by her; yet he was disap|pointed, for Cleonice craftily caused a stool to be given him in another place: but how|ever, he made a shift, for seeming to have private business with Phocylides, he rise up and whispered him in the ear, and afterwards went unto his Mistress, and sate by her. At the first, they spoke aloud, and the Lady made some signs he should not begin to talk privately so soon: but they began insensibly to speak in a low voyce, and by little and little did so forget that they were in company, that they spoke as high as if none had been in the Room with them, and did so publicly discover themselves, that really I was ashamed of them. Well Ismenea, said Cleonice in a low voyce unto me, is not all manner of love a most ridiculous thing? and must not it and all kinde of gallantry be utterly condemned? Ligdamis being desirous to intrude, and hear what they said, Cleonice did civilly thrust him back: No, no, said she unto him, we are not upon those terms yet. Why Madam, said he unto her, you use me as if I were a devoted servant, though I have disclaimed that quality for ever: you are so fit to be one when you will, replied she, that I cannot yet trust your words.

By this time the night came on, and the company broke up; when all was gone, Cleonice was so pleasant, and so full of Satyrical expressions against all kinde of gallants and gall|antry, that in my life I never saw her in a more jocond humor. Ligdamis came unto me the next morning to talk of Cleonice, who had so charmed him, that he could not enough admire her, desiring me to employ my best endeavors that he might become her friend; and I without any resistance did make him a promise that I would, yet not as|suring him I could obtain it: There did he seek for all handsome opportunities to see her, after then usual; but since there was always much company at the house of Steonbea, he went sometimes unto Anaxippa's, where she often used to be, especially when Artelinda was not there, preferring the company of the mother before the daughters, though her virtue was of over severe a strain; yet wheresoever he met her, he still expressed how great an enemy he was unto love, and being a man of an excellent wit, he expressed him|self in such significant terms, as he highly advanced himself in Cleonice's esteem. Ligdamis Page 302 being with her one day at her own house, when Stenobea was gone into the walks with half the Town following her, he began a fresh to court her for her friendship, and the sooner to obtain it, he protested unto her that he was not in love. I do believe it Ligdamis (said she unto him) but what assurance can you give me, that you will not here|after be so. I can give you that assurance my self, Madam, answered he; for most in|fallibly, since I am not in love with you, I shall never be with any: you are absolutely the fairest teat ever I saw, your wit transcends the highest measure of any I know, either man or woman; your virtue ravishes me, your conversation charms me; and notwith|standing all these, my heart apprehends only respective and reverent thoughts of you: I must needs ingeniously acknowledge, that I extremely love you in the degree and quality of friendship, but it is without any exorbitant or unquiet desires: Therefore, Madam, since so much beauty, wit, virtue; so much esteem, and so great a disposition to love you, has not had that influence upon my heart, you are safe, and need not refuse my friendship, nor deny me yours. Love me, Madam, as you love Ismenea, and if you please a little more; for since I resolve to love none upon earth but you, methinks in rea|son you should not refuse to love me a little more than any other. You express your friendship in such obliging terms, replied Cleonice, and blushed, that methinks I ought to suspect you: But Ligdamis, do not deceive your self, I desire sincerity; and though I am confident you are not in love with me, yet perhaps you think I am one of those who only change the name of the thing, but can well enough endure a Lover under the notion of a friend: Take heed therefore what you desire of me, and know, that the friend|ship which I ever can either give or take, is and shall be a most constant real friendship, without any folly or fond thoughts: I would only have you love me, as one brave man may love another; and I shall love you, as I should love a virtuous woman, if I knew any worthy of my entire affection: I ask no more, answered Ligdamis: But first, said she, I would have you binde your self by an oath, that if ever you should be so unfor|tunate as to fall, in love with any beauty, to tell it unto me the same hour; to the end I may assist you with my counsels, and fortifie your reason; and in case you cannot become free, I may be absolved from your friendship; for I seriously declare, that if ever you be in love, I shall be no longer your friend: But, Madam, said he unto her, and smiled, suppose I should fall in love with your self, what must I do then? must I acquaint you with it as soon as ever I perceive it? No, said she, I like not that: What then must I do? replied he: you must wrestle with your passion, answered she, and overcome it, without ever telling me; and though you cannot overcome it, yet be sure to hide it so from me, that I shall never know it. But, answered he, all the world saies love cannot be hid: Then you must hide your self, replied she, and never see me again; yet added she and smiled, I hope that will never come to pass; for the spring can never bring forth more Roses in my cheeks then it hath: I have as much beauty as ever I shall have; and since it has had no operation to move you hitherto, you may be confident it never will, and by consequence our friendship will be eternal. I chanced to come into them as they were upon these terms, and they acquainted me with the conditions of their friendship: But, said, Ligdamis, since I promise you faithfully never to love any, and if to my mis|fortune I should, to acquaint you with it; may not I ask some assurance against Hermo|dorus, and all the rest of your lovers and adorers? For my part, said I, and interrupt|ed them, I conceive it reasonable, Cleonice should make a reciprocal promise: I refuse it not, replied she, for I am so certain never to love any, that I do engage my self un|to it.

Thus, Madam, after much such discourse as this, the friendship between Ligdamis and Cleonice was contracted; and for the more absolute confirmation of it, they both of them vented a thousand invectives against all love and lovers. Since that day, Ligdamis esteemed himself so happy, that he said, he never began to live, till since he was acquaint|ed with Cleonice; and she also was so well pleased with him, that she hath given me a million of thanks for contributing unto their friendship: Then did there arise a great confidence between them: Ligdamis was never upon any design, but he did communicate it unto Cleonice: Whensoever he went unto the Court, it was with her approbation and order, and she had such an absolute power over his life, that she did regulate him in matters of his acquaintance: she made him cast cast off some friends, and take in others, yet all this without any imperious Tyrannie. Ligdamis also was acquainted with some of her secret thoughts, she imparted unto him a thousand domestick grievances, which Page 303 the humour of Stenobea caused: she sincerely told him her thoughts of all, and discovered the very bottom of her soul unto him: And since she had not only a great and piercing wit of her own, but also did with abundance of pains daily add knowledge unto it, to shew the vast treasure of her knowledge, she would often instruct Ligdamis in many things which her modesty made secrets of unto any else. When he was at the Army with the Prince Artamas, he would write unto her, and she to him again; and that in such a strain, as her Letters made him almost as happy as her Presence did. Afterwards Stenobea went unto Sardis, and carried her daughter with her: And since Ligdamis thought he might be serviceable unto her, he went thither also. And indeed he rendered her a most considerable good office during that voyage: For being very eminent in the war, the Prince Artamas, who as you know was then called Cleander, loved him very dearly, so that he made use of him in her business: Moreover, if Ligdamis met with any pleasing news, he never was at rest until he had communicated it unto Cleonice, who was as complacent unto him again; so that a very great confidence was between them. One passage fell out which was like to have begun a little kind of quarrel between them: for Hermodorus was so importunate with Cleonice whether she would or no, that she was forced to answer him in such both plain and sincere language, as he was compelled to rest quiet; and indeed she was so bitter against him, that I wonder he did not retort: For as he was pressing her to give him some reasons why he should forever give over all hopes; Since you will needs know, said she unto him, it is for two reasons; the one, because I am fully resolved never to love any, nor suffer any should love me; the other, because though I did resolve to love one, yet of all men living it should not be Hermodorus: Therefore if you be wise, regulate yourself according to this answer, which without any dissimulation proceeds from the full resolves of my heart. After Cleonice had pronounced this dismal sentence upon this unfortunate Lover, she told it unto Ligdamis and my self; and both of us returned her many thanks, because Hermodorus did often interrupt our conversation. But afterwards we understood that Artelinda, whose humour was to subject all hearts that were Rebels to Love, had used a thousand stratagems unto him, which he never acquainted us withal; which did so much incense Cleonice against him, that I had much ado to appease her: yet acquainting him with her resentments, he went immediately unto her, and told her that the reason why he never acquainted her with it, was out of his modesty to hide the gross follies of Artelinda. So that this reconciliation did tie the knot of friendship faster than ever; and I think it might be said, that their affections had all the tenderness of Love, without any irregularity or distemper; for they had as much delight in seeing and talking with one another, as if they had been the deepest Lovers, without all the impatient consequences of it; and they came to that height, that they were jealous without Love: for Cleonice was in continual fears that Ligdamis should fall in love; and he again was infinitely afraid that some Lover or other would steal the heart of Cleonice from him: For both of them were perswaded (and perhaps not without reason) that a great Love and a great Friendship were impossible to be together in one and the same heart. This kind of Jealousie yet had no bitterness in it, nor produced any sad consequences, but on the contrary made their conversation more obliging and delightful. These two esteemed themselves exceedingly happy; and Cleonice for her part was so well pleased, that she trimmed up herself; yet did she shun Artelinda as much as ever she could, whose false vain-glorious humour was every day more and more horrid unto her. And truly, since we know all her actions by means of Phocylides, who the more to oblige Cleonice, told her all, we were very sorry that one who was brought up under so virtuous a Mother, should be guilty of so much folly: for her heart was still thirsting after conquest upon conquest, without any distinction or choice at all. Then, as the Temple of Diana did draw abundance of strangers unto Ephesus; there came not a man of any quality to that place, whom she did not endeavour to captivate; and certainly she did effect her endeavours, for every one became her servants. As Cleonice, Ligdamis, and I were one day seeking out for a reason why one and the same Beauty should please and take so many different humours, and strangers so far distant: we concluded that Hope was the cause of it. For (to speak in general) it is hard for a man to see a fair and young Lady (whose affability makes men think the conquest of her is no impossibility) and not to tie himself a while unto her service, though it be only out of curiosity. Also it might almost be said, a man had been dishonoured, if he had not some favour or other from Artelinda, and much more if he continued long in the service. But though we were much astonished that Artelinda should captivate so many, yet we did Page 304 much more wonder how Phocylides could delude so many: for we know of six or seven Ladies in Ephesus, who thought themselves passionately loved; and we concluded that we were much obliged unto heaven for inspiring us with more reasonable thoughts. In the mean while, the frequent visits that Ligdamis made unto Cleonice, began to make a great noise, and wound the mind of Artelinda, who could not believe there could be any society between a man and a woman without Courtship: and since she was vexed to the soul, that all her stratagems could never have any effect upon the heart of Amestris, she began to hate them extremely. Phocylides also even desperate that he could never move the mind of Cleonice, and suspecting the favour of Ligdamis was the cause, did also hate them: and both of them plotting how to be revenged of them, took different ways to bring it to pass; for Artelinda attempted to make Cleonice jealous, and Phocylides Ligdamis. Artelinda, though she did visit Cleonice seldom then ordinary, yet sometimes she did see her: And one day being both together, Artelinda took occasion to speak of all the reprehensions which Cleonice twitted her withal concerning the freeness of her behaviour; and being one of the cunningest women upon earth, and the most flattering, after a hundred obliging complements, Was not the reason (said she unto her) why you did so insensibly decline my friendship, because you believed all I said unto you one day when we were alone together, was my real thoughts? It is very true, I did so, and I found your action and your words to agree so well, that I cannot think I did you any wrong in that belief. If that belief, answered she, did not lose me your affection, I should not much care: As for the world in general, I have long since set up my rest so much above all it can either say or think, that I value it not: But I set a much higher rate upon you, my dear Cleonice! (said she, with extremely dissimulation) for it would grieve me to the soul to be excluded your heart; therefore I beseech you be so sincere as to tell me, whether you can afford me your affection, as long as I continue this course. Cleonice thinking Artelinda had spoke sincerely, considering her expressions, did ingeniously confess that she could not separate her friendship and her esteem from one another, and that she could not possibly esteem one who was so weak as to sacrifice her real honour for an imaginary Chimera of vain-glory, as she did by having continually at least a thousand adorers about her: But deceive not your self, for all these flatterers do not love you so well as you believe; and for proof of it, do but take their hopes from them one month, and you shall see how they will fall off: Not that there is any imperfection in your beauty, or that you want any excellent qualities which would render you most accomplished, if you did not spoil them by your behaviour; but the truth is, I do know those whom you deceive, and who deceive you, better than you do, and see with more uninterested eyes and freer judgment the precipice from which you are like to fall. Moreover, how do you imagine I should trust one who deceives all that come near her by dissembling her thoughts, and divides her heart amongst a thousand men whom I do not esteem? And therefore blame me not, if I do not love you. Were you only possessed with a violent passion, though I should not confide in your friendship, yet I should pity you, and hope so to cure you, that hereafter I might love you: but the disease wherewith you are infected I see is incurable, and I thought fit to decline you as much as handsomness will permit. Ah my dear Cleonice! said she, how much do you mistake me? But the sooner to obtain your pity, if not your friendship, (said this crafty woman) I will confess, and confess with a blush, what I have a long time concealed; and I will no longer conceal that Person whom of all the earth I love the best next after—Artelinda stopt at these words; and covering her face with her hand to hide her shame, she stood a while silent: Then seeming to be a little better recollected, Pardon me, dear Cleonice! said she unto her, that my discourse and mind should be in such disorder: For being ready to confess that which I never did unto any, I found some contradiction in my self; and though my will prompted me to discover the bottom of my heart unto you, yet my mouth would not permit me to pronounce his name who is the cause why I live as I do. Cleonice not knowing what Artelinda meant, but being very desirous of it; I do so little understand you, said she unto her, that I cannot return any answer. But you shall understand me presently, replied Artelinda, and sighed: Know therefore, my dear Cleonice, that I am so far from affecting an universal Courtship, that I think my self the most unhappy woman upon earth, for I am engaged in the most firm and constant affection that ever was. How? replied Cleonice, Can Artelinda love firmly and constantly? If I could believe that, though I condemn Love in all others, yet I think I should pardon it in her. Pardon me then, said she: for Page 305 the truth is, what you do condemn me for, proceeds from one whom I love a thousand times above my self; and one who orders the whole course of my life. And will this happy Lover, said Cleonice, permit you to favour a thousand others? Certainly he does, replied she, and purposely to hide that real passion which is in both our souls: for so it is, that if once our affection should come to be known, our happiness would be forever ruined; and the carriage of it hitherto hath been so close, that none in all Ephesus can suspect any thing of that innocent intelligence that is between us. Yet I think it something strange, said Cleonice, that he should let you pass in the opinion of the world for what you are not. When there is no other way to be happy, replied she, that course must be taken. Will he not be jealous of those he permits you to favour? said Cleonice. Very oft, replied she; and that's the reason why sometimes I cast off those whom he thinks I love best. Thus, dear Cleonice, when you thought me so pleasant and gay, having a thousand Adorers about me, then, even then was I most to be pitied; for I always saw those I loved not, but seldom him whom I did love: Judge therefore, dear Cleonice, whether you did not use me cruelly in denying me your friendship, and in taxing me with so many follies: I desire to be pardoned for not naming him who hath my heart; but I had rather you should guess who it is, if it be possible. I am not to be too pressing into the secrets of another, replied Cleonice, and therefore I will try if I can hit upon him: But however, Artelinda, though I pity you more than I did, yet I blame you no less: for whosoever your Lover is, I cannot allow of sacrificing your honour to his capricious fancy. If I should name him, replied she, perhaps you would forbear your censure, for there is not in the world a wiser man than he.

Thus, Madam, did this conference pass, which did exceedingly puzzle Cleonice, for she suspected some trick in it: but yet not knowing very well what to think of it, she kept it to herself, and did not impart it either unto Ligdamis or me. Some few dayes passed on in these thoughts, and then she went to visit Artelinda, who expected her with much impatience, and prepared to receive her in private, whosoever she came. She no sooner heard she was coming, but she set a little Box open upon the table, in which were divers things, and among others there was a Letter laid upon the

the	top	of	them,	which	had	this	superscription:
-----	-----	----	-------	-------	-----	------	-----------------

LIGDAMIS to the Fair ARTELINDA.

Presently this cunning woman retired into her Closet, imagining in all likelihood that Cleonice would find this Letter, and know the hand, and perhaps take it with her. And indeed she was not deceived; for Cleonice was no sooner come into the room, but seeing this Box upon the table, she went towards it, thinking to find some pretty knacks which might please her: But she no sooner cast her eyes upon it, then she knew it to be the hand of Ligdamis; and no sooner knew it, then she took it up; and no sooner took it, then, hearing Artelinda coming, hid it, and seemed to rumble up and down all that was in the Box, and she said she looked not for any Letters, but for some Verses only. Artelinda even ravished at the dissimulation of Cleonice, took the Box out of her hands very hastily: Truly, insensible Cleonice, said she unto her, you received my confidence so ill the other day, that I am resolved to tell you no more than I did, and will not discover the Party whom I love unto you. Cleonice being infinitely desirous to know whether Ligdamis loved Artelinda, did much importune her to tell her who he was, but still she would not: So that seeing all her entreaties would not prevail, and being very impatient to read this Letter which she had taken, she made her visit very short, and went home; and was no sooner in her Chamber, but she opened the Letter, and read these words:

LIGDAMIS to the Fair ARTELINDA.

I know you are the most amiable upon earth: continue, I beseech you, those amorous fallacies, which make so many happy, and so many miserable; and never fear it shall ever prejudice you in my opinion, for you are there so thought upon, that nothing can alter it. The more hearts you captivate, the more you please me, and the more shall I admire you: I shall not need to tell you how much of my soul is yours; let it suffice that you call to memory my expressions. Page 306 the last time I had the happy honour to talk in private with you; for I dare not commit them to a thin piece of paper: It was happy I was so bold as to tell them once; and it is enough that I now protest my thoughts shall never change, but that I shall be forever the same I was within these three dayes.

LIGDAMIS.

After Cleonice had read this Letter, she stood in a maze, and knew not what to think: For as she knew of some other passages between Artelinda and Ligdamis, so now she made no question but there was a great correspondence between them; and she was so exceedingly incensed that Ligdamis should be so weak, that she thought she could not look upon him but with angry eyes: For, said she, if he be in love with Artelinda, I am extremely mistaken in him; and if he be not, yet however I must break off with him, since I can no more endure he should be a Cheat, then I can he should be a Lover. In the mean time he knows all the secrets of my heart: I have spoken a hundred times against Artelinda, I have told him what I thought of her, and in all likelihood he courts this very Lady. Yet notwithstanding, said she, had he acquainted her with that friendship which we have contracted, she would never have spoke to me as she did. But what can I justly infer from all this? since those who are sincere, cannot easily guess what those who are not so do think. However I must break off with Ligdamis, and expose my self no more to be deceived: I will trust none, nor love any whosoever; but live with as much caution amongst those who profess friendship, as with those that declare themselves my enemies. Yet she resolved not to acquaint Ligdamis with what she knew of him, nor knew she well whether she should accuse him of his crime and chide him. As she was amidst these con|templations, Ligdamis came into her chamber, and came from Stenobea, to bring her un|to hers: As soon as she spied him, she hastily took up the Letter, and hid it with much diligence, seeming to be as much troubled at it, as if Ligdamis were her husband, and that Letter had been to one of his Mistresses. Yet could not Cleonice so soon put up this Letter but it was seen; nor could she so well dissemble, but he knew there was something in her mind which angered her, and that his presence was but troublesom. So that coming a little neerer her, Madam, said he, I undertook this commission from Stenobia, to come for you, with much joy, because I thought you would have willingly obeyed her: but I see that I am disappointed, for I see you conceal a Letter which questionless you do not desire I should see; and your very eyes do tell me that I am troublesom unto you. You know, Ligdamis, said she, that the secrets of others are not our own; and since I have no interest in the Contents of this Letter, I will not shew it unto you: In the mean time, I will obey those commands which you have brought. And in saying so, she prepared herself to go out of her chamber into her Mothers. Ligdamis would have stayed her, and conjured her first to tell him what it was which troubled her mind: Yet she would not answer him a word, but went away into company, where both of them were very reserved, and looked upon one another so sternly, that they observed and made others also take notice of their distempers. As for Ligdamis, his heart durst not resolve upon any thing against Cleonice: but she had other thoughts of him; for the more discontent she found in the eyes of him, the more she accused him, imagining that his guilt made him ashamed, and was the true cause of all the disorder which appeared in his mind. In the interim, Phocylides, who much desired to know certainly whether Ligdamis was in Love, seemed according to his custom, to be so with one that was sister unto Ligdamis, who then was with us: And since he had wit at will, he thought it would not be a piece of any great difficulty to scru|e it out of her. But he was at a great non-plus, when he understood from her, that Ligdamis was never unquiet or troubled; that he made no secrets of Cleonice's Letters, but on the con|trary did frequently shew them; and that there appeared no arguments of his being in Love, only his frequent visits, and continual commendations of Cleonice when any o|ccasions were offered. And he found that these were not absolute arguments whereby to conclude he was in Love; so that he knew not either what to say or think: since he was not one of an humour to love violently, he himself was never much unquiet; and the Jeal|lousie of such men may rather be termed Curiosity then Jealousie. As for Artelinda, she did secretly triumph in being a cause of Cleonice's trouble: yet was her Joy not over-full of tranquillity, because she was still in some doubt there was some secret affection between Ligdamis and Cleonice: for if that were not, said she, she would never have taken that Letter and concealed it; and if she had not conceived herself interested in Ligdamis when Page 307 she saw his hand, she would not have come off with so short a visit, nor been so impatient to be gone. Thus did Artelinda argue; all whose thoughts, since then, we came to know, for she was not of any humour of keeping secrets very well. In the mean while Ligdamis could not imagine what this Letter should be, which Cleonice so carefully concealed; nor could he conceive what it was which so troubled her mind: He could not think upon any thing else but it; and when he returned home, he would not admit of any company wh|osoever. Yet did he wonder to find himself so unquiet, and was angry that he should be no more a master of his own mind: conceiving, that friendship only ought not to cause so many angry hours; nor knowing any reason why the sight of this Letter which she so closely concealed, should cause any such sensible sorrow in himself, since he was not in love with her. Yet since friendship may be as tender as love, it may be also a cause of as much quietness; and one may fear the loss of a Friend, as well as the loss of a Mistress. Finding therefore that he had some reason to be troubled, he waited with much impatiencie till the next morning, before he could clear himself of his doubts: yet he could not so soon; for though he went betimes to the house of Cleonice, yet she was gone forth before he came. But, Madam, that which caused her haste, was her fancie to tell Artelinda all that had passed between Ligdamis and her, to the end she might better be convinced of his being in love, though she was absolutely perswaded that he was: for besides this Letter, she knew that the Father of Ligdamis would not suffer his son to marry any but one woman whom he had proposed unto him. So that she expounded all that Artelinda had told her, even as that cunning woman wished. But to clear all, Cleonice went to Artelinda's cham|ber, and conjured her to discover the name of this fantastical Lover who permitted her a hundred servants. Cleonice, said Artelinda to her, I confess I ought to be fuller of pity then you yourself have been: but you shall never know it, not only because you are too cruel, but also because he whom you would have me name, hearing of our private confe|rences, is so afraid I should discover our correspondence unto you, that since yesterday he hath written no less then thrice unto me, that he will absolutely break off with me, if ever he hear I acquaint you with the league that is between us: Therefore, Cleonice, I beseech you pardon me, and importune me no further to tell his name: I confess his pro|ceeding does much astonish me, because I cannot comprehend his reason why he should so much fear I should disclose our secret unto you, especially knowing that he esteems you very highly. And truly, I must also confess (said this subtle woman) that if you were less severe then you are, I should think this Man hath told you as well as me, that he loves you, and so deceives us both. Therefore, Cleonice, (said she still most craftily) if there be any man, who notwithstanding your severity, does tell you any delighting lyes, which do not displease those who do not believe them; I conjure you to confess it unto me, and name the man who told them; promising you that if you name him whom I mean, I will imme|diately acknowledge him, for I have as great a desire to tell his name, as you have to know it: Speak therefore, Cleonice, and tell me the man, to the end that joyning our interests and resentments together, we may both of us hate the man that thus divides his heart between us. For my part, said Cleonice, (who found enough to confirm her in the opinion she had of Ligdamis) since none ever talks to me concerning matters of Love, I can nei|ther satisfy your curiosity nor my own. Ha Cleonice, said Artelinda, you speak in too generall terms to be credited; for how is it possible men should see you, and not tell you at the least that they think you fair, since I my self, who am not in a capacity to love you, cannot chuse but say as much? However, said she, you may very well speak more sin|cerely unto me, since I would trust you with things of my greatest importance. I do not desire, Cleonice, you should tell me who it is that you love, but who it is that loves you: I perceive very plainly you will not satisfy me, because you will not so much as name Hermodorus. I shall not name him indeed, replied Cleonice, as well because he hath ceased his Courtship, as because I know it is not he with whom you hold this secret correspon|dence. As they were thus in discourse, Ligdamis hearing Cleonice was there, came into the chamber. As soon as he appeared, Cleonice blusht; and Artelinda counterfeiting sadness, she drew her stool further from Cleonice, as if she were afraid Ligdamis should observe she whispered with her.

This conversation was not pleasing unto any but Artelinda, who had a secret malignant joy, to observe the restless minde of Cleonice, who not being able any longer to en|dure the company either of Artelinda, or of such a perfidious friend as she conceived Ligdamis to be, did rise up, and would have gone away. He presented his hand unto Page 308 her, to lead her out; though this visit was so short, that it was a kinde of incivility o|ffered unto Artelinda to go so soon; but Cleonice imagining that his going with her was only to dissemble the better, would not suffer him to go with her; and to hinder him, she said she was not going to her own house: adding further, with a forced smile, that she would not incur the hatred of two such friends at once, by separating them so soon. Artelinda replied unto this, according to her usual subtilty, and Ligdamis could not imagine why she should say so; for her looks were so serious, as he could not believe it to be a bare complement, without any design, so that he would however conduct her to her coach; and as short as his visit had been, yet would he not go in again, but would see whether Cleonice said true, in saying she went not unto her own house: So that he fol|lowed after her; and Cleonice looking back to see whether he staid with Artelinda, saw him follow, and thought that it was only the better to cozen her: and though she told him she was not going home, yet she did, since the anguish of her minde would not permit her to make any more visits. Ligdamis, as soon as he saw her go into her own house, knew certainly she was not friends with him; and thought the reason of it to be, because there was some other whom she loved, of which the Letter he had seen, and language Cleonice gave him, were convincing proofs: She dares not, said he, acknowledge her weakness unto me; however, she might have broke off with me a little more civilly. Thus Madam, did Ligdamis argue with himself, who being very desirous to satisfy all doubts, went the same hour unto Cleonice: And coming into her chamber, he did exceedingly sur|prize her. Madam, said he unto her, I did not think that any little lyes (if I may so phrase them) were allowable amongst such as profess sincere friendship; however, if I durst, I would chide you for telling me you would not go presently to your own house. I did not intend it, replied she, when I told you so, but I altered my minde afterwards. Oh Madam, replied Ligdamis, do not adde crime to crime: if you do not think me worthy of your friendship, or that you cannot keep any longer within our conditions, I beseech you let us break off. I do not ask who that happy man is, from whom that Letter came, which you preserve so secretly. That happy one, replied she, sharply, is more of your acquaint|tance then mine. I do not know a man, replied he, that merits those favours which you do him. I do agree with you, replied she, he does not deserve them. Why then, replied he, do you make him your friend or lover, for I know not which of those two attri|butes he must have. As for the last of these two, replied she, let us refer it unto Artelinda; and as for the other, I hope he shall not long wear that title. Artelinda has so many Lovers, replied Ligdamis, much perplexed, that I cannot imagine which you mean. It is very true, said Cleonice very fiercely: but Cleonice has so few friends, that you may quickly guess if you please; but Ligdamis, shame shuts up your mouth. Mine, Madam! replied he, much amazed; rather say, a real respect imposeth silence, and keeps me from accusing you. You carry it very confidently, replied she, to be so culpable, and yet complain. I do do so, replied he, but with much respect: therefore without further aggravations, I beseech you, Madam, be so generous as to tell me sincerely, whe|ther it be fit I should be any longer your friend: for since friendship as well as love should proceed from a free and voluntary consent, I shall trouble you no further, but free you from the trouble which my presence causes; nor will I any longer disturb the joys of that happy stranger, whose Letters are so dear unto you. I do assure you, said she unto him, that he who writ the Letter which sticks so in your stomach, is one whom I will nei|ver see again, as soon as I have lost the sight of you. Ligdamis amazed at this answer, importun'd her to speak more plainly: Then, since she was fully resolved to break off with him that very day, she pul'd out of her pocket that Letter which she took from Artelinda; and shewing it unto him, Look, perfidious and dissembling man, whether he that writ this Letter, be my Lover or my Friend; or whether he be not rather an Impo|stor? Oh Madam (cried he out) how fallacious are all appearances, if you think this Letter any argument of Love to Artelinda? Oh Ligdamis, said she, how can you be so impudent as to deny your crime, and justify your self? No, no, I am not so easily gul|led, nor ever will; for I will trust no more, and then the most subtil shall never deceive me. However Ligdamis was less grieved that she should complain against him, then to have cause to complain against her, because he knew he was not culpable. But when he proffered to deliver his reasons; she prevented him, saying, she would tell hers first. But Madam, said he unto her, I believe you have no good ones. Why, said she, do you not think I have just cause to think you the veryest impostor amongst men, to counterfeit Page 309 as you have done; to condemn Love, to vent continual Satyrs against it, and in the shew of all the world to abhor it, whilst in the mean time you loved Artelinda, and to hide your Courtship, wished her to entertain a hundred gallants about her? Believe me Ligdamis, she carries it very well; but let me tell you, that heart which you think is so totall|y yours, is not so: However, let me tell you, I will have no more of your friendship: and since the conditions between us was not to be in love, I have kept my promise. How Madam, replied Ligdamis, is it possible you should think I am in love with Artelinda? Why Ligdamis, said she, I need not doubt it, since I read this Letter, and know what Artelinda told me. Artelinda, replied he, is a crafty woman, whose words ought allways to be held in suspicion: and as for the Letter, Madam, if you do but understand the true sense of it, you will finde it to be far from any signs of love. I do ingeniously con|fess my self to blame in not acquainting you with the extravagancies of Artelinda; yet I hope it is not a fault impardonable: on the contrary, I conceive you are obliged unto me for it; for the reason why I conceal'd her follies from you, was out of respect and love to you, and therefore you would be most unjust and cruel if you should punish me for it. I do most seriously protest (said he unto her) that I am not in love with Artelinda, that I never was, nor ever will be. If this be not fully satisfaction, but that you will needs have me tell you the adventure between this Lady and me, I must first for my satisfaction, entreat you to seem as if you were ignorant of what I shall discover unto you; for truly Artelinda is so indiscreet, that she moves my pity, not that she is guilty of any such crimes as will put one to the blush; for certainly never any of her most favor|ed servants ever obtained any thing of her, which did directly; would her virtue; and because she knows that those which serve her, cannot accuse her of any crime, she is there|fore the more bold to speak, to write, and do a hundred things which are not very hand|some. A very handsom preamble (said Cleonice, and interrupted him) to excuse one whom one does not love. Ligdamis then seeing by the manner of her speech, that there was an absolute necessity of a handsom interpretation of such contradictions, was forced to confess, that being one day with Artelinda, she did with so much art and boldness together, engage him in a conversation of Gallantry, that he never in his life was more perplexed. What could she say unto you? (said Cleonice to him, being extremely desirous to know the passage) for I cannot imagine it possible, that such a one as Artelinda could begin first any such discourse. Ligdamis seeing there was no way to justify himself, but by his obedience unto Cleonice, began to relate what she so much desired to know. As I was sitting very seriously by Artelinda, said he unto her, she asked me the reason of my reservedness: unto which I did not answer, because the only cause of my reservedness was nothing else, but that I was engaged in company of one whose disposition was so contrary unto mine: but I answered in an ambiguous sense, so that she much rejoiced at it, and told me with a smile, that she had seen in her life-time more Lovers than one, who carried it as I did, when they loved and durst not tell: I do protest unto you, said I unto her, and laughed also, that this is not the cause of my reservedness; for truly if I were so unfortunate or fond as to be in love with you, I should not make a secret of it. You would say (answered she) that I should be more glad to hear of such a thing, then you are fearful to discover it unto me, since all the world twits me with it. But for all that, if you chance to love me hereafter, you would not finde it so easie matter as you think to discover it unto me: for you are such a declared enemy unto that passion, as you will be ashamed to contradict your self: however, said she, and laughed, perhaps you love me already a little; and that which makes me believe it, is because I observe you shun me, and because I am terrible unto you: This is a very extraordinary sign of love (said I unto her) As extraordinary as it is (said she still in Rallery) it is a sign; for my glass tells me, that my face cannot fright you: my company is not so dull as to make you shun it; and therefore I must needs conclude, that you flie me because you fear I should overcome you, and captivate you. Captivity indeed is so great a misery, said I unto her, that though I avoid it for that reason, yet am I excusable: But, Madam, since I am sincerely plain, I must tell you, that is not the reason why I decline your conversation: but the real reason is, because I know not how to talk with you; to admire your beauty, I cannot, because I am not sensible of it; to discourse of wars, is not a fit subject for Ladies; to talk of gallantry, that would seem as if I did dispute with you; to speak of liberty unto one who every day captivates so many slaves, were indiscreet; to profess against love, will be thought <...> ustick and barbarism: so that not knowing what to say, I flie your company as much as <◇> can handsomely.

Page 310 Since you are in an humour to speak so freely unto me, said she to him, I pray tell me really what are your thoughts of me? Are you indifferent? or have you any aversion against me? Do you hate me? or scorn me? or esteem me? or love me? I do protest unto you (said I unto her, and laughed) except it be the last of these, I have a little of all the rest: For I am very indifferent of you, by reason of the conquests you use to make; I am very averse to your humour of favouring so many men as you do; I hate you and scorn you for some of your servants sakes; and I esteem you for the greatness and vivacity of your spirit. But to speak in general, said she unto me, what is the result of all these thoughts together, and what do you think of me? I think you are one of the fairest women in the world, said I unto her; but the less amiable, because too much loved. It is well, said she unto me, that I can draw so much commendations from one that is a professed enemy unto all Gallantry; and, Ligdamis, you must know, that Commendations is the first step to Love. However (said she still in rallery) if it chance ever to be my hap to wound you, I promise you to release at least six of my Captives for the love of you. They think themselves so happy in it, said I unto her, that it is much better to let them alone in their chains, then to loaden me with them. I shall never see you in private, said she unto me, but I shall ask you what progress I have made in your heart. This, Madam, said Ligdamis, was the discourse between Artelinda and my self. About three days after meeting me in a place where she shewed me some Verses composed by the famous Sapho, which were sent her from Mitilene, I desired her to lend them unto me; but she refused, saying she would send them to me; and so she did indeed that very same night with a Letter, the answer unto which you have already. That I may the better believe what you say, said Cleonice unto him, I wish I could see this Letter. That will be no difficult matter, replied he: for as I remember, I writ something upon the backside of it concerning the fortification of Ephesus, which the illustrious Cleander entrusted me with. You will not tell me then, replied Cleonice, that you have kept it out of affection to the Sender. I will not indeed, answered he; for I should think my self a very fool, if I had the least tenderness of Artelinda in me, and therefore far from love. However Ligdamis, to lose no time, sent one of his servants to look in his Closet for this Letter, and accordingly he brought it: but though it was torn in some places, yet Cleonice read these words, after she had very circumspectly looked upon the back-side, to see whether Ligdamis had spoken truth or no.

ARTELINDA unto LIGDAMIS.

TO testifie how much I profited by your last conversation, know, that my desires were so much to please you, as I have not captivated any these three dayes. Send me word, I pray you, what consequences this will effect upon your heart, to the end that if I cannot make any further happy progress therein, I may stop, and engage my self no further: but I pray you consider seriously before you answer

ARTELINDA.

After Cleonice had read this Letter and seriously looked upon it, she told Ligdamis that it was not written by Artelinda. You must know, Madam, said he unto her, that she writes severall hands: she does not write unto her friends in the same character that she useth to write unto her Lovers; and if you will be pleased to ask Phocylides, he will shew you that I speak the truth.

But, Madam, Ligdamis spoke so well in his own cause, that he moved Cleonice to believe him; and causing her to compare his Answer with her Letter, she found not the least cause of suspicion. Moreover Cleonice remembering that Artelinda told her, it was her pretended Lovers desire she should carry herself as she did; and that did either plainly appear to be a lye, or else that it was not Ligdamis; because she writ, that to please him she had not captivated any in three dayes. As Cleonice was thus very busie in examination of the matter, I came into her chamber; and the quarrel between them being related unto me, I justified Ligdamis, and composed all difference between them: for I had not come to see Cleonice that day, but only to shew a Letter which Artelinda had writ unto one of her Adorers who was kinsman unto me; and since she found it to be the very same Page 311 character with that which Ligdamis shewed her, she desired pardon for accusing him. After this, they begun new protestations of Frieddship, and lived as they did before, in much sweetness and confidence in each other, all the stratagems and plots of Artelinda and Phocylides not being able to molest them. As for Hemodorus, as he loved none but Cleonice, so it was his only business to observe her: And though the frequent visits of Ligdamis caused him many an angry hour, yet he smothered his sorrows as well as he could: For as Cleonice had forbid him all expressions of Love, so he durst not shew his Jealousie, but silently suffered all his sorrows in secret. For our parts, it may be said we lived in a Paradise of Pleasures; Cleonice was sensible of no distastes, but what the humour of Stenobea procured her, which she imparting unto Ligdamis, he lessened the burthen, and doubled all her joys. For my part, the esteem of these two firm friends was fullness of happiness to me: I was the Mercury who brought the news of the Town always unto them, and principally concerning Artelinda. I remember one day, hearing one of her: Lovers being gone a journey into the Country, and leaving a Brother with her as his Agent in his absence, he himself fell in love with her, and she would not by any means suffer him to talk of his love unto her, I related the whole story unto them, which had a hundred odd passages in it: and after I had finished my tale; For my part; said Cleonice, I cannot comprehend how one should fall in love with another after they have lived a long time together, without the least sensibility of that Passion: For truly, as I imagine the manner of it, it is its quality to surprize one upon a sudden, and take up the minde all at once, and not steal on by little and little, as Friendship does. Truly, said I on the contrary, I think it much less strange that one should begin to love another after they perfectly are acquainted, and know the qualities of each other, then to see men in the highest extreams, and love excessively the first minute they see the party. Since it is certain, said Ligdamis, that love is an effect of a predominate simpathy, rather then of any perfect knowledge, there is less cause of wonder to see one love at the first minute, then after long acquaintance. However, I am fully perswaded, said Cleonice, that one never passes from terms of Friendship, unto terms of Love; and that one is more apt to fall in love with another, of whom he had but an indifferent opinion, then with one with whom he was upon terms of most tender Friendship. For my part, said I unto her, I am not of your opinion; for certainly it is a greater invitement unto Love, to be esteemed, to be loved, to be courted and pleased with the conversation of one, then not to be at all acquainted; or if acquainted, to have but thoughts of indifference: Nor do I believe I am much mistaken when I affirm, that there is much more heat in the hearts of those who are upon terms of violent Friendship, then in those that are upon terms only of common and indifferent Love. Oh Ismene! cried out Cleonice; you put me into an extream fright by saying so: For if you can perswade me of that, you will make me hate Ligdamis. You would be very unjust then, said he, though Ismene had reason for one thing which she affirmed; for I do verily believe with her, that a violent Friendship hath more heat then a mean and indifferent Love: But Madam, there is as vast a difference between these two, as there is between the heat of the Sun, and that of the Fire: The first of these warms and comforts without burning; and the other burns as soon as touched: This is the reason that Love is never without sorrows and distempers; whereas on the contrary, violent friendship may be without any impatiency or trouble. This simile, said Cleonice, does something perswade me against the opinion of Ismene. He speaks only what will please you Madam (said I unto her purposely to cause dispute) but for all that, he cannot make me believe that a little star can yellow corn, or parch the ground so much as the rays of the Sun. For my part, said Cleonice unto me, and laughed, you make me suspect there is some naughty affection (unto which you do not give the name) which belongs unto it. And you will perswade me, said I unto her, that you only esteem Ligdamis, and have not thoughts of Friendship at all. I had rather he should think so, said she, then that he should think I had any thoughts of him, which might become Love. I never had so good an opinion of my self, replied he, nor so bad of you, as to imagine any such thing; though, added he and laughed, if ever the fair Cleonice should be capable of a kinde of affection, I wish it may be unto my advantage. Ha Ligdamis, cried she out, this wish does extremely offend me. If I had wished that you should love me after another manner then you do, replied he, then doubtless I had been to blame, in violating the Promises which I made unto you: But I can not think it will offend you to say, that if of necessity you must love any, I wish rather it Page 310 <1 page duplicate> Page 311 <1 page duplicate> Page 312 were me then another. But if you do not love me, replied she, (as I do not desire you should) why do you wish so as you do? for is there any thing in the world more ridiculous and extravagant, then to see one of my sexe to love, and not to be loved again? Indeed, Ligdamis, I do not like you should fancie such fond suppositions as these.

But Madam (said I unto her, and was much delighted with her anger) I pray tell us, suppose the case your own, and that Ligdamis should fall in love, had you not rather it should be with you then any other? Really, Ismene, said she unto me, I think you have both lost your wits: Ligdamis, in wishing me in such an injurious case; and you, in asking me such odd questions. However answer me, said I unto her. Can you think, replied she, and blusht, that there is none in the world he can be in love withall but me? There is none in all the world, Madam, replied he, who can render my weakness more excusable then you: but I pray you tell me, Cleonice, said I unto her, why do you ask that question? I ask it, answered she, both in relation to his interest and my own; for certainly, with whomsoever I can be in love, there is more possibility that he shall be loved again by any sooner then by me, who am fully determined never to love any: Moreover, Ligdamis in loving another, does only give me a testimony of his weakness; but in loving me, he does me an injury, since we have concluded none can love without hope, and he can never hope unless he wrong me. But you, said she to Ligdamis, who take upon you so much freedom as to say you had rather be the object of my weakness then of anothers, what good reasons can you give me for your rather? Though I had none more strong, answered he, then that I should never publish it, but could better conceal your affection to me then any other, yet that were sufficient. However it be (said she half angry) pray let us speak no more of it: for I perceive we are more apt to discourse of this Passion, then if we were not declared enemies unto it.

The chafe in which Leonice was, made me laugh as well as Ligdamis: For to persecute her a little, we asked her a hundred odd questions, unto which she would answer sometimes in rallery, and sometimes in anger: but at the end of our conversation we were all in one opinion, and parted good friends. In the interim Artelinda was almost out of her wits, to see her plots, did thrive no better: but being of an humour not to grieve long for any thing, she cheered up herself in the multitude of her Lovers. Phocylides also not knowing which way to trouble the tranquillity of Ligdamis and Cleonice, did desist from ever thinking of it, and lived according to his accustomed rate, as well as Hermodorus. A little while after, the illustrious Cleander conferred the Government of the Castle of Hermes upon the Father of Ligdamis, so that there was a necessity of his going unto the Court to render thanks: And therefore he took his leave of Cleonice, who rejoiced much at the honour which was conferred upon his family. But in parting from her, though it was but for a few dayes, yet he seemed more sad then he used to be when he parted from her upon less pleasing occasions then this: For when he went to the wars, his journees were long, and the cause dangerous. However, he made no great reflexion upon it then, but came to Sardis, supposing himself only a friend unto Cleonice, and not so much as suspecting he should ever become a Lover. Since he had the honour to be deep in Cleanders love, he retained him longer then he thought: But though the Court at that time was the most glorious Court in the world, as you know (Madam) much better then I do, yet was he extremely discontented, and so impatient was he to return to Ephesus, that he left the Court much sooner then Cleander desired; but he returned with so many symptoms of joy in his face, that Cleonice, when he came to visit her, imagined that some great good fortune had happened to him which she was ignorant of, though the only cause of all his joy was only to see her. However, Ligdamis was much amazed to perceive, that by little and little the tranquillity of his mind was troubled without any apparent cause: For his fortunes were in better state then ever; his health was not impaired; he could not possibly be upon better terms with Cleonice then he was: There wanted nothing which could conduce unto his happiness, but to be sensible of it, as formerly he had been: His reason sometimes told him he could not be better. When he was out of Cleonice's sight, he could not endure the absence; and when he was with her, yet was he not contented: He looked upon her more, and spoke less: He was so extremely unquiet, that he began to suspect his mind was changed, and that he was in Love. The very first thought of it did raise such a turbulent storm in his soul, that all his Reason could not lay it: But in the end, examining the bottom of his heart, and comparing his former estate unto that wherein he was at present, he found he was not master of himself, but that Love Page 313 was a triumphant Conqueror. To be better satisfied, he asked himself what it was he would have? what he desired? As for matter of Fortune, said he, I am fully contented, for my ambition goes no higher: As relating to Cleonice, I have good reason also to be satisfied with her. But he had no sooner said so, then he perceived presently that he was not; but was so full of such unquiet desires as have no limited objects, that he sensibly found he was in love, and loved violently. Then did he remember, that for fifteen dayes together he had used no invective expressions against Love; but always when he had some desire unto it, they were mixed with some repugnance contrary to his custom. So that after a strict survey of himself, he knew most certainly that he was absolutely in Love. Yet could he not think that his disease was incurable; but on the contrary thought, that to desire against it, had been antidote sufficient: yet when he consulted with his will, he found that he had no desire at all to be cured. However, he resolved to wrestle with his Passion; and in order to a conquest, he brought as many Reasons as possibly he could invent, but all too weak, and fruitless.

Seeing then he could not vanquish himself, he resolved at the least to hide his passion, as well because he was ashamed of his weakness, as because he knew that if Cleonice perceived it, she would withdraw her friendship, and treat him ill. Sometimes he would ask himself, whether it was true that he was in love? What, (would he say to himself) is this the insensible Ligdamis, who with so much zeal condemned Love, and yet suffers himself to be vanquished? Fie, fie, I cannot think it: However, I find my heart is not my own, my soul is in disorder; the friendship of Cleonice doth not satisfy me; that which was wont to please me, troubles me; I study and muse without a cause: I can find no rest either in the absence or the presence of Cleonice: when I am out of her sight, I am infinitely impatient to see her, and think that then my happiness would be full; yet when I am come into her presence, my joyes to see her are not pure, but mixt with desire of something else, though I know not what: Fain would I tell her my mind; but how can I tell her that I love her, since I have been so invective against Love? and contracted friendship with her, because both she and I were enemies to that passion? No, no, I can never be able to do it. But alas! said he, and reprehended himself, is it possible I can live so restless without any complaint? Yet Cleonice engaged me, that if ever I should be so unfortunate and fond as to be in love with her, I should endeavour to vanquish my passion, at the least to hide it; and if I could not, to banish my self, and forbear her company. I have already found that the first of these injunctions is absolutely impossible, and I do very much doubt the second. My case is very hard, said he: for all other Lovers, when they begin to love, may hope that their complaints will be heard; they are not forbid to speak of their passions, till after they have expressed themselves, so that they are sure their Loves are known: But my destiny is very malignant, for they forbid me to speak of Love, before ever I was in Love. Others, I say, in discovering their affection, are not in any danger to lose any thing, but may hope as well as fear: Yet I am almost certain, that Cleonice will withdraw her friendship from me, as soon as I discover mine. However, said he, since my heart hath changed, why may not hers also? Hope then, said he, hope Ligdamis! Then presently his soul was so full of fears, that he lost all hope, and almost his reason: yet since he could do nothing else, he resolved to disguise his thoughts, having not a heart to tell her that he loved her, or to deprive himself of her sight. He visited her therefore as he was wont, but almost without any delight, by reason of his constrained way: He desired to look upon her without distraction, as formerly he did, but alas it was impossible; his eyes, whether he would or no, betrayed the secrets of his heart; he wished she could guess at the motions of his soul: but with much care did he hide that, which rather then his life he would have her know, and which yet he durst not tell her. Since Cleonice did not suspect any thing of all this, she took no notice of this alteration in Ligdamis: yet within a while after he was so distempered, and so reserved, that she perceived it, and asked him the cause with so much sincerity, as let him know she was ignorant of it: And he, being fearfull to acquaint her with such an unwelcome truth, answered, that his reservedness proceeded from a foolish indisposition of melancholy, without any cause; and Cleonice believing him, did strive as much as she could to divert him by a hundred obliging endeavours.

I well remember, how at that time Artelinda afforded us an ample subject to speak against Love: For, Madam, one of her Lovers being gone a journey, and leaving a Brother with her as his Agent, to present his Letters unto Artelinda, and to receive her answers, Page 314 she made a Captive of him, who was only a Solicitor for another, and shewed more favours unto him, then to the Party for whom he did negotiate. Phocylides also gave us another subject of talk, in perswading two mortal enemies which she loved, and making them both believe severally, that he did but mock the other whom he hated. Having met with these two fresh adventures in one day; Cleonice, Ligdamis and I being together, Cleonice, according to her wonted manner, began to speak against the fantastical effects of Love. Ligdamis, after he had been along while and spoke not a word, told her that she did mistake things, since these kinde of extravagancies are rather caused by the folly of them that do them, then by Love, which really had never any room in their hearts: For indeed Artelinda and Phocylides are not in love. Yet if there were no such things as Love in the world, replied Cleonice they would not do any such things: But Ligdamis, said she; and laughed, how comes it to pass that you make a difference between Love, and the follies of Artelinda and Phocylides? Because (answered he coldly) I have so many things besides to accuse them of, that I will not charge them unjustly. For my part, said she, I am not so indulgent unto them as you are; for I do accuse Love of all the evils in the world. Suppose it should deprive me of my reason, said he, would you be glad of it? No, believe me, said she; for I love you more then I hate Love; and therefore I assure you I should be extremely sorry: But I am so well perswaded of your wisdom, that I never need fear any such thing. Yet they say, replied he, men must be in love once in their lives. I do not think that so general a Rule, but it will admit of some exceptions, replied she, and laughed; for Ligdamis has seen all the springing Beauties in Ephesus and Sardis, and none of them could ever draw him into any danger; therefore I hope he will never be in love, and by consequence will for ever enjoy my Friendship. I promise you all the Beauties of Ephesus (said he unto her) cannot keep me from loving you. But you say nothing of our Sardinian Stars (said she, and laughed still) Since you fear them not, replied he, and blush'd, I need not speak of them. Cleonice observing an alteration in the face of Ligdamis, began to repeat all the conditions of their Friendship. Do you not remember, said she unto him, that I promised you my Affection, as long as you were not in love, and no longer; and how you for your part promised, if ever you were in love, you would acquaint me with it that very same hour. I do not know Madam, (replied he with a far fetched sigh) what your commands were, in case I should be in love with you. Though there be not necessity of a repetition, replied she, yet I will remember you, how I said I would not have you acquaint me with it, that you should endeavor to vanquish the passion; that if you could not, yet to conceal it; and if you could not do that, then to hide your self, and never see me again. But Madam, replied he, did you never alter your minde since that time? No, replied she, not at all: But Ligdamis, I hope you will finde no great difficulty in obeying me; and since no other can captivate you, you will be still free, and I ever your friend: Though truly your reservedness and melancholy of Love hath put me into many fears; for I allwayes imagined when you came unto me, that you came with intentions to discover your weakness, and to tell me you were either in love with Artelinda or some other. Ligdamis did blush at this discourse. I asked him the cause; and he told me it was usual for them to blush who were suspected of any injustice.

Thus, Madam, was their discourse, which did double all the miseries of Ligdamis, and grew so insupportable, that he was not able to endure them: He offered a hundred and a hundred times to tell her that he loved her, and his reverent respects of her stopped his mouth. Then did he determine to discover his love unto her by his obedience; that was, in ceasing to see her; conceiving no way better to let her know it, and not incense her: This way of declaring love, was a hard chapter; but since he could not speak, silence it seems must speak for him; and he esteemed it one degree of happiness in his misery, that he hoped she would thereby understand his meaning: Then, after a long visit without a minute of private discourse, because much company was there that day, as he was going out with the rest of the company, which went out almost altogether; Shall I see you to morrow? said she unto him: No, Madam, replied he. And why will you deprive me of that honor? replied she. Because I am resolved to obey you; answered he, and went out, not daring to look at her. Cleonice calling to memory all that she had said unto him that day, could not remember she had enjoyed any thing upon him to be done to morrow; and therefore she thought his memory had deceived him, but did not at all respect the truth.

Page 315 The day following, she asked me whether I saw Ligdamis? and also asked several others; who all answered, No; and indeed he never came out of his own Chamber, but waited with as much fear and as impatience, till Cleonice expressed some signs she understood him. He told me since, that never man suffered more melancholly misery then he did upon that occasion; for, said he, she understands me not, and I deprive my self of the happiness of seeing her to no purpose; and if she do understand me, perhaps it is with anger in her heart: I shall my self destroy that esteem which she has of me, and perhaps she will not do me so much favour. as to shew her indignation unto me, but let me alone in my lamentable exile: but Cleonice did not at all suspect his Passion. The first day was thus spent, the second astonished her a little more, and the third day I coming unto her: What have you done with Ligdamis? said she to me; and what's become of him, that neither we nor any else can see him? I should have said he had been sick, said I unto her, if I had not met with his sister in the Temple, who told me he was not sick, but very melancholly. I cannot imagine the cause of it, replied Cleonice, but must stay till he be in the humour to come and tell me. The next day being a day consecrated unto Diana, Cleonice and I went unto the Temple, and as we came in, I saw Ligdamis; and shewed him unto Cleonice; yet he no sooner saw us look upon him, but after he had bowed unto us, he went out of the Temple, which did exceedingly surprise us; for his custom was, when he met with Cleonice, to regulate his devotion according to hers, and wait upon her out. The next day following, we did accidentally meet with him, but since Artelinda and three or four more were in the company, Cleonice could hardly speak unto him, yet as he passed on her side, she leaned towards him; and most obligingly said, I pray Ligdamis, tell me what you are doing? I am obeying you Madam (replied he in a low voyce, and blush'd) and without any longer stay, he went away: and left Cleonice so astonished, that she knew not what to think: As soon as she was returned home, she resolved to clear her doubts; and writ unto Ligdamis in these terms:

CLEONICE unto LIGDAMIS.

Since I cannot remember I ever desired any thing of you, which might deprive me of the happiness in seeing you, do me the favour to write your minde; to the end I may chide my self, and my bad memory, and that I may know your willingness to obey me, CLEONICE.

After she had writ this Letter, she sent it unto Ligdamis, by a Page which she loved very well, who did deliver it the very same hour: You may imagine how Ligdamis was perplexed; he began twenty times to answer this Letter, and as many times blotted out what he had writ: Sometimes he thought he said too much, and presently after he thought it too little. But in conclusion, there being a necessity of writing something, he returned this answer, if my memory fail me not.

LIGDAMIS unto CLEONICE.

I Would it were the will of the Gods, Madam, that my putting you in memory of that Com|mand which you imposed upon me, to see you no more, could make me hope my obedience would procure a pardon of that Crime which did precede it: I have not so much confident boldness as to tell you what it is, unless your goodness will permit, or rather appoint me LIGDAMIS.

After he had writ this Letter, and read it over and over, he gave it unto the Page which brought the other, commanding him to deliver it with his own hands unto his Mistress, and let none see it but she. As chance was, I came unto Cleonice, presently after she had sent unto Ligdamis, and was with her when she received his answer: As soon as the Page appeared, she went towards him to take that Letter which he writ; and turning towards me, We shall see whether I have lost my memory, said she; or whether I ever Page 316 commanded Ligdamis not to see me, and have forgotten it. After this, she began to read the Letter aloud: but I saw her blush at reading of the two first lines; her voice chang'd; and she read the last so indistinctly, that I understood her not: Then I took the Letter and read it. Is your curiosity satisfied? (said I, after I had read it.) Not at all, replied she, for I do not well understand whether Ligdamis jeers, or whether he hath lost his wits or reason; nor do I yet understand whether that command which he says I imposed upon him, be grounded upon that question which he asked me the other day in your presence, which was, What he should do in case he fell in love with me? I perceive indeed, he would make me believe he is so. You must needs confess, said I unto her, that this declaration of his love is the most respective that possibly can be, and also the most private. Heavens preserve me from thinking that Ligdamis is in love with me! said she: No, no, Ismenea, I do not at all believe it, and I do repent of that suspicion which I had of him: Certainly he is in an humour to make himself some sport, and would be revenged of me for the perplexity I put him into by accusing him of being in love with Artelinda. However, said I unto her, it must needs be acknowledged, that if he be in love, he could not carry it with more respect or with more gallantry. If he were in love, replied she, doubtless he could not carry it so: for Lovers lose their Reason, as soon as they begin to enter into that predicament. Yet I have heard say, replied I, that there are some men which Love makes more witty. I do think indeed, said she, that perhaps it may infuse some wit into those who had none before; but I believe on the other side, it takes away the wits of them that had any: And therefore I am confirmed in my opinion, that Ligdamis makes himself merry by this design; it not being imaginable he should preserve his Judgment, and be in Love. Yet for all that, said I unto her, he has found out an invention to make you read the declaration of his love without any anger. I do confess it, said she, but it is because I do not think as he desires I should: I am so afraid (said she and laughed) he should imagine I take this seriously, and that I should give him a subject of laughing at me all his life-long, that I will send for him hither immediately, that I may let him see by my entertainment of him, that I am not easily deceived. But (said I unto her) say you should be deceived, what would you say then? I would say (replied she) that I am the unhappiest woman upon earth: But why do I say so? Tell me, Ismenea, have I not the very same eyes I had when Ligdamis was only my friend? Am I more charming then I was? have I any more wit? What's the matter that makes me more terrible to him then before? No, no; the mind of Ligdamis is still the same, and so free, that I see he hath invented a more witty declaration of his love, then all the Lovers of Artelinda ever could.

But how came it to pass, said I unto her, that you blushed so at the reading of his Letter; and that your voice was so feeble and weak, that I had much ado to understand you? The reason was, replied she, because all that smells of Gallantry and Courtship doth affright me at the first; but presently after I recollected my self. However you make me lose time, which is so precious to me: for methinks I see Ligdamis delighting himself with his own imaginations that he has made me angry. Then without more ado she called one of her women, whom she commanded to bring the Page unto her who carried her Letter to Ligdamis: when he was come, she commanded him to go again unto him from her, and to tell him she desired he would immediately come unto her: If by chance he ask who is with me, (said she) tell him Ismenea; and if he enquire whether I be merry or melancholy, tell him the truth, that I am now sad. Cleonice gave him these instructions, because she knew Ligdamis was wont to ask this Page a hundred such questions; and her reason why she bad him say so was, because she would not have Ligdamis think she received his Letter (as he did write it) seriously: so afraid was she, that Ligdamis should believe one minute that she thought him to be in love with her. The Page being gone to Ligdamis, he no sooner saw him, but he thought he brought the sentence of his death, signed with the hand of Cleonice: And he was preparing himself to read it with a sad heart, when the Page came near him with a pleasant air, and presented a very civil Complement from Cleonice, telling him she desired he would come unto her. Ligdamis amazed at this, asked the Page whether she had read his Letter? and he answered, that he believed she had more then once, for (said he) she had leisure enough since there was none with her but Ismenea. Afterwards Ligdamis, seeming to enquire of his Mistress's health, asked him whether she was pleasant or melancholy? And the Page answering according to his instructions, Ligdamis was so surprised, that he knew not what Page 317 to think: He told the Page, he would wait upon her presently; but he was not so quick as his word, for it was above an hour that he was descanting upon the message which he had received, and another hour upon the pleasantness of Cleonice, before he could get out of his chamber. What should I think of this? said he: does Cleonice understand me, or does she not? is it possible that Love in wounding my heart, has troubled hers? or does she not understand my meaning? Certainly Cleonice has wit enough, and therefore must needs know my desires; and certainly also she knows them without choller, since she sends for me. Go then I will, and go in hopes; yet I believe I have more reason to go in fear, for how can it be imagined that strong aversion she had to Love should so suddenly alter? yet on the other side, since I am changed, why may not she also as well as I? The same reason is equal unto us both: and since the beauty, wit, and merit of Cleonice hath changed my resolution, why may it not as well change her tenderness of friendship into a passionate affection? Moreover, since Love is a grand cause of Love, why may not mine move hers? for certainly I love her above all expressions. Hope then, hope Ligdamis! Go and receive a sentence of favour from her, who is only able to grant it.

After this, Ligdamis went unto Cleonice; who no sooner saw him, but she broke out into an extreme laughter, purposely to let him see he had not deceived her, and that his projects did not hit. But, Madam, Cleonice's joy did not infect Ligdamis: for on the contrary, seeing by her joyful air and pleasant looks, that she understood not what he intended and desired, he was so serious and extremely troubled, as never man was more: Yet notwithstanding Cleonice prosecuted her intended design, to let him see he had not deceived her. But as Ligdamis was ready to answer, and I to take Cleonice's part, I was sent for home upon a business of great consequence, so that I left them both together, and left them both extremely non-plust. Yet did I afterwards know all the passages, for they both of them severally related them unto me that same night. I was no sooner gone, but Cleonice continuing her jeers, Very well, Ligdamis! said she unto him; are you not ashamed of your trim declaration of Love, which you invented to make yourself sport withal? Truly, I take it very ill, you should ever think I could believe it serious: but I believe you have some curious disposition to anger me. Yet, Ligdamis, I am a little more subtle then you are, since I know very well it is only a piece of your Rallery. I wish unto the Gods, Madam, said he unto her, that what you say were true. Seriously, Ligdamis, I cannot endure to hear you speak thus. Seriously, Madam, said he unto her, I can speak no otherwise, unless I should lie. Cleonice then looking upon Ligdamis, and seeing such a real trouble in his face as perswaded her he was in earnest, was so amazed and incensed, that she stood a while and could not speak: so that Ligdamis began the discourse. Madam, said he unto her, I beseech you do not condemn before you understand me. You know very well, said she unto him, that this is not according to our Conditions, and that I ought not to hearken to any thing which you shall say, since you have rendered yourself unworthy of my friendship by your poor imbecility: which though I will not yet accuse you of, however since I think you have lost your reason by some other accident, go, Ligdamis, and stay at home until you recover it, and see me no more till then. In the name of our friendship, Madam, said he unto her, do not thus cruelly banish me. That conjuration, replied Cleonice, had power to obtain any thing of me as long as our friendship lasted; but since it is at an end, I must deny you all things. I do protest unto you, Madam, said he unto her, that I have not one thought in my heart which can offend you; and if there be any alteration in my soul, it is disadvantageous only unto my self: I must needs confess I am more quiet and troubled then I was, I do acknowledge it; but as in relation unto you Madam, the only difference is, that I respect you much more then I did before: I fear you more, and love you with a greater zeal, this is all: indeed, divine Cleonice, all the alteration is, I loved you then, and I adore you now.

Whilst Ligdamis was thus expressing himself, Cleonice looked upon him with coldness able to drive a man into absolute despair: And upon a sudden she beginning to speak, Fie, fie, Ligdamis! said she unto him, give over, and do not add crime to crime; content yourself with my friendship, and do not force me to hate you. Would it be just, Madam, said he unto her, to hate me for loving you too much? Moreover, do you not consider that I did never resist you, but always most punctually obey you? I have striven with my passion as much as I was able, and afterwards found I could not overcome it: I endeavoured to hide it; then seeing I was not able to do that neither, I would have banished my self. Why did you not seek a handsome pretence for it then, said she unto him, and Page 318 never acquaint me with your follies? Why, Madam, said he unto her, would you wish me to lose my Reason and my Liberty both? To drown my soul in an ocean of turbulent thoughts, altered all my inclinations, quitted the quiet of all my life; and would you, I say, have been ignorant of the cause of all these miseries, and denied me so much consolation as to let you know how willing I was to obey you? Obey me then, said she unto him, in never seeing you again. Ligdamis would have said something to her, but she would by no means hear him; and seeing he had no will to go out of her chamber, she went out the first, and constrained him to go out also.

I leave you to imagine Madam, how great his sorrow was; and truly hers was no less, though it was indifferent thoughts; for Ligdamis was grieved, because he feared his perseverance would never alter the heart of Cleonice; and she was sad to break off friendship with Ligdamis, and deprive her self of his society who was so dear unto her. She not being able then to contain her sorrows in her own soul, she sent for me, and I went unto her the same night, as soon as I came to her; My dear Ismenea (said she unto me) am I not very unfortunate? and must it not needs be confessed, that I have reason to be sorry you ever made me acquainted with Ligdamis? Why, said I unto her, did you quarrel when I left you together? Yes, answered Cleonice; and so much, that you can never agree us again. Then she told me the whole passage, but with such disturbed thoughts, that it was easie to see, she was extremely perplexed: for I clearly saw she had a most high esteem of the friendship of Ligdamis; and I perceived also, that she resolved never to see him again. Methinks (said I unto her, when I heard her say so) that you are a little too hastily in your courses; do you not consider, that if you break off so abruptly with him, all the world will be inquisitive of the cause? And do not you your self consider (said she to me) if I do not break off with Ligdamis, he may well imagine his pretended Passion does not displease me? This last inconveniency, said I unto her, has not so many dangerous consequences as the other. Truly, said she, I think them much more dangerous.

Indeed, Madam, I could not with any arguments alter him, but left her in a peremptory resolution never to see Ligdamis again. As I returned to my chamber, there I found this unfortunate Lover waiting for me, who came to ask my advice and assistance: I told him ingeniously that Cleonice was much incensed against him, but would not tell him all I thought, because I would not too much deject him. But Ligdamis, said I unto him, do you intend to be still in love with Cleonice yet? With whom else, replied he, sharply, do you think I can love any but her, who is the most accomplished of her sex? knowing her humour, as I do, replied I, and as you do also, methinks you should never think more of her. Ha Ismenea, said he unto me, I am grown very knowing in love of late, and you remain ignorant: within this few days, doubtless I should have said the same; but now I know by experience, that love is infinitely more strong then all reasons, and nothing can overcome it: Therefore since it is not a voluntary business, or a taken up humour, it is great injustice to condemn those that are captivated by it. You your self then, replied I, and laughed, have been often very unjust. I do confess it, replied he, and am severely punished for it: However, it is but equity to pity at the least all unfortunate Lovers, who can hope for no other consolation: And this Ismenea is all the favour that I ask of Cleonice: She has heretofore done me the honor to say, that if ever I fell in love, provided it was not with her self, she would take it well if I discovered it unto her; she told me that she would assist me with her counsel, and do her best to cure that disease which so tormented me: I beseech you obtain only this favour from her goodness, that she would be pleased to make no exceptions; but that I once more tell her into what a condition she has brought my soul, as if it were not her self with whom I am in love; and I do most faithfully promise her, to follow her advice whatever it be, and to try all remedies which she shall prescribe in order to my cure: If I were in love with any other, she were not so much obliged to help me. Negotiate therefore for me, dear Ismenea, and persuade this most admirable Lady to be the Confidant of that Passion which she herself has caused.

I should never end, Madam, if I should relate all that Ligdamis said unto me; for I think Love did never inspire any man with more delicate and pure raptures than it did him: He moved me infinitely to pity him; insomuch as I promised to use my best endeavours that Cleonice should not hate him. I found it a knotty piece of difficulty to obtain of her that he might see her; for she was many days together peremptorily resolved never to see him again; but maugre all her choller, I perceived she could not forget Page 319 the friendship which was between Ligdamis and herself; and therefore I thought it expedient to press her no further than unto terms of Friendship, to see how her soul would relish that only. In the interim, Ligdamis looked at no body, and feigning himself to be sick for a pretence of his not going out, he lived the most miserable life upon earth; for when he remembered how happy once he was, when he was only the friend of Cleonice, and considered how unfortunate he was now, only because he loved her, he thought himself a most despicable man. Four or five days passed on in this manner, during all which time, I saw Cleonice was very melancholly, and I did not so much as name Ligdamis unto her. Sometimes I saw by her eyes, she expected I should talk of him, and sometimes again I saw she did not desire it; yet I kept constant unto my resolution, and spoke not one syllable of him. Divers in my presence asked her, whether she knew the cause of Ligdamis his retirement: Artelinda, she asked her the same question, Phocylides he another, and every one, even so much as Hermodorus, endeavoured to know of her, how it came to pass he did not visit her. Some said he was sick, others said he was grieved, all concluded he would dye presently, if the malady of his body or minde did not diminish.

After all the company was gone who had spoken to her concerning Ligdamis, she turned towards me: The destiny of Ligdamis, said she, is very strange; for all that love him not do speak unto me of him, and you who do love him, saies not a word. It is true, said I unto her; but the reason is, because I love you more than I do him, and my fears to anger you imposes silence. I give you thanks for that thought of me, replied she, but I should have thought my self very much obliged to you, if you had infused any reason into the soul of Ligdamis, whom I esteem so much, as I wish I could see him reasonable again. It is you, Madam, said I unto her, that must work that miracle: and then I acquainted her how Ligdamis did most humbly supplicate, that she would be pleased to be unto him as she had promised to be, if he had been in love with another. At the first, she rejected his desire, and would by no means hearken unto it; but afterwards, after a long resistance, thinking that perhaps she might dissuade him by reason from being in love with her, she promised to see him once again, and to advice with him upon some course to cure him of his disease.

As soon as I was parted from Cleonice, I sent for Ligdamis, who received this news with incredible joy: But, said I unto him, all this is not to advice you to be still in love with her. It is no matter, said he unto me, I care not upon what conditions it be, so I may but see her; the very sight of her will be an unexpressable comfort unto me: And indeed he staid not long for that comfort, for the next morning Stenobea went abroad to make many visits, leaving Cleonice behinde her, and I advertised Ligdamis of it; yet I could not possibly be at this meeting, but he gave me an account of it the next day.

As soon as he came to her, she looked upon him with such an austere aspect, as was enough to quash all hopes in a Lovers heart: Ligdamis, said she unto him, do not think to draw any matter of advantage unto your self out of this my indulgence towards you, nor flatter your self so much as to think I am not so much incensed against you as I seem to be. I resolved of this present course, because I thought our past friendship obliged me to use all my endeavours for your cure; and to try once more, whether I could infuse any reason into your soul. Which way soever I have the honour of seeing you Madam, answered he, I am infinitely obliged unto you, and more obliged, then for all the favour you conferred upon me, during the time of our Friendship; since really I never wished for this honor with so much ardency and zeal, as since I have been deprived of your sight. Yet I am the very same I was, replied Cleonice coldly. It is true, Madam, replied he, but so am not I the same I was. I am very sorrow for it, replied she, and I would do any thing to reduce you unto that pleasing and faithful Friendship which was once in you, that you were such a solid Friend, I say, as could clearly see things as really they are; and whose Conversation and Friendship, was the very delight of my life: but alas, Ligdamis, you are not now such a one as I speak of: Yet why are you not? why will you force me to hate you? or at the least to see you no more. Madam, said he, I am far from being so unreasonable: and if I durst I would tell you, that I limit all my desires only unto the seeing of you, and to the being your friend. Did you pretend only unto these two things; replied she, you never would have changed thoughts, for there could not be a more tender Friendship then there was betwixt you and me, nor could you see me often then you did. It is true, Madam, said he to her, but that affection which you Page 320 had to me, and those frequent visits which I made, wanted something which indeed I cannot express, which yet is absolutely necessary to satisfy an amorous man. Fie, fie, Ligdamis, said she, did I ever think to hear such a terrible word from your mouth? You, I say, who has made me a hundred pleasing Satyres against ridiculous Love; who has described it as the most dangerous Passion; who has told me it never laid hold on any but fools and idle people; who has promised me a thousand times, it should never captivate you; who has related unto me a thousand sad consequences it has caused, and ten times as many extravagances; who has told me, that it makes all those who are possessed with it to lose their reason, to forget vertue, and at the least makes them all miserable. You added unto all this, that this dangerous Passion makes the most faithful Friends become Impostors and Cheats; that a Lover ought always to be looked upon as one that is not fit to answer for himself, and as one that is ready to commit all sins for the advancement of his foolish love. After all this, Ligdamis, would you have me look upon you as a man in love; and as one who according to your own maxims ought to scorn and hate? Speak, Ligdamis, speak, I conjure you; but speak though, as I would have you. What would you have me say, Madam? replied he. I would have you say, replied she, and assure me that you will be always my Friend, and that you will never be a Lover. Indeed I cannot, Madam, answered he: for though I should force my tongue to tell a lye, yet my eyes would contradict my words, and my face would discover the secrets of my heart. Fie Ligdamis, said she, are you resolved to lose my friendship? Why Madam, answered he, I could easier consent to love you less, then to say it.

But Ligdamis, said she unto him, you do not answer unto what I say: I pray tell me whether all you have spoken against Love, be out of your memory? No, replied he, but it is out of my heart, since certainly I see things after another manner then I did before. For my part, said she, I know not why you should. Yes Madam, replied he, I do not see you as I did when I was only your friend: I find you a hundred times more fair then I did; methinks you have incomparably a finer spirit then you had before; you are infinitely more charming; your humours are more agreeable and pleasing unto me; the least of your words now, has more eloquence then your finest rhetoric had before; your very look makes my heart to beat; and you seem to be so infinitely above what you were before in every thing, that I am ashamed I should not discover those admirable perfections in you untill I was in love: Yes, Madam, the fire does not only warm, but enlighten me, and lets me see a hundred things which I could not see before. And can you see, said she unto him, that Love is not the same you said it was before? I do most plainly see it, replied he, and in such a most evident manner, that I wonder how I could possibly reason so against it. I do confess, Madam, there is a terrestrial, gross, and brutal kind of Passion that usurps the name of Love, yet is not, which merits the aversion of all reasonable people: Also I do confess there is a kind of universal Gallantry, unworthy of a lofty soul: But a constant and pure Love, such a Love as my soul is sensible of, is the most glorious and commendable thing in the world. It is by this Passion that souls are elevated above themselves, and prompted unto all heroic actions. Be pleased, Madam, to command me any thing that is full of the greatest difficulties, and the most dangerous to be executed, and I shall immediately attempt it. If you had imposed any thing of this nature upon that Ligdamis who was only your friend, perhaps he would have considered the greatness of the danger, and the difficulty of his obedience, and in all likelihood would not undertake it: but this Ligdamis who loves you now, will never deliberate a minute upon any of your Commands, but is ready with his obedience at a minutes warning.

Then I command you not to love me as you do, replied she, if it be so that your obedience has no limits. Impossibilities, Madam, replied he, are ever to be excepted; and therefore in this I cannot obey you, because it is not in my power to love more or less then I do. Then I must never see you again, replied she, unless you will endeavour to find out ways of curing your folly. Though my disease is such, replied he, that I had rather die then wish the cure; yet I will ask you, Madam, what you conceive most proper and expedient for it? I would have you think upon all you have formerly said unto me against it, replied she. I remember them very well, replied he; but I find them so unjust and remediless, that they will not do it. Consult then with your own Reason, replied she, and I am confident it will change your opinion. Alas Madam, replied he, my Reason is so troubled, and so far from affording me any counsel, that it absolutely submits unto my Page 321 Passion. Then see me no more, said she, and try whether absence will help you. Since these five or six dayes in which I have not seen you, replied he, my love is increased much more. Consider then, replied she, that if you love me, I shall hate you; and by not loving me, you will still have my esteem and friendship. Oh Madam, cry'd he, how most unjust is this, to love me if I do not love you, and to hate me if I do! Whatever it be, Ligdamis, replied she, since my thoughts are not changed as yours are, but still look upon Love with the same eyes I did before, and find you so unreasonable that I cannot endure you, I must tell you what I conceive: Your face is changed, and your actions also: I find a continual restlessness in your eyes; you speak more hastily then you did before; all you say is unjust; you are silent when you should speak, and answer always impertinently, and indeed do every thing without reason: For you thought yourself happy heretofore in my conversation, my esteem, my friendship, and my confidence; I do yet offer the same unto you and you are not contented. For my part, Ligdamis, you may say or think what you please; but I never found Love so fantastical in any as in you. The reason is, replied he, because the Passion was never so violent in any as in me: but alas, Madam, I must needs think my self most unhappy, that my love is unknown to you. Deceive not yourself, replied she; For the more disorder I see in your soul, the less disposition I shall have to love you. That must needs be impossible, Madam, replied he: for as the fire burns those that touch it, and the sun enlightens those that see it, so a pure and constant Passion must needs move the heart of her one loves.

You hope then that I shall love you! (replied Cleonice with such a coldness as made Ligdamis almost despair) I do wish it, Madam, at the least, replied he, but I dare not say <◇> hope it. 'Tis very well, said she; indeed you could not do me a more manifest injury, then persuade me to love you, and to do that which I have so often condemned in others. Can you imagine, Ligdamis, that I should laugh at all those follies in you, which we both together have condemned in others? Do you think I can take any pleasure to see you miserable for the love of me? to hear you sigh, and make all the crabbed faces which Love uses to force them unto that are subject unto it? Fie, fie, Ligdamis! I cannot endure it: And though I cannot regulate your affection, yet let me limit your hopes; for assure yourself, that a hundred years languishment, sighs, tears, raptures, expressions, and services shall never obtain any thing from me. Though, Madam, replied he, you cannot be sensible, yet I beseech you be not unjust; but consider that it is yourself who is the cause of my misery, and therefore you are obliged to have some compassion upon me. Then be only unto me, said she unto him, as I am unto Ismenea, my Confidant in point of friendship: Love me as you were wont to do, and let me love you only as I do, and be not so unjust as to make me absolutely miserable without a cause.

I know very well, Madam, said he, that by our Conditions you are not to be a friend to one that is in Love: but those that make laws, can alter them. I do remember that you said one day, the reason why you would never have a Lover for your friend, was, because you once had a friend who fell in love, and was weary of you, and made but short visits; that he talked unto you of nothing but the Party whom he loved; and that you durst not trust him with any secret, because he was sure to reveal it unto his Mistress. But, Madam, you need not fear any of these inconveniences in me: For first, Madam, I do protest I have no joy but in your company; my visits shall last longer then ever; and if you please, I will never speak unto any but yourself. Moreover, Madam, you need not fear my revealing of secrets unto her I most adore, since if I do reveal them, it is only to yourself who trusted me with them; therefore why will you deny me the honour and happiness of seeing you? And give me leave to love you, I beseech you: perhaps your insensibility will cure me sooner then that absence which you condemn me unto: for, Madam, when I am from you, I shall still imagine that if I were with you, I should move your heart; so that hoping still to see you again, I shall hope also to be loved, and by consequence to be continually in love: but if you permit me to continue with you, perhaps your cruelty and inhumanity will destroy my hopes, and afterwards my love. This Remedy, replied Cleonice, is as odd and fantastical as your Passion. It is the onely one, replied he, which in reason you can appoint me. Yet let us try absence, said she, for I think less danger to be in it. I remember, Madam, replied he, I have heard you say that the malady which torments me was contagious: but I remember also that Ismonea answered you, that it could never infect you: And certainly, Madam, it cannot, for as long as I have been with you, I could never perceive you the least moved by it: Heavens Page 322 preserve me from such a misfortune! replied she: However, Ligdamis, since I perceive it a thing impossible at present to bring your soul unto Reason, all I can do for you is, to assure you that I am extremely sorry for the loss of your friendship; that you shall ever find it ready for you, as soon as you are out of Love; and in order to that I enjoin you to travel, and see whether that be more prevalent than my reasons.

If there were any crime in my Passion, answered Ligdamis, or if my pretensions were unjust, then I could not blame you for banishing me; but alas, I ask no more but that you would suffer me to love you: What harm does that which is in my heart do you? has it put you unto any trouble this last month I have been with you? No, replied Cleonice, nothing troubled me, but that I did not know the meaning of your soul. You see then, replied he, that you have no solid foundation for what you say; and that my Passion is not troublesome to you in it self, but only by such imaginations as you apprehend of it: For truly, Madam, the Passion which did not trouble you a month since, was the very same it is now at this time: I profess that I am much more sensible of your miseries than I was, and if it were possible, I am more secret and faithful then ever. Though all this were true, replied Cleonice, yet I have one exception against you, which you cannot answer; which is, that since your heart is capable of this Passion, you may love another as well as me; and if you should, in what a case were my confidence and trust. When I was in love with none, Madam, said he, you had more cause to fear this inconveniency then now, for then it had not been impossible but I might have loved another, and not you: But now I do love you, it is absolutely impossible I should ever love any other; for out of all doubt, you are both my first and my last love: One may perhaps, forsake a mean beauty, and fall upon another of more accomplished parts: but to forsake the fairest and most absolute perfection upon earth for another, was never heard of since Love had dominion in the hearts of men. For my part, said Cleonice, I am so affrighted to hear you talk thus, that I hardly know what I should answer, unless that it is my best course to trust none, but mistrust my own Reason: Therefore Ligdamis, I must needs deny your request, and entreat you to see me no more, at least of a long time. Would you have me dye then? replied he. No, said she, but I would have you become wise. Then I conjure you Madam, said he, by that Friendship which you have promised, that I may have eight days allowed to see you I grant it, said she, though you do not deserve the favour: yet it shall be with this condition, that you speak not a word to me of your pretended love.

Ligdamis then was as thankful unto Cleonice for it, as if she had granted him her heart; and at his parting from her, he came to me with so much joy in his countenance, that I knew very well his heart was really in love: He requested me to mediate for him, in such obliging language as indeed he perswaded me to do him that office: yet I assure you, it was no easie task, for I found Cleonice in such a melancholly mood, and so much perplexed, that she would not hearken unto any but extremely against her will: The Friendship of Ligdamis was none of the least causes of her grief, and her aversion to love, was a great addition to her torment. However, Ligdamis did see her during the eight days she had granted him: but maugre all his violent restraints, he could not hold from uttering some symptoms of his Passion, either by his looks or sighs, or his studies, or else by some words which stole from him unawares. Moreover, as Cleonice was disposed to interpret all his actions that way, so she avoided the encounter of his eyes as much as she could: She bush'd as soon as she saw him come near her; She took all care not to sit next him; she did not address any speech unto him, and kept such a strange distance, that I wondered to see such an alteration between them. When I asked Cleonice why she would not behave herself as if she were ignorant of his Passion. She answered me, that she could not for her life do it, and that he must needs be gone from her: For (said she un)to me the last day of his allowance) if he continue his love still, and do not go away, I shall hate him extremely. But suppose he do obey you, and go away, said I unto her, and that absence cannot cure him, what would you have him do then? do you think it just he should be eternally banished from his Country, only because he loves you too well? Were he a man you did not esteem, or that he did not deserve it, or that you had an aversion to his person, what could you do more? I should then do much less, said she unto me. I cannot understand your reason for that, replied I, yet I must needs believe you, because I see you let Hermodorus live quietly at Ephesus, though he has loved you long. Hermodorus, replied she, is not a man whom I would honor so much, as to Page 323 command him any thing. This honour which you do Ligdamis, replied I, may well be called injustice Yet it is a favour, replied she, since I do all I can to preserve his Friendship.

As she was saying this, Ligdamis came in, with an intention to get his term prolonged. I no sooner saw him, but taking the word from Cleonice, Come Ligdamis, said I unto him, come and hear the favourable cause of your banishment. Must I then be banish'd? replied he. Yes answered Cleonice, if I have any power with you. You have it Madam, most absolutely, answered he and sighed; but it is the office of those that have the most sovereign power, not to do all they can, but all they ought to do. And I ought to do all I can, replied she, to infuse reason into your soul, to the end I may keep you my friend. Then you do not hate me, Madam? said Ligdamis. I do acknowledge it, said she, but I shall most infallibly hate you, if you do not obey me: When you have made trial of absence, which I have heard is the only remedy against love; and that I see you use your best endeavours to become wise, then perhaps I shall be so favourable as not to deny you my friendship, but permit you to keep that Passion in your soul, which you cannot exclude. I protest, Cleonice (said I unto her and laughed) this is an admirable good one, to make that which you endure, because you cannot help it, to pass for a great favour, and to oblige men unto impossibilities. Though I see you would perswade me I am to blame, replied she, yet I do not repent it; for if it be impossible for Ligdamis to leave loving me, then let him give me some testimony of his Love: Therefore I conjure you, said she unto him, to make trial of two remedies: The one is absence, the other is ambition: You know Cleander loves you dearly, go then into the Court for six months, and endeavour to drive out one Passion, with another: but I beseech you do not resist me any longer, unless you will have me hate you. I know very well, Madam, replied he, that though I do obey you, yet all will do no good, since wheresoever I am, I am most certain you will be there present in my mind, and I am absolutely incapable of any other ambition but of being in your favour. After this, Cleonice began to speak so earnestly unto Ligdamis, that I knew she would be obeyed; so that I advised him to be contented: For said I unto him, if absence do cure you, then you have good cause to think your self happy: if it do not, yet you give Cleonice the greatest testimony of your obedience and love that possibly can be. However, Madam, said he unto her, I beseech you promise me, if I punctually obey you, that you will never any more command me to pull that Passion out of my heart, which doubtless will ever be there as long as I live. I promise you I will not, said she unto him: But because this is not enough to keep a languishing exiled Lover alive, replied he; therefore Madam, I beg this favour of your goodness, that in case I do not dye of sorrow, but live to return unto you, then that you would be pleased to be the Confident of my passion; no Ligdamis, said she unto him, I do not promise you that: but I assure you, that I will not hate you, if you obey me. In conclusion, Madam, not to trouble you with any impertinent relations, Ligdamis obeyed her. It was easie to finde a handsome pretence for his voyage, since it was wondered why he went no offer to Sardis. I did my endeavours that he might take his leave before he went, but it could not possible be obtained. I saw that the cause of this denial was advantageous for Ligdamis: for she had not refused that favour, but only because she knew it was impossible for her to bid him adieu, without expressing too many visible signs of Friendship to him.

He departed then with intentions to go unto Sardis, but in the way thither, he heard how Cressus had imprisoned Cleander; so that resolving not to go thither, by reason of this accident which put all Lydia into an universal astonishment, he went unto the Government of his Father, there to spend the time of his exile, and in solitude to lament the misfortunes of Cleander and his own, and almost as much Cleanders as his own; since after so many victories, and so many good services done unto all Lydia, he was a Prisoner without a crime.

This news being reported at Ephesus, every one was extream sad; for indeed it was one of the greatest misfortunes that could come to the whole Kingdom: but besides the publique interest, which grieved Cleonice as it did the rest, the particular relations of Ligdamis was a great addition unto her sorrows. She went to visit the sister of Ligdamis upon this occasion: but she would not write unto him, though I used all my arguments to perswade her; as for him, he writ often unto me unknown to Cleonice; for I had forget to tell you how this cruel Lady made him promise her to send her no letters. Page 324 and that if he did write unto me, I should conceal them from her: so that I durst not acquaint her how absence had wrought no effects upon the cure of Ligdamis. In the mean time, Cleonice was exceedingly sad and solitary, so that Artelinda and Phocylides left off their visits. Stenobea, after a hundred chidings that she was not jocund enough, was forced to let her alone in quiet: so that Cleonice keeping her chamber very much, I was very often alone with her. At the first, when I began to speak of Ligdamis, she would be angry; yet by degrees she did not only suffer me to talk of him, but also would herself begin the first. One day then when we were alone, after discourse of several other things, I am certain, said she, in what place soever Ligdamis is, he can find none unto whom he can speak concerning me, and therefore I hope he will quickly forget his folly. But said I unto her, and looked earnestly upon her, is it possible you should wish as you say, that Ligdamis should be indifferent towards you? Not as I say! answered she. What do you say? (replied I half angry.) I say (answered she) I wish that Ligdamis should not love me; as for his friendship, I should be ever glad of it, I do confess. But how do you think that is possible? said I unto her: Do you not consider, that if absence do cure a violent passion, it must be by forgetting you, and unaccustoming himself from seeing you? Moreover you do not consider, that he is now no friend unto you; that affection has changed its nature; and in all reason, if the remedy which you have imposed upon him do work that effect which you expect, he will neither be your Lover nor your Friend.

Ismeneas, said she unto her, You are a most cruel woman to examine me so strictly upon a thing which does not please me: however, why is it not possible that the friendship of Ligdamis which became Love, should return to friendship again? I know not well the reason, said I unto her, but I am sure the example of it is very rare. I should be very sorry, replied she, to lose Ligdamis altogether. Yet you expose yourself unto it, said I to her. But since I saw her in a less severe humour, I pray Cleonice, said I, whether had you rather that Ligdamis should be absolutely cured of his passion, and be altogether indifferent towards you; or that he should be in love with another? Since I was ever a friend unto Ligdamis (said she unto me and blusht) I cannot desire he should be cured of one disease, by falling into another; and I had rather lose his affection and love none, then to see him over-loaded with fetters. But, said I, suppose there were an absolute necessity that he must either love you or another, which would you chuse? I long since told you what I thought upon that, replied she. It is true, said I unto her, but I ask you what you think now? I will not take so much pains, said she, as to think upon it: yet if ever Ligdamis do cure himself of his follies, I shall take a great delight in letting him see the little solidity there is in the hearts of those that are in love; for I protest, Ismeneas, I do think upon Ligdamis as much as if he were here at Ephesus. Why then would you have him forget you? said I to her, and laughed: Do you well know what you would have? Think upon it, Cleonice, and think upon it seriously: it would be very fine, if Ligdamis should forget you, and you could not forget him. You speak so fondly, replied she, that I will not answer. You may do better to confess you cannot answer, replied I, unless you contradict yourself: for you no sooner wish that Ligdamis should think no more of you, but there is a secret desire in your heart which you cannot resist, that forces you to wish he should think upon you eternally.

You press me so far, said she unto me, that I have no mind to speak any more of it. You have no mind to be sincere, answered I, nor can you answer directly. I think, replied she, and smiled, you have a mind to make me lose a she-friend as well as a he, and seek to quarrel with me. I know not, answered I, and laughed, whether you will quarrel with me or no; but I am sure you either cannot, or will not answer me. Really, Ismeneas, said she unto me, I have told you all I thought; and more then that, I assure you I will answer unto any thing you will ask, and answer truly. Confess then, said I unto her, that you would not have Ligdamis forget you. I do confess it, said she and blusht. And would it not anger you, if he should love another? I do confess it also, replied she, and looked down; though it be only in relation to himself, and not out of any jealousy. Whether had you rather he should always love you, said I unto her, or that he should hate you? Ah Ismeneas! replied she, you ask me such odd questions, that I know not how to answer: Yet I think that I should be equally angry at the love and the hatred of Ligdamis. I do not think so, said I unto her: But since you will not clearly explain yourself, I will ask you no more questions; only wish in revenge, that Ligdamis may forget you, that at his return he may love another, and that you cannot forget him. You are very revengefull, Page 325 see, said she unto me: but my comfort is, that what you wish will never come to pass: for if Ligdamis do forget me, I shall forget him; so that it shall not disquiet me at all. You have imposed a command upon him, said I unto her, in which you do not desire he should obey you, since if he do, you will punish him. Cleonice after this would have told me, that she appointed him only to banish love from his heart: but I would not stay to hear her, and left her without an answer; conceiving the result of all she had said unto me was, that her friendly disposition unto Ligdamis was grown a little more tender towards him since he departed: Yet I durst not tell her that I sometimes received Letters from him. But yet one day when she and I were together, I let one of his Letters fall by chance; which she presently took up, not imagining it to be from Ligdamis: she no sooner had it in her hands, but she knew the writing; and she no sooner knew it, but she blusht extremely. I perceived her first thought was to read it; but her second consideration checkt her, and she offered it unto me without looking into it. You are not very inquisitive, I see, Madam, (said I unto her, and would not take it.) Indeed I am not, said she, especially when I am afraid to hear any thing which will not please me. If you please, you may read it, said I unto her. If I could make him such a one as would please me, said she, I wish he were here: but since all my desires cannot change him, I had rather return it unto you unseen. Then I taking it out of her hands, and desiring to anger her a little, to the end I might the better discover her real thoughts; I told her that I would read it aloud unto her, if she would not read it herself. Then, said she, I will not hear you: And after she had said so, she was silent. Then, the better to hide the disorder of her thoughts, she fell to work in a piece of Tissue of gold, which lay upon the Table. After this I rise up also, and seated my self over against her, lest she should see what was really in the Letter, which I read, and feigned these words. Solitude, Ismenea! has done that which Reason could not: for the fair Cleonice shall be no more troubled with my Love. It was not Absence only which cured my disease; I stood in need of a more powerfull remedy: And I met with a Lady less fair, I confess, but much more sensible, who makes me very well able to obey those Commands which Cleonice imposed upon me. Ha, Ismenea! (said Cleonice, in throwing her work upon the table, and desiring to read it herself) sure this is not the Letter of Ligdamis. Surely it is, said I unto her, and hid it from her, though what is in it does not please you: But pray tell me what you desire I should read. I would not have you read any thing, said she; but I would read it my self, whatsoever is in it. Seeing then the inquisitive disposition of Cleonice, after I had a while resisted her, at last I let her see it; and spoke so, as if what before I feigned to read were really in it. So that immediately opening it, she read these words.

LIGDAMIS unto ISMENEA.

IF my adored Cleonice did but know that the less I see her, the more I love her; doubtless she would recall me, though it were only to hinder the augmentation of my Passion. Therefore I beseech you (if you think it fit) let her know, that I shall be at the end of my banishment without all comparison more in love with her, then the first day I began it: The remembrance of her Beauty, her Wit, her Mind, and my desire of seeing her, is the only business of my solitude. This, Ismenea, is my life: which would be happy in the midst of my misery, if I could hope to be neither hated nor forgotten

LIGDAMIS.

Whilst Cleonice was reading, I did attentively observe her, and me thought I saw more confusion then anger in her looks. I saw also, that in reading the end of the Letter, where Ligdamis said he should be happy to be neither hated nor forgotten, she smiled a little: Afterwards returning the Letter unto me, and hardly daring to look upon me; You have taken such good order, said she to me, that this last misfortune shall not befall Ligdamis, that he needs not fear it: But cruel woman that you are (said she, and assumed a more serious countenance) what pleasure can you take in tormenting me? I Page 326 know Ligdamis is your Cosin, and therefore I had been to blame, if I had wished him not to write unto you: But why must I be the subject of his Letters and yours? For my part, said I unto her, since I did only answer Ligdamis, you must accuse him only for speaking of you. As for my particular, when he spoke to me concerning Cleonice, I did not think it civil to answer him concerning Artelinda, or any other, or to answer his Letters any otherwise then to the questions he asked me. But what will you answer him? replied she. I will answer what you please, said I unto her; for I shall not write until to morrow. Whatsoever you write (said she) unto him, do not send him word I have seen his Letter. I do not ask you what I shall not write, said I unto her, but what I shall. You may when I shall tell you, answered she; in the mean time, if you will indeed oblige me, perswade him very earnestly to stifle that passion which procures him nothing but trouble.

Thus you see, Madam, what were the thoughts of Cleonice, during the exile of Ligdamis, who returned to Ephesus as soon as the time of his banishment was expired, without asking Cleonice any leave. As soon as ever he arrived, he came to see me, to assure me he was no changling, and to take counsel what he should do. Since I knew the mind of Cleonice very well, I was of opinion that his best course was to send no Messages, before he went himself, and that he should visit Stenobea as he was used to do at the return from his travels. So that hearkning unto my advice, he went thither the same day, and I went also, having a great desire to see how this first visit passed; but as ill luck would have it, there was that day so much company with Stenobea, that he had not one minutes opportunity to speak unto Cleonice in private. Artelinda and Phocylides came also thither; and because it was a long time since they had seen Ligdamis, he was the only subject of the conversation. Some accosted him with complements of sorrow for the imprisonment of Cleander; others assured him they thought his travels long; and Artelinda, according to her humour, told him, she wondered how he could live in such a solitude as he had done, applying her self after this, to make a very pleasant Satyre of the Country; Maintaining, that to be in it eight day together, were enough to make one stupid, melancholly, and insensible for ever, and concluded, since Ligdamis had been there six moneths, though his spirit was never so great, yet he must needs be very melancholly, or for ever insensible. Whilst Artelinda was thus talking, Ligdamis was so perplexed, that he knew not what to answer; and Cleonice was so troubled, that she had little delight in that days conversation, though the next day she had more: For Ligdamis came to my house, whither she also came with intentions to desire me, that I would deliver her from this obstinate Lover, whom she had no desire to lose. When she saw him, she thought I had sent for him, though I did not; but yet, after she had chid me a little for it, she staid with me: So that we three only being alone, Ligdamis addressing himself towards her, and looking upon her in such a manner as might let her see his soul was the same: You see me here Madam, said he unto her, at the end of my banishment; but it is you only who can tell me whether I be at the end of my misery, and whether you will permit that man, who cannot be your friend, or leave off loving you, to relate the sorrows which absence hath procured him. I had rather you would tell me what courses you have taken, said she unto him, to overcome your unjust Passion. Alas, Madam, replied he, how could I ever hope to overcome it, since I was never able to master my will so far, as to fight against it? I had not banished you, replied she, but to the end you should. I know it, Madam, answered he, but as soon as ever my will went about it, my heart, my mind, my reason, and all my faculties rebelled against me, and I could not chuse but continually repent my opposing so well grounded a Passion; a Passion, I say, so noble, so pure and divine, that the most severe virtue could not condemn it: So that Madam I must love you, and love you as long as I live; and so that if my love be insufferable to you, there is no other way to free your self from it, but by commanding me to dye: If it be your pleasure, Madam, so to doom it, I am resolved upon obedience; for as soon as I see the divine Cleonice can better endure my death then my love, despair will presently do it: Speak then Madam, is it your pleasure I should live or dye? you are absolute Mistress of my Destinie, and may make me what you please. If I could, answered Cleonice, I should make you my Friend, and Ligdamis should be no longer a Lover. Yet, Madam, said he unto her, is it not possible to accustom your self to endure I should love you a little more then I did before, and to acquaint you with my sufferings. You promised as much, when I parted from you, and told me you would receive my services, as testimonies of my Page 327 friendship. I have every day for six moneths together suffered a thousand torments; and in lieu of accepting my obedience according to your promise, will you prepare new punishments for me? That would not be just (said I, and interrupted them) and if Cleonice will follow my advice, she should not be so rigorous. Why do you say so Ismenea, said she unto me: Can you be so much byassed by your affection to Lygdamis, as to counsel me unto any gallantry with him? That word, said I unto her, is a little too much; but I do confess, I know no reason why you should treat Ligdamis, as if he were not so much as your friend; for we are obliged to love our friends in miseries, as well as in happiness. I do confess, said she, that they who do not so, are only the false friends of prosperity, and deserve not that glorious title of friend. Then if Ligdamis said I unto her, hath lost his reason by any manner of misfortune, and seeks all remedies to cure himself of all his miseries and follies, but can finde none, would you not endeavour to ease him, and much pity his misfortune? Doubtlesse I should, replied she. Then why do you not? said I unto her and laughed? for do you not see that he is not master of his reason? though you do not grant him so much affection as perhaps his folly desires, yet receive his affection with some kinde of sweetnesse; for it is not the part of true Friendship, to forsake him in so great a misfortune as his is, to love one that is insensible: And for my part, if you use him so, you must give me leave to think you make no other use of your friends, but to serve your own ends, and to divert you, since you cannot endure they should trouble you once in their lives. Cleonice hearing me say so, began to smile, and Ligdamis to thank me: And he afterwards joined his most perswasive Rethorique unto mine, and we so overcame her, that after two hours converse, we obtained that Ligdamis should stay in Ephesus, and that he should see her, but still upon condition, never to speak unto her of any Love matters.

Thus then were some days spent, but since it was not possible for Ligdamis to lock up his love so close in his heart, but that it would break out in some of his actions or words, there was not a day but Cleonice and he had two or three quarrels. But Cleonice did insensibly accustom her self to answer him; and though it was always with a spirit of contradiction, yet it was a great comfort unto him to talk of that which took up his whole soul: And indeed it came to that pass at last, that Cleonice became the Confident of his Passion, and could not endure he should speak of any thing else. And though she always advised him never to hope for any thing, and often commanded him to quench his flames, yet in the end she had no desire to be obeyed: She would often be so melancholly, that every one would chide her: At the first this surprised me, because I never saw her in such an humour before; but after I had discovered the phantastical cause of her melancholly, which took her often, and left her often: and I found the fit would always take her when contrary to her intention she had spoken a little more sweetly concerning Ligdamis then she intended; and when her memorie did chide herself for being not sharp enough with him, she would be sure to be dogged all that day, both towards her self and all that came near her; and on the contrary, when she had the power to treat him ill, she appeared more pleasant, and nothing but joy could be seen in her eyes: Also, one could never see them both in a good humour at one time; for when Ligdamis was ravished with joy at some favourable word which Cleonice had spoke, then she was always melancholly; and when he was sad at any harsh passage from her, then would, she be exceedingly pleasant, so great was her care to hinder him from seeing she was not insensible: Yet it is most certain, she did not hate him; and though she would not call her affection by the name of Love, yet her change was so much, that it deserved no other name: For a hundred trivial passages, which slipt from her unawares, did sufficiently manifest as much. I remember, that whilst he passed under the notion of her friend only, she cared not in what dresse he saw her; and I have seen him in her chamber some daies, when her dresse was so careless, that any other beauty but hers would have lost its lustre; and I am confident she did never once in all her life consult with her glass how to please him: But since his return it is otherwise; for Ligdamis never could see her till she was drest: She made a shew as if her design in it, was only to wean him by degrees, from that familiarity he had with her; but the true design was, that Ligdamis might think her more fair. I humbly ask your pardon, Madam, for making such an exact relation of every trivial passage; for since you commanded it, I hope my obedience will plead for my excuse.

Be pleased to know further, that as love cannot lie long hid, so Hermodorus, Artelinda and Phocylides presently came to know that Ligdamis was in love, and in love with Page 328 Cleonice: So that the Passion of Hermodorus augmented, the Love of Phocylides revived, and the Hatred of Artelinda renewed and became more violent; for she was so vexed to see the heart of Ligdamis resist her charms, and be captivated by Cleonice's, that she uttered a hundred symptoms of envy. Moreover, as it is the custom of many Ladies that are a little too gallantly inclined, to justify themselves by accusing others, she divulged it in two or three dayes throughout the Town, that Ligdamis was in love with Cleonice; adding further, that Cleonice was not so hard-hearted as she was wont to be, saying in her raillerie, that Love had wounded two hearts with one blow. The noise of it was so great in so little time, that it did not only come presently unto my ears, but it reached Cleonice's also, who heard it with more sorrow then I can express: for I saw many signs of anger break out at her eyes; but I could not tell whether it was against Ligdamis, or against Artelinda, or against herself; and she would not explain herself, but spoke many things which much puzzled me: Yet I certainly knew that Ligdamis was upon better terms in her heart then he believed himself. For whatsoever she said against Ligdamis, or Artelinda, or herself, she never said she would quit Ligdamis: but on the contrary, whatsoever she said, she added this unto it, That if she should change her manner of living with Ligdamis, it would be an occasion to make the world believe all that Artelinda said was true: Afterwards she would say, that since this was only her own thought, she would use the matter so as none should ever think Ligdamis in love with her. But in conclusion, when she had uttered many contrarieties, and saw that all her past severity could not hinder the world from saying that Ligdamis loved her: Am I not very unhappy, said she, that after I have passed all my life in quietness and honour, I should now be exposed to the Raillerie of Artelinda?

But Madam, said I unto her, this is not so great a crime as if you had loved him; for except Artelinda, none says that you love Ligdamis. If I had lived after the manner of others, answered she, you had spoken well: But to hear such reports upon my self after I have professed such a strict severity, believe me (Ismeneia) is a most sensible grief unto me. Cleonice spoke this with so many signs of real displeasure in her face, that indeed I was sorry for her; and desiring to be a little more complacential towards her, Madam (said I) since it does so much trouble and torment you, though Ligdamis be my friend, yet I advise you to forsake him, and banish him the second time. Ah Ismeneia, said she unto me and blusht, if I could do so, I had done it ere this; but to my misfortune, Ligdamis has more of my heart than I have my self: Not that I can call my apprehensions of him Love, (said she in reprehending herself, and not desiring to tell the truth) but that my friendship to him is so tender and violent, that I cannot deprive my self of his sight and conversation. We will call this affection what you please, (said I unto her) yet since it is so, the matter is easily decided; for of two evils the lesser being to be chosen, it is better to make choice of that which will afford you some hours of consolation, than of that which will afford you none at all. But (said I) my advice is not to satisfy yourself by doing any act which is contrary to handsomness; nor do I counsel you to regulate your actions by the different opinions of all the men in a great Town: it will be sufficient if you do nothing contrary to the universal received customs of all good persons, nor any thing which may wound virtue. This done, you may rest your mind in quiet, and never let the capricious censures of others disturb the pleasure of your life. But said Cleonice unto me, I know not well whether this manner of living with Ligdamis, though it be most innocent, yet whether it be not contrary to that exact handsomness which you speak of; for the truth is, I know he is in Love, and I perceive I am so much his friend that I cannot hate him. For my part, said I unto her, it does not seem to me to be criminal; especially if it be considered that your quality and the quality of Ligdamis is equal, and by consequence you may marry; and since so, I do not see that Virtue would have any that are to marry to hate one another. All passions (said I) certainly are not crimes, though heretofore you have thought so; there are some Loves which are innocent and allowable: Therefore do not uncalm your Mind, upon every light blast of common Report.

You know, said she unto me, that the Father of Ligdamis is resolved to marry him unto none but one. It is true, replied I: but you may well conceive, that since Ligdamis would not obey him when he loved none, he will not obey him now when he is in love with you: Therefore without taking notice of any Reports, I advise you to live with Ligdamis as you was accustomed: The noise which is vogue abroad, will quickly die; Page 329 for since you know Artelinda will find so many several subjects of fresh discourse, within three dayes the Love of Ligdamis will be no more talked on. However I conjure you, said she unto me, not to tell him that I confess I cannot banish him. But said I unto her, and laughed, since the affection you bear him is only friendship, why will you hide the greatness of it? Believe me, Cleonice, it is not usual to make any secret of friendship; but on the contrary, it is so violent in some, that they cannot hide it. Well, well, Ismeneia, replied she, I understand you very well: but though what you think were true, yet must I tell you every thought of my soul? Yes, said I unto her, if you love sincerity: But since you do not, I will be so complacential as to name every thing as you please; and call that Love which Ligdamis bears you, Hatred.

After this, Madam, the mind of Cleonice was much more quiet, and Ligdamis more happy. All reports (as I said) died; for Artelinda gave so many new causes of talk concerning herself, that nothing else was spoke of; and she did not only continue the entertainment of that multitude of Servants about her, but another notable adventure fell out, which was this. As she was one morning writing several Letters unto three or four of her Lovers, unto which she gave several directions, and writing at the same time unto Cleonice to justify herself concerning what she had said against her; after she had writ all the Letters, she would write no Superscriptions upon the top; and he to whom she gave the Letters, though he was a witty Knave, and accustomed unto such offices, yet did he deceive her that day, in distributing them not according to her directions. So that one of these Lovers, whom she appointed to meet at the Temple of Diana, by one of her Letters, received another Letter which was not intended to him, and which appointed him to that same day and visit a Lady which he never saw, who was his most mortal enemy. That Letter which appointed the meeting at the Temple of Diana, was carried unto a man of quality who was a stranger, and had not been long in Ephesus: He was one, who according to the religion of his own Country, would not adore the Gods in any Temples which were built with the hands of men; so that this Letter did extremely surprise him. Artelinda had writ another unto one of her Lovers (who was to go out of town that day) that he would meet her in the way as she went to the Temple, to the end she might there bid him adieu. But in lieu of that Letter, he received another which was not intended to him, but unto another, by which she desired him to meet her at evening in the Walks by the sea-side: And that which was intended for the other, was brought unto Cleonice; and that which was intended for Cleonice, was carried unto another. So that this variety of mistakes made the best sport in the world.

When the mistaken Letter was brought unto Cleonice, we were all together; and she wondered that Artelinda, with whom she was not friends, should write to her. She opened then this Letter very hastily; but when she looked upon the Character, she presently knew it to be the same in which she used to write unto her Gallants, and not that in which she used to write unto her friends. Then Cleonice and I began to read these words, which did not at all concern her.

If you will be in the street which leads unto the Temple of Diana, about that hour I use to go thither; I shall understand from your own mouth, what thoughts you have of me, at parting; and you may understand from mine, how much your absence will trouble me.

After we had read this Letter, we knew that he who brought it was mistaken; but I advised Cleonice to say nothing unto the man, but that she would do as his Mistress desired: And indeed we did not go with less desire to be at the appointed place, then perhaps that Lover would have done for whom it was intended. Cleonice gave orders, that they should acquaint her when Artelinda went out of her house, that we might follow after her; which was easily done, because both were neighbours. Therefore we no sooner knew of her going out, but we also went out at a back-door which was neerest that street where the appointment was; knowing well we should find her on foot, because it was not the custom of Ephesus to go unto the Temple of Diana in Coach. As soon as we spied her, we began to walk softly, that we might observe what she did; and we saw her look towards the place where she expected her Lover, very seriously and often; then she walked very softly, in hopes still of his coming, having none with her but one woman who was acquainted with all her secrets. But at the last turning towards us, we came neerer her and met. She no sooner saw Cleonice, (who she thought had received her Letter, in which Page 330 she desired her to stay within at her own house after dinner) but addressing herself, Come Cleonice, said she, it is not in this place where I must justify my self; therefore I beseech you let me have the honour after dinner to talk with you. And then she would have left her: But Cleonice craftily staying her, (and counterfeiting very handsomly) Then have you changed your mind, said she unto her, for your Letter appointed this place, and I thought you were going some journey by the expressions of your Letter. Artelinda blusht at this discourse; and apprehending that he who carried the Letters was mistaken, and had given one Letter for another, she was in a great fume; yet being both crafty and bold, she turned it to laughter, and asked to see the Letter, to the end she might get it out of Cleonice's hands: She said by way of excuse, that she had writ it unto one of her Cosins, who was not upon good terms with her mother, and was going into the Country; but Cleonice having no disposition to restore it, said she had left it at home. Yet since Artelinda knew she had writ many others, and that the same mistake might chance have hapned to them also, her mind was very much disordered: She durst not return back, or would she go unto the Temple, hoping still that perhaps he who was appointed to meet, had received the right Letter, and would come: But yet not seeing him, she did more and more doubt the universal disorder of all her Letters; so that being in a restless impatience, she left us and returned home, where she found all the Answers of her Lovers, which did sufficiently confirm her in the mistake: He who was to go out of Town in the morning, and had received an appointment to meet in the evening at the sea-side, complained against her for her cruel kinde of Raillerie, and went out of Ephesus with a mind much incensed against her. He who never came into Temples, and had received an appointment to meet in the Temple of Diana, said it was enough to make him change his Religion, and adore only her eyes. He who had received that Letter which was intended for Cleonice, wherein she desired him to stay at home, that she might come and justify her self, writ back to her, that he was not worthy of so much honour, as that she should come to his house; nor knew he why she should justify herself of any thing; yet adding notwithstanding, that he would obey her. For be pleased to know, Madam, that the Letter was written so, that it would serve either to a man or a woman. Moreover, he who had received that Letter which appointed him to go unto a Lady whom he never saw, and who was his mortal enemy, thinking that Artelinda mocked him, did answer her in anger: In so much, as Artelinda designing to favour four Lovers in a morning, disobliged them all, and gave a full subject of revenge unto Cleonice: Yet would she not publish this adventure at the first; but I, who was not so indulgent as she, told it unto one of my friends, who divulged it all over the Town: So that all these Lovers having heard what happened unto Cleonice, every one of them believed her and themselves both injured by Artelinda.

Moreover, Artelinda was so very angry with him that had so grossly mistaken her Letters, and used him so ill, that he told it unto very many: and in a few daies the thing was so universally known, that all these Lovers, except him who was absent, shewed their Letters one unto another, and had so many jeers for Artelinda, that Cleonice found her full revenge: She found from thence another benefit, which was, that they never after this spoke a word more concerning the love of Ligdamis; So that both Ligdamis and she did for some daies enjoy all the happiness that an innocent Love could afford: Yet did Cleonice cause some angry hours unto Ligdamis, because she could not be perswaded that love could last long: So that though she agreed so far with him as to believe his love was very great, yet she told him time would wear it out: So that it may be said, she disquieted herself when fortune did not. She did divers times hinder Ligdamis from perswading his father to alter his mind concerning his marriage, and to permit him to address himself unto Stenobea, to obtain her consent of Leonice, telling him he must never be too hasty in business; and that perhaps his love would lessen, and that she would have a long trial of his Passion. And though Ligdamis thought this trial she already had was enough, yet his respect of her was so great, that he durst not importune her against any thing she much desired, especially since he had no other distempers of Love, but only impatience. For though Hermodorus was still in love with Cleonice, also Phocylides had a great mind that way, and likewise many others, yet was he not jealous, but was as happy as any Lover could be, who had not the full enjoyments of his Mistress.

Then Madam, questionlesse you know that the Princesse of Lydia was brought unto Ephesus, presently after the imprisonment of Cleander. At that time Ligdamis being Page 331 there, he sought all occasions to do him the best offices he could; and it was indeed by his means, that Esope, who was then at Sardis, conveyed many Letters from this illustrious Prisoner unto that Princesse, and by whom she returned answers. Though the business was then very secretly carried, and none knew it, except Esope; yet since it was known, Cleander loved Ligdamis very well, Hermodorus having some confused knowledge long since, that he received some Letters from the Princesse, yet not knowing to whom they were directed, did secretly acquaint Cressus, that Ligdamis did plot something with the Princesse his daughter: Yet Cressus not daring to arrest him, because he knew his father was at his Government; he would therefore endeavor to remove him first, and in order to that, he sent for the father under some pretence or other, to come unto him, and gave orders to arrest the son at Ephesus, the same day the father came to Sardis: But since he had many friends at Court, he was acquainted with the design of Cressus; So that seeming to be sick, he sent his excuse to the King, and sent at the same time to Ligdamis, to acquaint him also, that he should come away in all haste.

I leave you to judge Madam, how sad this storie was unto two, who thought themselves unhappy if they did not see one another every day: However, there was a necessity that Ligdamis must depart, and he did so, the saddest man alive. He offered above twenty times to disobey his father; but when Cleonice considered that perhaps she might be a cause of his imprisonment, she herself did haste his departure. Then did she begin again to complain against Love, yet not being able to wish that Ligdamis should leave loving her; she said this Passion made none any thing else but unfortunate. But as if it were not enough to be grieved for the absence and misfortune of Ligdamis, she must also suffer the persecution of Hermodorus; whose only end of prosecuting against his Rival, was to profit by his disgrace. He asked Cleonice of Stenobea in marriage, who made him a promise of it, if he could obtain the consent of her daughter. Phocylides also was more importunate then before; and since it was impossible for him to hide all his melancholly, Artelinda did explain the cause of it for him, unto all those that could not guess it without her: So that Cleonice was beleagured by all sorts of sorrows at once. The sister of Ligdamis being married to a man of good quality, whose estate was on this side the river Hermes, went thither with her husband; and there staid not in Ephesus, any with whom she might talk of Ligdamis, except me. In the mean time, Cressus seeing his design took no effect, and not conceiving it expedient to begin a civil war in his own dominions, when he expected a foreign war upon himself, did dissemble his Resentments, seeming to be satisfied with the excuse which the father of Ligdamis sent him, and expressing no discontent at all; yet for all that, his design was, as soon as Ligdamis or his father came out of that place, to secure their persons; and they having intelligence of these intentions, by friends which certainly knew it, it might be said they were Prisoners, out of fear of being so; for they never came out of the Castle of Hermes: yet Ligdamis obtained once of his father, to come disguised unto Ephesus (under colour of discovering some important business) to see Cleonice.

You may imagine, Madam, how I wondered to see him come one night into my chamber in a Phrygian habit, which made me at first not know him; yet he no sooner spoke unto me (and desired me to conceal that I knew him, unless I durst trust my women) but I knew him: So that I not considering his voyage was caused by Cleonice, Ah me Ligdamis, said I unto him, good Gods, what brought you hither? Alas Ismenea, said he, I am much more miserable then I thought I was; for since you do not know me, it is an evident sign that Cleonice does not think my Passion as violent as hers. She thinks hers more violent then yours, replied I, but I believe she does not think you discreet enough, in hazarding that life which is so dear unto her as yours is: For if you should be taken in Ephesus, in a disguised habit, you gave your enemies a sufficient ground to ruin you. It is no matter, said he to me, so I may but have the happiness to see Cleonice: Therefore to lose no time, dear Ismenea, procure me that favour. When I heard Ligdamis speak with so much zeal, and perceiving that he had rather see Cleonice, then return into safety; I sent to desire Stenobea, she would be pleased to permit Cleonice to come unto me, to assist me in a business wherein she might do me a great favour: I would not name any manner of divertisement, least Stenobea her self, loving all pleasures, should be there also: But my device did not hit as I hoped; for she thinking it to be some musick matter, or such diversion, sent me word that she would herself bring her, as indeed within an hour after she did.

Page 332 You may well imagine how Ligdamis lamented this accident, since he must not see his dear Cleonice all that night; yet since there was no remedy, I put him in my Closet, and sat down upon my bed, in expectation of Stenobea, who came presently after, in hopes to finde some very considerable divertisement. The merriest part of all the adventure was, that she acquainted all the company which was with her with my message, who all also came unto my lodging with her; so that in less then three quarters of an hour, half the Town was in my chamber, which did exceedingly amaze me; and the more, because I saw all that were there, expected something more then they found. However, though I knew none in the company would offer to go into my Closet, yet I was in a great perplexity, that I could not get them out of my Chamber: For as for Stenobea, since she was a Lover of much company, and found it there, she never complained, nor would she suffer any others to complain that they were deceived in their expectation. But at the last, I was so out of all patience at this passage, and complained so much, as I plainly told them all, I had no other design to see any that night, but only Cleonice: who seeing so much Company did trouble me in earnest, entreated her Mother to depart, and to begin the example unto others. So that Stenobea rising up first, did lead the way out, and all the rest followed, leaving only Cleonice with me.

After all this multitude was gone, which so troubled me, and grieved Ligdamis, I rise up and laughed at the accident. Then Cleonice looking upon me, and seeing by my countenance that I had no very serious business with her; Is it true, Ismenea, said she unto me, that you had some real business with me, or did you send for me only to divert you? My principal design, said I unto her, has not been to please you; for you shall presently see, that I regarded the interest of another more then yours. Upon that, I opened my Closet door; and putting her in first, I followed after her and shut the door. When she saw one there in a Phrygian habit, she stood in a maze; and much more, when he threw himself at her feet, and took her by the hand; Madam! (saying unto her) it was impossible for me to live, and not to see you. Cleonice knowing at first the voice of him that was so dear in her thoughts, could not choose but joy at it, and pardoned me for so deceiving her, and answered his complaint in a most civil and obliging manner. But presently after, considering that if it were known Ligdamis was in Ephesus disguised, they would arrest him, and perhaps make that a crime against the State, which was only an effect of Love, her joy did lessen; and her further fear was, that this meeting, if it were known, would reflect upon her reputation. So that repenting of her obliging language, and her expressions of joy; Truly Ligdamis, (said she after we were set down) Those who say the first thoughts of women are always the best, do not always say true; since at the first I had an extreme delight in seeing you, yet my second thoughts tell me that my first were unjust, and that I ought to chide you: For to speak rationally, why do you put your own liberty and life into hazard? and why do you expose me to be suspected as a Confederate with you? My reason is, Madam, replied he, because there is a fatal must upon me; that is, I must either see you, or die: And as for your confederacie or honour, Madam, I cannot believe it to be in any danger, for your vertue is above the reach of calumny. Therefore (Madam) I beseech you permit me to enjoy the happiness and satisfaction of discourse with you; and be so good as to tell me whether my disgrace and banishment hath not caused a change in your soul? and whether Ligdamis must be hated both by Cressus and by you, because he has the honour to be in the illustrious Cleander's favour? You wrong me extremely, replied she, to suspect me of any such unworthiness; and I should resent it so, if you would not perhaps think that I took an occasion to quarrel with you. To prevent which, I will forget the injury, and assure you that your misfortunes make my friendship to you more tender then before. Ligdamis was transported with joy at this obliging answer, and replied in such acknowledging terms, as spoke his soul to be full of violent Love.

Thus did we pass away this evening together, Cleonice forcing him to promise he would be gone the next morning before break of day; for she extremely feared that his stay any longer would hazard a discovery. His desires were to see her once more, but he could not possibly obtain it from her; so that he contented himself with staying as late with us as handsomly he could. Cleonice endeavoured to hide the excess of her sorrow at this parting, with as much care as Ligdamis took to express his: But do what she could, it appeared in her eyes; and both of them were so excessively sad, that I profess I was exceeding sorry for them. After Cleonice was gone, Ligdamis stayed still a long while Page 333 with me discoursing of her, and entreating me to continue his friendly solicitor. But in conclusion, it being very late, he left me also, and went to the house of a friend where he staid till break of day. This friend, whom he thought to be the most faithfull servant in the world unto him, he trusted him with all the business of his voyage: But, Madam, be pleased to know that this friend, how faithfull soever in appearance, proved to be the Spie of Hermodorus, who underhand did use all possible endeavours to ruine Ligdamis, and marry Cleonice. So that being advertised by this Agent, that Ligdamis was in Ephesus disguised, that he was in his house, and that he had been at my house with Cleonice; after Hermodorus had well considered what course to take, he sent six men whom he hired with money, to seize upon the person of Ligdamis, to take away his sword, and to guard him in the chamber where they found him, appointing them to tell Ligdamis that they arrested him by command from the Governour of Ephesus. This course being resolved upon, it was presently executed: for he in whose house Ligdamis lodged, did himself open the door unto those who would arrest a Delinquent unto the State. So that Ligdamis lying down to sleep, found himself a Prisoner when he waked, and disabled to resist their violence.

In the mean while Hermodorus, being very glad he had his Rival in his power, did most impatiently wait for an opportunity to see Cleonice. But since mornings were not fit hours to visit Ladies, he staid till the afternoon; and then he came so soon after dinner, that he found her alone in her chamber. After he had rendred an officious Complement, which she returned very coldly: Madam, said he unto her, I am very sorry that I must augment that melancholly which is in your eyes; yet I thought it my duty to acquaint you that Ligdamis is a Prisoner. Ligdamis a Prisoner! (replied Cleonice infinitely astonished) then they have surpris'd the Castle of Hermes. No, Madam, replied he; it is in this Town that he is taken in a disguise by a man of my acquaintance; who hoping to have a great recompence from Cressus for seising upon a Delinquent against the State, he desired me to lend him a house of mine in the way to Sardis, to keep him in more safety. But Madam I knowing how dear the life of Ligdamis is unto you, I have contrived a way to release him if you please. I perceive, Madam, by the trouble of your countenance, that you suspect the truth of my words: but the better to perswade you, I need only tell you that he came disguised unto Ephesus in a Phrygian habit, and that he has seen you at the lodging of Ismenea. Cleonice after this not doubting the truth, changed countenance and discourse; and looking upon Hermodorus as a man who might release Ligdamis; Hermodorus, said she unto him, I cannot deny but that the misfortune of him you name does exceedingly trouble me: for besides his being a kinsman unto Ismenea whom I love very well, he is also my friend, and such a friend, that I would do any thing to release him; therefore I conjure you for my sake, if it be in your power, to do it. Doubtless I can, replied he: but Madam, I know not whether you will do one thing which is absolutely necessary for the obtaining of his liberty. It must be either a crime, or an impossibility, replied she, if I will not: As for things only difficult, I will attempt them all to save the life of any unfortunate man that is a very stranger unto me, much sooner for a friend whom I infinitely esteem. Be pleased then to resolve, Madam, said he unto her, not only to save the life of Ligdamis, but of Hermodorus also: Yes, Madam, you may save them both with one word; and you shall no sooner consent that Hermodorus shall be happy, but Ligdamis shall be released. Cleonice was so surpris'd at this discourse of Hermodorus, that she looked upon him and could not answer, and began to suspect the truth: Hermodorus, said she unto him, are not you the man that hath arrested Ligdamis? I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) before I tell you the place where he is, or who arrested him, answer to what I said unto you: Ligdamis is a disgraced man, and will never be in a condition to express his love again at Ephesus. Ligdamis, replied she in a great fury, is a man most illustrious; and disgraced as he is, I prefer before you or any other. But Hermodorus, you have told me enough: for since I see it is in your power to release Ligdamis, you must either do it, or else resolve upon my hatred, and that unto such a degree as I shall never be at rest until I take revenge; but on the contrary, if you can be so generous as to release him without any conditions, I should be so much obliged to you, that certainly I should treat you much better then heretofore; but to think you should tyrannically engage me to marry you, that is a thing which you can never bring me to. though it were to save my own life as well as the life of Ligdamis. But Madam, I beseech you would you have me release my Rival, to the end he may supplant me and Page 334 take away my life, as I have preserved his? Consider this, Madam, I beseech you, and do not so hastily pronounce a sentence of death against Ligdamis. Oh thou most cruel man! cried she out, being transported by excess of sorrow: Can you commit so horrid a sin? Madam, replied he, you know if he fall into the hands of Cressus, he is in danger; yet doubtless I shall not help him, unless you help me. Is there no spark of Generosity in you? said she unto him. Generosity, replied he, bids me not make my self miserable by releasing my Rival; it is sufficient in those that are most generous, not to hurt another though it be in their power. But, said she, you no sooner release this Rival, but he flies away presently, and will be gone far off from Ephesus. It may be so, replied he: but as far as he is off you, he will be still in your Heart; and therefore, Madam, I must ask it, before I release him who keeps me from it. My Heart, replied she, is not so easily obtained as you suppose. You will then not release Ligdamis, replied he. You will then not merit my esteem, answered she, since at my request you will not do a thing, which your own interest should prompt you unto, if you loved your honour.

Honour (replied Hermodorus very sharply) is doubtlesse a glorious attribute, but a Lover thinking it to consist in the enjoyment of her he loves, it is not strange I should set another price upon the liberty of Ligdamis then Cleonice does. Yet, Madam, consider upon it, and I will come to receive your ultimate answer to morrow morning. Cleonice seeing Hermodorus ready to leave her, she stayed him, and forcing herself with much ado, she began to speak him fair; and entreated him to tell her where Ligdamis was, but he would not tell her: So that changing from fair words to threatnings again, she spoke as much as anger and sorrow could invent, in behalf of him she loved: But fearing least this course should hasten the destruction of Ligdamis, she fell to her supplications again: But since she could not possibly tell Hermodorus she would marry him, he left her, saying he would expect her answer in the morning; and that he gave her this time to consider, least she should repent of any hasty resolutions: And so he went out, leaving Cleonice in a most miserable condition.

She sent immediately unto me, and longed to impart the piteous story; and I went the very same hour unto her house, where I heard her relate all the passages in such terms as would have moved compassion out of the most hard and insensible soul. After then I had participated of her sorrows, and a long time descanted upon this sad adventure, we sent unto that friends house, with whom Ligdamis said he would lodge, and where yet he was, to try if we could discover how he was taken. But the wife of this perfidious man being instructed by her husband, said that he was gone out by break of day, as soon as the gates of the Town were open, and that she knew no more of him. You may then very well imagine, Madam, how Cleonice grieved at the misfortune of Ligdamis: In the mean time, we could not contrive how to prevent the sad consequences of this fatal accident; for to acquaint the Governor of Ephesus how these men who arrested Ligdamis, had no authority to keep him, and that in all likelihood it was Hermodorus who had done this wrong, were only to deliver Ligdamis from Hermodorus, into the hands of Cressus, for every one knew how the Governor had orders to arrest him if ever he came to Ephesus: so that there was no more safety for him in sending him to the King of Lydia, then there was in the tyranny of his Rival: Yet since Cleonice apprehended him to be in much danger under his Rival, she determined, that if Hermodorus when he came to her, would not be perswaded to reason, then to acquaint the Governor with the business: For by this course, said she, though I do not release Ligdamis, yet I shall punish Hermodorus, and he shall not dye by his hand. 'Tis very true, said I unto her, but will his death be welcome unto you one way then the other? and do you not consider that this way will let all the world know, Ligdamis was with you at my house, and perhaps make them believe you were the cause of his coming? But which way, replied she, can I colour it? Shall I marry Hermodorus, to release Ligdamis? Ah Ismenea, he would think his liberty then bought at too dear a rate, and yet I see no other way to get him out of the hands of his enemy, but by exposing my self. Then there is no more to be said, but that I must resolve to dye; for though I had so much power with my self as to overcome my strong aversion to Hermodorus, and should give him satisfaction, yet perhaps he would not release Ligdamis.

Afterwards considering what reports would be of her, when it should be known that Ligdamis had seen her in secret, she knew not what to resolve upon; and sometimes fearing the life of Ligdamis, sometimes her own reputation, she was most extremely troubled: Page 335 But in conclusion, after a hundred several imaginations, I advised her to acquaint a Kinsman unto Ligdamis who was at Ephesus with this passage; to the end, that when Hermodorus came unto her in the morning, he might by strong hand seize upon his person, and tell him that he knew Ligdamis was in his power; and so he might release the one with the other. At the first, we found no obstacle in the business, like those who think the execution of any thing which they earnestly desire, to be easy: But upon second consideration, we found Stenobea to be a considerable hindrance, because she was a favourer of Hermodorus, and consequently would not suffer any violence to him in her house; yet presently after, Cleonice remembered that the next day her mother was to go into the Country fifty furlongs off, and would not return till the next day: This obstacle therefore being removed, we thought our design to be the best and only expedient we could take.

Then I left Cleonice, and went to my own house, where I was no sooner come, but I sent for this Cousin unto Ligdamis, who was a very stout courageous man, and fit for such an attempt: As soon as he came, I told him his business, and he undertook it according to my wish; so that to lose no time, he procured a convenient number of assistants, requisite for the execution. Cleonice and I expected the morning with much impatience. Ligdamis for his part, he knew not what to think upon the adventure; for though he was arrested in the name of the Governor, yet he knew that they who arrested him were not his Soldiers: Moreover, he saw they let him be in the house of one whom he took to be his friend, though the Traytor had not so much boldness as to shew himself since he was arrested. He could not guess at the truth of the business; but he told us afterwards, that the sorrows which he thought Cleonice would apprehend in his misfortunes, did trouble him more than his own danger. As for Hermodorus, I believe his thoughts were more turbulent than either Ligdamis or Cleonice, since I cannot think it possible to commit any vile act with a quiet conscience.

Yet, Madam, this longed for morning being come, Stenobea being gone, and I with Cleonice, the Kinsman of Ligdamis also being in my house, with his assistants, waiting till I sent him word that Hermodorus was come. Cleonice and my self thought our selves in a worst condition then before: and though we did most earnestly desire the liberty of Ligdamis, yet when we came to the very point of executing our design, we disliked it, and we were so little accustomed to tumults and noise, that out of our weakness we disapproved of that, which our reason and affection wished were done. In the mean time, minutes seemed hours unto us, and hours days, and it was noon, and not a word of Hermodorus; who whether he had seen me with the Kinsman of Ligdamis, or out of his subtilty foresaw the accident, I know not, but he resolved not to come, and only sent a Letter. When we had lost almost all our patience in a long expectation, we saw a man, who was not his own; come unto us, and gave a Letter unto Cleonice, the sense whereof was this:

HERMODORUS unto CLEONICE.

Since my resolution depends upon yours, Madam, I sent to know what yours is; but I beseech you consider, that if it be not favourable unto him who loves you most of all the world, it shall be fatal unto him whom you love best: Consider seriously, and answer favourably, lest you repent when it is too late.

HERMODORUS.

After that Cleonice had read this Letter, she seemed so desperate, that I thought she would have dyed with grief. I asked him who brought it, where Hermodorus was? And he answered, that he thought he was at his own house; and said that it was one of his men who brought this Letter to him, commanding him from his Master to deliver it, and bring an answer. In the mean time Cleonice knew not what to resolve upon: but upon second and serious thoughts she writ back these words:

CLEONICE unto HERMODORUS.

The Resolution which I have pitched upon, is not of so small importance, as to be trusted unto that stranger which brought me your Letter: Therefore if you would know it, come hither your self, for I will not write it,

CLEONICE.

I forgot to tell you, that whilst Cleonice was writing, I sent unto the Cousin of Ligdamis, advising him to follow the man who carried Cleonice's Answer, hoping that way to know where Hermodorus was: The man whom he did employ in the business, was not so diligent as he might have been, but lost the sight of him in a press of people at the gate of Ephesus; so that then we thought our selves more miserable then before, because we were out of all hopes, since we believed Hermodorus would not come upon the Letter which Cleonice writ.

The Kinsman of Ligdamis enquired very diligently where Hermodorus was, but could hear no certainty: It was therefore resolved, to set Spies about his house the next night to watch his coming out; and if it were possible to arrest him. In the mean time Cleonice's Letter did much puzzle her obstinate Lover; who to compass his ends, did not care to commit all manner of violences. He could not interpret her Letter, as any way favourable unto himself, neither did he think she would ever consent unto the ruine of Ligdamis; yet not daring to come at her in the absence of Stenobea, because perhaps, as I said before, he knew the Cousin of Ligdamis was at my house, he resolved to stay until her return, and then to go and receive from Cleonice her ultimate resolution; and resolving, that if her answer was not according to his desire, then to put Ligdamis into the hands of Cressus: But in expectation of this, he kept home, and caused himself to be denied, if any enquired for him: Yet notwithstanding, since the Gods are more just then to permit innocents to perish, and the culpable to go free, it happened, that Hermodorus thinking himself not sure enough of those whom he had set to guard Ligdamis, would go himself that night unto the house where he was kept; so that coming out of his house with two men only, when all the world almost was in bed, the Cousin of Ligdamis, and those who watched, espied him. But not desiring to assault him so near his own house, lest he should be rescued by his own servants, they followed him at a distance, till he was a good way off, before they would attempt it, and yet kept not so far from him, but they could fall on when they pleased. They were much amazed, when they saw him stay at the door of him where Ligdamis lay; so that to lose no longer time, they courageously assaulted him, but striving rather to take him then to kill him, they pulled him by the arm further from that door; yet he ruffled from amongst them, and drew his sword: The Cousin of Ligdamis and his party being the stronger, they could easily have killed him, if their desires to save him alive had not restrained them; and also had easily taken him, if Hermodorus had not called out aloud to the perfidious friend of Ligdamis for help; who hearing his name, came out with four of the guard belonging to Ligdamis, and the combat then proved more bloody and disputable. In the mean while, two of the guard stayed still with Ligdamis, who knowing their action to be unjust, and thinking by this noise, that they were in danger to be questioned, they thought best to secure themselves, by obliging Ligdamis, and releasing him: After they had held a little council between themselves, they made the offer of it unto Ligdamis, and confessed that it was Hermodorus who had unjustly obliged them to the action: And not to lose the merit of their kindness, they never told him that their Companions were gone to help Hermodorus; but on the contrary, they were gone out to part some strangers which were quarrelling, and that they two for their parts would take hold of this opportunity, and release him, and accordingly they carried him out of a back door: But since they could not possibly get out of Ephesus at that time of the night, they thought my house the safest retreat: So that knocking at my door, and desiring some to tell me, that there was a Phrygian which desired to speak with me, my servants did accordingly. You may easily imagine how I was amazed, when after the door was open, I saw Ligdamis enter with two of his guard: Since it was late before I returned from Cleonice, and also had many Letters to write, so Page 337 it happened that I was not gone to bed: which as it proved, was very happy; for if I had, perhaps Ligdamis had not been saved, because then my servants would not have opened the doors. As soon as ever I saw him, I asked him a hundred questions at once; for I could not for my heart devise which way he should be released. Gladly would I have eased Cleonice of an ill nights rest: but fearing it might chance discover what I so much desired to conceal, I thought it better to stay until the next morning before I acquainted her with this pleasing news.

In the mean time, since it is never good trusting unto any such friends as had any hands in an ill act, I appointed a Chamber for the two Soldiers, and commanded my men not to go to bed, but to watch them: Yet first we made them tell us all that they knew concerning Hermodorus. For my part, I would not tell Ligdamis that his Cousin had followed Hermodorus all that night, or that I believed it was he who assaulted him; lest knowing his courage, he should offer to go out unto his relief. I was the more induced to conceal it from him, because I supposed the combat was ended: But when I acquainted him with the proposition which Hermodorus had made unto Cleonice, with the despair in which she was, and the answers which she returned; he expressed as much hatred to his Rival, and as much love to his Mistress, as was possible for two contrary violent Passions to invent. I had good mind he should have gone away that same night, but yet he would not: however let me tell you, it was absolutely impossible to persuade him unto any sleep, or to shut his eyes, though I forced him to go unto his Chamber which was made ready for him, whilst I went into my own.

As soon as day appeared, I went unto Cleonice, whom I found ready to hearken unto me: For besides as she had not slept all that night, so the Cousin of Ligdamis had been with her to give an account of all passages between Hermodorus and himself: yet since he was ignorant what was become of Ligdamis, he supposed that his Guards had only changed his Prison, but never thought they had released him. So that her sorrows were still the same, till I removed them, and told her that Ligdamis was safe. Her joys were then so excessive, that her thoughts were wholly upon him, and she never told me what was become of Hermodorus: But after I had asked her several times, she told me that the perfidious friend of Ligdamis, with three of his Guards, were killed; that Hermodorus was much wounded; that the Kinsman of Ligdamis had lost two of his men; and that in conclusion he being alone with his men in the streets, he went into this house to know what was become of Ligdamis, and that he found none in it but one woman, who told him that Ligdamis was gone from thence with two of his Guards. Cleonice further told me, that the Kinsman of Ligdamis was gone unto the house of one who was an Enemy unto Hermodorus, there to hide himself until such time as he knew what would become of his wounds. In the mean time we began to apprehend that Ligdamis was not safe in my house; so that we thought it expedient to advertise his Cousin, that he should take orders to go out of Ephesus that very night; which accordingly he was resolved upon, and executed. Cleonice would not afford her unhappy Lover so much comfort as to see her once before he went, lest it should be discovered; and thought her visit would make it suspected that he was in my house: For be pleased to know, Madam, that as rage and despair made Hermodorus almost mad, so he spread it about all the Town, that Ligdamis was in Ephesus, that he had seen Cleonice at my house, and that Hermodorus and he had fought; and a hundred more such reports. All which at the first did not much disquiet Cleonice, because all her cares were to hear that Ligdamis was safe: But when she understood that he and his Cousin were got out of the Town, with men to guard them, then these Reports began to trouble her; which indeed did make so great a noise, that the Governour of Ephesus caused a most strict search to be made. Since he was a very worthy man, and Prolixenide his wife did me the honour to esteem me very much, she did me the favour to send for me, and asked me very inquisitively what I knew. When I had received this summons, I went unto Cleonice, to consult together upon what I should say, before I went: For as on the one side, by not confessing that Love was the loadstone which drew Ligdamis hither, it would give cause of suspicion that he was a Delinquent to the State, and that he had some enterprize upon Ephesus; so on the other side, if it should be confessed that a violent love to Cleonice was the cause of his coming in a disguise, yet it was to be feared that it would not at all be credited: So that whether she should justifie Ligdamis, or herself, was the difficult knot of the question, which she could hardly untie. As for the first of these two, she must needs speak the truth; and for the other, she was forced to the refuge of a lye, Page 338 since certainly all appearances were against us, and that it was not probable Ligdamis should come to Ephesus in a disguise, without the consent of Cleonice.

After a serious examination of the business, Love was most prevalent, and she consented rather to be suspected, then to give any grounds of accusation against Ligdamis. She then appointed me to speak the truth; and indeed, I told my tale so well, that Pollixenida believed me, and undeceived her husband in the opinion which he had, that Ligdamis contrived something against the Kings service; insomuch, as he promised Polixenida to write unto Cressus in favour of Ligdamis. However, all this could not prevent Artelinda, Phocylides, and all the Town, from a hundred various censures upon the accident: But as for Hermodorus, he had not any long vie amongst them, for he dyed of his wounds the seventh day: So that all his accusations died with him; and all his kindred being persons of honor, finding his actions so unworthy, would not prosecute the Cousin of Ligdamis as an Assassinate, nor revenge his death, because he deserved it. However, the reports of these things were so loud, that Cleonice could not endure to hear them: So that her Aunt having a very pleasant Seat near the River Hermes, and being ready to depart the Town, she desired Stenobea, that she might go with her; and made me promise to pass away the Autumn with her, since I could absolutely dispose of my own actions.

Cleonice, who would not have left Ephesus, but because of various reports, would not give any cause to augment them; and therefore she beseeched her Aunt, not to pass over the River, at the Castle of Hermes, where Ligdamis and his Cousin were happily arrived; but to finde out a passage further of, lest reports should rise, that she went to see Ligdamis: Yet she was in a place where he saw her sometimes; for though he never went out of the Castle, yet since Cleonice was in the Country, and so near his sister, he pretended sometimes to see her, sometimes in disguise, and sometimes with a more considerable guard.

In the mean time, to keep my word with Cleonice, I went into the Country to her; but I did not as she did, for I passed the River at the Castle of Hermes, and called upon Ligdamis, whom I found still extremely amorous, but yet extremely melancholly, and he would not tell me the cause; entreating me only to sollicite for him, and be his friend. When I came to Cleonice, I gave her an account of all the alterations in Ephesus, since her departure; how that Phocylides finding none in the Town to deceive, was gone to dwell at Sardis; and how Anaxippa not being able to endure the courses of her daughter, forced her to marry a man, who the next day after the wedding, carried her into the Country where she sees none, and is doing severe penance for her past gallantries. This news, which heretofore would have much recovered Cleonice, did now only move a smile, and that in such a constrained manner, that I knew her minde was not quiet. So that after I had addressed my self in all fitting civilities to her Aunt, I began to talk in private upon the first opportunity which offered it self; and carrying her into a walk near the house, What's the matter Cleonice? said I unto her; from whence proceeds this extraordinary melancholly? At the first, she told me, it was only an effect of solitude, and her being in the Country; but I knew her too well to be put off by such an excuse, and did press her a little further: What can it be, said I, that thus torments you? All those false reports which once troubled you, are quite dead; Ligdamis is a Lover, as he was, and loves you as much as ever he did. Ah Ismenea, said she, I am afraid that what you say last is not true. What reason have you, said I unto her, to think it is not? A hundred, replied she; so that I am certain you were deceived, when you told me one day, that Love could never become friendship, since certainly the thoughts of Ligdamis towards me are no more. Really Cleonice, said I unto her, you are a most strange woman to speak thus; for is it possible, that you who heretofore apprehended the friendship of Ligdamis could never become Love, should now fear that his Love should become friendship? I do not fear it, replied she, but I believe it. And what ground have you for your belief? said I unto her: A thousand slight passages which I have observed, said she; and also upon a strange melancholly coldness, which Ligdamis of late hath used: But yet (said she, and dissembled) I do not murmur, or say any thing to him; but he must know, that though his father would change his resolution, and permit him to marry me, yet I should never consent: Not but that (said she, and blush'd) I should be glad that Ligdamis should love me; but to be engaged to live with a man all my life, who changes so often, is a thing which I can never do: For I have cause to fear, that since he has Page 339 passed from indifferency unto friendship, and from friendship unto love, and from love unto friendship again, he will repass at last from friendship unto indifferency, where first I found him, and last of all, from indifferency to hatred and scorn. Cleonice spoke all this so hastily, as made me laugh; and so much the more because I knew she wronged him. But, said I unto her (and looked earnestly upon her) will you be pleased to acquaint me with some of Ligdamis his crimes? His Luke-warmness, replied she, is a crime, which though none but my self can be sensible of it, yet it is such a one, and so great, that I cannot pardon it. I cannot think, said I, that Ligdamis can be so to you. As we were thus in talk of him, news was brought us that he was coming, which she no sooner heard of, but she began to entreat me, that I would not tell him what she said, or chide him: Yet since I thought she spoke against her minde, I told him all what she had said; at which he much wondred. He perceived that she was a little more serious then ordinary; but since she told him that it was caused by some news which she received from Ephesus, that did not please her, he took no great notice of it, knowing he never had given her any cause to complain against him. I do not know (said he unto me, after I had made a relation of what she had said concerning his change) whether she call my melancholly luke-warmness; but I am most certain, I never in my life did love her with more zeal and violence then now.

As we were thus talking in that Alley where Cleonice and I used to walk, we saw her walking alone in another; and going towards her, when he came near, Unjust Lady, said he unto her, can you accuse me for loving you only in the degree of friendship? On the contrary, said she, I do commend you for it, and therefore I spoke unto Ismenea of it. But yet Madam, I beseech you what have I said, what have I done or thought, which could possibly move you to think so? You are grown so strangely melancholly, replied she, that I cannot chuse but imagine, that though once you loved me, yet now you do not. I perceive then, said he, that my melancholly is my crime: But, Madam, since I must discover the cause of it, which hitherto I have concealed, because I would not make you sharer in my sorrows; Be pleased to know, that perhaps we shall be separated for a long time, for the state of things considered, there is great appearance that all Lydia will be turned into desolation, and our Monarch ruined. I know very well, Madam, that your soul is heroick, and so interested in the publique good, that the love of your Country imprints it self deep in your heart; therefore I am not afraid to tell you, that we are in expectation to see all Lydia in arms, and conquered by a strange Prince: For, Madam, my father and I both, have received certain intelligence from the Court, that Cressus will declare war against that invincible Conqueror, unto whom half of Asia is already subject, and against whom there is no resistance: And all this in a time when the illustrious Cleander, who only is able to manage such a war, is a Prisoner: For my part, I know not what policy there is in it; but I know well, that the way to vanquish, is to have a General that knows both how to fight and command; and yet Cressus will not hear talk of the liberty of Cleander, but still keeps under hatches the only man that can oppose so Puissant a Prince: And I pray unto the Gods, that the injustice of Cressus do not draw the wrath of heaven against all the Monarchy: I know he hath sent to consult with several Oracles concerning it, and he waits only for their answer before they fight. There runs an odd rumour also, that he will give retreat unto the King of Pontus, who carried away the Princess of Medea: So that Cyrus being animated both by his interest of Love, and by his desires of new glory, he will in all likelihood pull down the Grandure of Cressus, especially if he do not release the illustrious Cleander.

Now, Madam, you know the true cause of my melancholly, which you are pleased to call lukewarmness, and want of love: But to make tryal of my Passion, and not to trust unto my words, I beseech you command me the most difficult things, and if you do not finde a most exact obedience, then tax me with want of Love to you, and hatred to my self. Ligdamis expressed himself in these words in a manner so far from that lukewarmness wherewith Cleonice charged him, that I forced her to ask him pardon, before she had time to speak; and indeed, after a while of resistance, he made so many excuses, and seemed so ashamed of her injurious charge, that she would let him speak no more by way of excusing himself.

After this, we shared in the melancholly of Ligdamis, and found that he had great cause of fears: And since this, Madam, these two Lovers never quarrelled, though they were not without their sorrows; for Ligdamis fell sick within a few days after, and so Page 340 dangerously, that it was thought he could not escape death. Yet at the last he recovered a little, though the Physicians did all conclude it would be long before he was perfectly recovered: And indeed he found it true, for he continued very ill untill Cleander was released. Cleonice also had such a violent Fever, that she could not return to Ephesus when the Forces of Cyrus were entering into Lydia. For my part, I was resolved not to leave her, untill we found out some conveniencie for us both to return to Ephesus together: But since the house of Ligdamis his sister was the strongest in all that part of the Country, we stayed there till the war was begun. Then the Liberty of Cleander being known, and also that he was the Prince Artamas son unto the King of Phrygia; this news wrought such a perfect cure upon Ligdamis, and his upon Cleonice, that it was resolved amongst us to get into Ephesus before the war grew hotter: And Ligdamis being to guard us with two hundred Horse, we began our journey, intending to pass over the River at the Castle of Hermes. But it was the pleasure of the Fates, that we should meet with the Troops of Cyrus, and become his Prisoners; yet happy in such a powerfull Protection as yours, Madam, and such a generous Conquerour as CYRUS.

Ismenea, after she had ended her relation, left Panthea in much satisfaction of mind; and that Queen most obligingly telling her, that she was as worthy to be Cleonices Friend, as Ligdamis her Lover. After this, Panthea calling for Araspes, whilst Ismenea went to seek Cleonice, she gave him orders to tell Cyrus, that Ligdamis was no less in love with Cleonice, then he was with Mandana: So that if it would conduce to end the war without fighting, Cyrus may make Peace through all Asia: In the mean while, intreat him from me to look upon Ligdamis and Cleonice as two whose interests are very dear unto me. Araspes, after his usual reverence, told her he would not fail in his obedience. Afterwards he took horse immediately, and went to give Cyrus an account of that business which Chrisantes had imposed upon him: And coming to the Camp, he went straight to the Tent of Cyrus; who no sooner saw him, but imagining he had executed his Commands, bealked with him in private: Come, insensible Araspes, (said he to him and smiled) what news do you bring me concerning Ligdamis? Sir, (said he and blusht) he whom you speak of is most certainly in Love with Cleonice, as the Queen of Susiana assures me. Cyrus was very glad to hear it, hoping thereby the better to advance the design of the Prince Artamas: So that sending Araspes back with orders to thank Panthea most civilly, he sent for Ligdamis, who was with Feraulas in Timocreon's Tent. Ligdamis was no sooner come, but Cyrus taking him aside, conjured him to let him know one thing from his own mouth, though he knew it perhaps another way. Sir, answered he, if it be within the compass of my knowledge, you shall most infallibly know it also. I do conjure you then (said the most invincible Prince of Persia) to tell me whether you be not more a Captive to the fair Cleonice, then you are unto Cyrus? Sir, replied Ligdamis, (a little surprised at this question) since my Captivity is most glorious unto me, I will never deny it unto you, but that the fetters of the fair Cleonice do load me more then yours: But Sir, I beseech you (if I may be permitted to ask) why do you desire to know it? Because I would know, replied Cyrus, whether your Passion has not taught you to pity others in the same case. Sir, answered Ligdamis, (still more puzzled to gness at the intention of Cyrus) Those who are in my case may perhaps pity, but their compassion will be but very unserviceable unto any in the like condition. Not so, said Cyrus, for you may do the Prince Artamas the most eminent service that ever was done. How, Sir! replied he; I beseech you tell me presently what it is. You know, said Cyrus unto him, that he is in Love with the Princess of Lydia: you are not ignorant of her imprisonment; and doubtless you know also, that she is to be brought from the Temple of Diana unto the Citadel in Sardis. I do know all these, replied Ligdamis; but I confess I do not know which way I can be serviceable unto that Prince, who hath many ways obliged me to do all I can. And you may do it, answered Cyrus, by helping him to release that Princess whom he loves. If I can do it, said Ligdamis, without betraying the King my Master, or committing any unworthy acts, certainly I will do it with abundance of joy. Since I have told you that you can, replied Cyrus, you may assure yourself I will never move you to any unworthy acts. After this, Cyrus told him that the Prince Artamas was gone to the Castle of Hermes, to persuade his Father that they may pass the River, to deliver the Princess of Lydia, as they conduct her unto Sardis.

Page 341Ligdamis at first seemed much surprised at this discourse: But Cyrus speaking again, Do not think (said he) generous Ligdamis, that we desire a Pass for all our Army, or with any intentions to surprise Cressus, or to vanquish him, or to subvert his Empire: No, Ligdamis, we would only release our Prisoner-Princesses, and obtain permission to pass only with so many men as will be able to deal with the Convoy which guards them: Thus you shall not contribute any thing to the ruine of your Country, but rather prevent it; since I do engage my word, (if by your means we can recover the Princess Mandana and the Princess of Lydia out of their power who persecute them) to move Ciaxares to offer such Conditions of Peace so advantageous to Cressus, that he shall not refuse them: But on the contrary, if you do not permit us this desire, all Lydia shall be destroyed. Moreover, it is not to spare our blood in forcing a passage over the River, that we have recourse to your assistance; but because if we be put to force, it will be with our whole Army, and then Cressus cannot bring them unto Sardis, but they will remain at Ephesus where the Sea is open to carry them away, and so we shall not perhaps recover them but by many battels and sieges. Therefore generous Ligdamis, if it be true that the fair Cleonice hath sensibly moved your heart, and made you capable to consider the cases of other Lovers, be a friend unto Prince Artamas who suffers all the miseries of a Lover. I will not say the fair Cleonice is in my power; for though you deny my request, yet I here declare, for the Prince of Phrygia's sake, that she shall not be any thing less favourably used.

Oh Sir, replied Ligdamis, it is enough, and my silence is a crime. Yes Sir, I am to blame to let you speak so long; and questionless I ought to believe all your propositions just, without any further examination. I resolve, Sir, to contribute all my power unto the releasement of the Princess Mandana, and the Princess Palmis: And therefore give me leave to tell you, that I believe the Prince Artamas will not do any good upon my Father: So that if you dare trust me upon my word, it were expedient I went presently to acquaint him, that my Sister which is here with Cleonice is your prisoner as well as myself, and I doubt not but this consideration will much further your desires. But Sir, I beseech you, I beseech you remember your promise to procure the peace of my Country, if I re-|der you the Princess Mandana. I do so solemnly promise it, replied Cyrus, that you ne not apprehend the least fear; since it is my custom to keep my word unto my most mor|tal enemies, though it would cost me a hundred Crowns. I think, Sir, said Ligdamis unto him, that since I leave a Mistress and a Sister with you, you need not fear my return. If I durst not trust you, answered Cyrus, I should not speak unto you as I have done. After this, Ligdamis desired that some men might go with him, lest he should be surprised in his quarters as he passed, and also to the end there might be some witnesses of his transaction with his Father, in case the Prince Artamas had been denied, and should be gone from the Castle of Hermes before he came. Cyrus having already a very high esteem of Ligdamis, would not have let any to have gone this journey with him, but only men to wait upon him, had it not been for this last reason: but the first being more strong, he appointed Feraulas to go with him. So that without any more delay they prepared them|selves for the Castle of Hermes: Ligdamis first writing a Letter to his dear Cleonice, lest she should be troubled at his departure. Cyrus having a desire (according to his pro|mise) to let the King of Assyria know what Ligdamis went about; and since he could not but approve of any thing that might conduce to the Princess Mandana's release, Ligdamis received a hundred kind expressions from him as well as from Cyrus; and engaged his word to free his Country, if Ligdamis freed Mandana.

However, though there was some probability that this way might prevent a long war, yet Cyrus was as circumspect and diligent as if it were to last a long time. He enquired of the Prisoners concerning the Passes over the River, the fit places to encamp in, the most advantageous Forts, concerning the fortification of all their Works, and a hundred other things: And as knowing as he was in the art of war and conquering, yet he never thought he knew enough; so that without any manner of pride he would discourse with the old Captains of his Army, and would not despise the advice of the meanest Souldier; though to speak truth, he rather instructed them of whom he asked any advice, then was instructed by them. His Military cares robb'd him not of one thought of those Civilities which he intended to the Captive Princesses, and to so many Kings and Princes as were in his Army. Yet maugre all those several cares and variety of business, Mandana was the absolute Mistress of his heart, and the object of all his desires: He did every hour flatter himself Page 342 with hope of seeing her ere long at liberty, and also as oft fear the contrary: So that passing continually from hopes to feares, and feares to hopes, his soul was in continuall agitation. The Picture of Mandana, and the Scarf which dyling Mazares left, was all his consolation; he preserved them with such extraordinary care, as it might easily be seen, how dear she was to him unto whom they related.

The sight of the King of Assiria, procured him some vexatious hours, and he had much ado to hide his real resentments, and to live in handsom civility with him, until Mandana's releasment, when then he should either vanquish, or be vanquished by him. Yet had he the consolation to think he had thrown him out of his Throne, and to know that Mandana loved him not, and that he himself was more happy in her affection than he: but on the contrary, that the King of Assiria could not in reason have one single thought which could afford him any comfort, unless out of the Oracle which he received at Babylon; for he saw his Rival arrived to the highest top of glory, and that he was as high in the esteem of his Princess, and no way unfortunate, but in being separated from her, and her being a Captive: But as for himself, he saw he was without a Crown, or any hopes ei|ther to reign in Assiria, or in the heart of Mandana, at the least in all probability. Yet he flattered himself still in hopes of this Oracle; and sweetned all his sorrows, and dissipated all his fears, by believing that he should one day by some way which he understood not, be as happy, as he was at present unfortunate. Also, he was never without this Oracle about him, and had it writ in a little Table-book of Cedar, though he had it all|so perfectly in his memory.

Thus did these two great Princes and illustrious Lovers, reason with themselves during the voyage of Artamas, who found much more difficulty in perswading the Governour o•Hermes then he imagined, for he did not think Ligdamis would not be there; yet was he received very civilly, as he by whose favour the Governor had his Government: But since the negotiation was for a passage of forraign Forces, the Governor could not hearken unto it; though the Prince Artamas told him, it was only to release the Princess Mandana, who was the principal cause of the war, and to deliver the daughter of his King, who was most unjustly persecuted. It is very true, his minde was much troubled to hear no news of his son, who he said was gone to convoy his sister and some other La|dies, and that he could not give him any direct answer, until he knew what was become of him; But when he heard by the return of some Souldiers an hour after, that Ligdamis was a Prisoner, and his sister a captive, he exceedingly grieved at it. The Prince Artamas also knowing it, did give him some comfort, for he assured him that Cyrus would treat him very well, which did something lessen his sorrow: He offered to send Sosicles for better intelligence; and did so, conceiving the Governour would conclude nothing with him, till he heard more certainly concerning his Son: But as good luck was, Sosicles meeting with Ligdamis and Feraulas in the way, that journey was shortened, and they all returned to the Castle of Hermes, where they were received with much joy; and it was hard to say, which had more satisfaction to see Ligdamis, his father, or the Prince Artamas.

After this, the transaction met with no great difficulties; for assoon as Ligdamis related unto his father how Cyrus treated him; and how his sister and all the Ladies were used, his heart did change, especially when Ligdamis told him that Cyrus desired a pass for no more men then were requisite to release the captive Princesses, and that he so|lemnly promised upon his word to procure the peace of Lydia, if by his means they were released. After this, the Governour having no power to oppose Prince Artamas, Ligdamis, and the welfare of his Country, he consented unto their desires; so that the Phry|gian Prince returned back fully satisfied: He moved Ligdamis to stay with his father, purposely to keep him in the same minde; but Ligdamis would not upon any terms, saying that he were unworthy of those civilities which he had received, if he did not return. Artamas was still urgent with him; but the generosity of Ligdamis being fortified with a prevalent consideration of Love, was fully resolved to return: And therefore they all returned to Cyrus, who welcomed them with abundance of joy, especially after he un|derstood the happy success of their negotiation. Artamas gave Cyrus many thanks for his favours unto Ligdamis, and Ligdamis beginning a fresh to applaud him, he forced the modesty of Cyrus to impose silence; and to do it with a better grace, he hindred them from speaking of himself, by professing his own obligations unto them, for contriving Page 343 things so as that he had hopes to release Mandana. Artamas, who had no less interest in the business then he had, could not endure he should thank him for any thing he had done• And Ligdamis, who was exceedingly obliged unto both those Princes, was much ashamed of those thanks they gave him.

During this contestation of Civility, the King of Assiria hearing of their Return, came unto Cyrus, who was sending for him, to acquaint him with the result of their ne|gotiation: So that being a partaker of his Rivals joy, and hoping to see Mandana re|leased, he rendred a thousand expressions of gratitude unto the transactors of the enter|prize; all of them being infinitely impatient to receive some intelligence from the friends of Meneceus, concerning the departure of the Princesses, and the Convoys which were to guard them. Artamas, who was not less Amorous then any, was not less joyed in his hopes to release the Princess Mandana, without fighting against the King her father. Ligdamis for his part, hoping more in the enjoyment of his dear Cleonice, if the wars were composed, then if they continued, was a most sensible partaker in the joys of all these Princes.

In the mean time, the Prince Artamas desiring permission to go and acquaint the King his father with his transactions; and the King of Assiria desiring to contemplate upon his joys in private, both of them went away; and since Ligdamis and Sosicles did follow the Prince of Phrygia, Feraulas only remained with Cyrus. Indeed he was the most agree|ble companion he could have, since it was to him only that Cyrus had communicated the secret of his Passion: For though Chirantes in all other matters was highly in his fa|vour, yet it was to Feraulas he opened the Closet of his soul, as one that was of a more suitable age and humour to excuse all his imperfections. Agladitus also coming in, did not disturb or alter the conversation; for he had all the qualities which Cyrus could wish for in a confidant of his Love: His minde was clear, his soul was tender, and he was acquainted with this Passion, out of his own experience. So that Cyrus employed two hours with him and Feraulas very pleasingly in talking concerning the state of things: This Conversation had lasted longer, if the King of Phrygia had not interrupted it, by a visit which he paid unto Cyrus to testify his joy that his sons negotiation had took so good effect. The rest of this day was thus spent; and the next morning Cyrus resolved with the King of Assiria, and the Prince Artamas, upon those Troops which they would make choice of for this secret expedition, when time required. After which Cyrus, who was the most obliging Prince upon earth, calling for Ligdamis, who had contented himself with writing unto Cleonice, and durst not so soon ask leave to see her, he told him in a low voyce and smiled, that he was his Prisoner no longer: So that, said he unto him, if you be the Captive of Cleonice, go and visit her. Ligdamis answered, that since both his Captivities were glorious, he desired to go out of his fetters, no more then out of the fair Cleonices; yet since he gave him leave, he would go and visit her, and did so. The day following, Cyrus accompanied with the Prince Phraartes (who never failed upon such an occasion) went to visit the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess Araminta: He found the first of these two something less sad, by reason of the hopes which Araspes had infused into her, but he found the Princess Araminta full of melancholly, and could not guess the cause, unless the continuation of her misfortunes, which she endured with abund|ance of constancy. Cyrus did all he could to comfort her; but since she heard no news of Spitridates, she was not capable of any joy. The sight of Cyrus, as pleasing as it might have been unto her, by reason of that prodigious resemblance which was between him and Spitridates, did rather augment then lessen her languishing humour: For when she imagined that this Prince who was so admirably handsome, so compleat, and so ge|nerous, was either dead or a Prisoner, or perfidious, she had much ado to exclude such angry thoughts, for fear she should discover her weakness: However, she had rather the presence of Cyrus should revive those sad thoughts, then see the Prince Phraartes with her, whose very sight raised a thousand distempers on her fancy, to think that her eyes should allure him, and chase Spitridates from her; so that the love of this Prince was in|tolerable to her.

After Cyrus had continued his visit a long while with Araminta, he took his leave of her; and to oblige Ligdamis, he went unto the chamber of his Ephesian Prisoners, unto whom he shewed a hundred civilities, especially to the sister and Mistress of Ligdamis. In his going from thence, he called for Araspes, whom he had observed to be very sad: And since he conceived the cause might proceed from a dislike unto that employment; and Page 344 since he loved him very well, he asked, whether he did not think himself a Prisoner, in keeping of Prisoners; if he were weary of it, he would put some other in his place. Araspes was so surprised at this Question, that in lieu of returning thanks, he earnestly asked him, whether the Queen of Susiana or the Princess Araminta, had made any complaints of him, or whether he had any way displeased them or him? And Cyrus answering, no, but rather on the contrary they commended him; he beseeched him to let him continue in his office, and thanked him for his goodness towards him. Yet it was after such a manner, as made Cyrus believe that Araspes was troubled at something which he had no disposition to tell: So that without any further reflection upon it, he took horse and returned to the Camp.

In going thither, he espied two men on horse-back in the way coming towards him; and since the rode faster then he did, they quickly met. But one of these strangers no sooner cast his eyes upon Cyrus, and observing the honour which was done him, but he asked one of the followers who it was? And being answered, it was Cyrus, he stopt and alighted from his horse, and presented himself unto Cyrus, making no question but to be known unto him. Then addressing his speech unto him, Sir (said he) I beseech you give me leave to ask pardon for not rendring you that honour which I ought, upon that occasion wherein I did you all the service I could. Cyrus looking upon this stranger, whom he saw to be a handsom proper man, did seriously examine his memory whether ever he had seen his face: but the physiognomie of this young Cavalier was so new in his eyes, that he concluded him to be certainly mistaken: So that answering very civilly, he told him that he could not remember he ever saw him, and by consequence he thought him to be mistaken, since he did not use to forget such men as have any characters of Nobleness in their faces, as he had. Afterwards causing him to take horse again, and desiring him to tell him when and where he saw him? This handsom stranger told him in the same language which he had newly learnt, and which was in a kind of corrupted Greek, that he had the honour to meet him in a Wood in Paphlagonia, when he had but one Page with him, and when he was assaulted by six men, from the violence of whom he endeavoured to defend him.

I do not know, said Cyrus unto him, whether I should let you go on in your error, lest I should be suspected not to acknowledge a benefit: Yet notwithstanding to undeceive you, and to prevent my being accused of ingratitude, know (Generous Stranger) that I engage my self to recompence the service which you did unto that man for whom you take me: But know withall, that there is a Prince in the world who does so much resemble me, that at divers times and places we have been taken one for another: Therefore since I do not doubt but that it was he whom you relieved, and since I am much interested in his life and fortune, I pray tell me what you know concerning him, and in what place and condition you left him.

Whilst Cyrus was speaking thus, the Stranger looking seriously upon him, did indeed find some little difference in the air of his Countenance between him and the other whose life he had saved. So that not questioning the truth of what Cyrus said, whose honour was too well known to be suspected of a lye; Sir, said he unto him, I beg your pardon for crediting my eyes before my reason, which secretly tells me, that he who hath conquered the greater part of all Asia, can possibly fall into such a condition as to owe his life to such an unfortunate stranger as I am. The Man whose life you have preserved, replied he, is so noble, that I conceive you more honoured by it, then if I owed you mine: For to speak sincerely of you, whatsoever I have above him, is rather the gift of fortune, then any effect of my valour. However I pray you satisfy my curiosity, and tell me very punctually what you know concerning him. But first, to make your relation more pleasing, I pray let me know the name and quality of his Preserver, to the end I may render him his due respect. Sir, said this Stranger, my Name is Anaxaris: but as for my Quality, I beseech you move me not to tell it; it were easie, if I would dissemble, by telling an advantageous lye, to conceal it that way: But since I desire no esteem from you but what my actions and services shall speak me worthy of, I will not either under or overvalue myself, by saying my Quality is either too low or too high. Therefore without any more discourse concerning it, give me leave to tell you, that the Reports of your illustrious Name drawing me out of my own Country to come and be myself a witness of so many Miracles which fame does trumpet of you: And passing one evening through a Wood in Paphlagonia, I saw a man sitting under a Tree, who was speaking Page 345 unto another that was not above two paces from him, and who seemed to look unto two horses which were tyed unto the trunk of a Pine-tree, lest they should break loose. As the air and garb of him who seemed to be the Master of the other seemed to have much grandure in them, so I thought myself obliged to help him, as afterwards I did. I looked upon him very seriously, and methought he was very sad; giving me such a civil salute as I passed by, that I looked back at him three or four times: And at last I perceived six men come out of several quarters of the Wood, who falling upon him all at once, hardly gave him time to rise, or put his hand unto his sword; which yet he did so readily and courageously, that you need not wonder (Sir) if when they told me that you was Cyrus, I thought that you were he whom I had the happiness to serve; for I never in all my life saw so much courage in any man, as in that illustrious stranger. I no sooner saw him assaulted upon such disadvantages, but I went to him, and cried I would die in his defence; and did such things as I believe I should never have done, if his example had not shewed me the way. So it was, Sir, that after a long combat we disengaged ourselves from these Assassins; for four of them lay dead upon the place, and two ran away. This valiant stranger whom I did assist, was wounded in two places, whilst he was getting upon his horse: So that seeing him to stand in need of help, I asked him into what place he would be conducted. He was as civil as valiant; and thanked me for my assistance in such terms, as easily made me understand the excellency of his soul. He would have dispensed with me from the offer which I rendered, telling me that the Life which I had so much care of, was not so happy, as to take so much pains in preserving it. Yet for all that I would not leave him, but conducted him to the next house which was not above four or five furlongs off: As good luck was, there was a Town not far from thence, where a Chyrurgion dwelt; and he knowing of him, sent his Page for him. I staid with him till his wounds were dressed, and would have staid longer, if he would have suffered me: So that seeing the people of the house very carefull of him, I sooner resolved to obey him. He desired to know my name; and I told him, as I have done you, that it was Anaxaris. But since it was then very late, I was forced to stay there in that place all that night, and lodged in a chamber next his. The Chyrurgion told me his wounds were not mortal; but he found so deep a Melancholy in his face, that he feared a Fever; which added to his wounds, would make them more hard to heal. As I did lie in a Chamber which joyned unto his, and the partition was only of unjoyned Planks, I heard him pass away that night without any sleep: He spoke sometimes very loud, and though I could not distinctly hear what he said, yet I could often hear him pronounce the name of Araminta: I understood that he made many pittifull complaints against some Beauty of that name; for he would often cry out, Araminta! perfidious Araminta! why cannot I forget thee? These complaints begetting in me a fresh curiosity to know whom I had served, I asked his Page, before I parted: But he told me that he had such strict charge from his Master to conceal it, as I would press him no further. And so I left him, without any further knowledge what he was, then what I have told you: Yet I brought away with me so great esteem of this valiant man, that thinking I had found him when I met you, Sir, I was in an extasie of joy. But Sir, I am well satisfied with my mistake; for I had rather have the honour to be known unto you, then have enjoyed my satisfaction in meeting with him I took you for.

The Prince Spitridates, replied Cyrus, is one of so high a merit, that I am not displeased if you prefer him before me, since in so doing you do but what is reason. In the mean time, Generous Anaxaris, I do profess myself obliged unto you for preserving the life of Spitridates as much, as if you had preserved mine: And therefore I do acknowledge in the presence of all that hear me, you may justly accuse me of ingratitude, if I do not render you all the good offices which can be expected from a Prince who is obliged unto it. Anaxaris answered these civil expressions in extreme humility, yet far from any baseness: But on the contrary, as humble as he was, yet it appeared by his answer that he was more accustomed to confer favours then receive any. So that Cyrus conceiving a great opinion of him, resolved to have an especial care of him; and in order to that, gave orders to place him in one of his own Tents, and that he should be treated as a man of high quality, as he seemed to be. But as Cyrus was well pleased with Anaxaris, so Phraartes was not: For since he was perswaded that if Spitridates had been dead, he should have been more in favour with Araminta, so he had a secret malignancy against Anaxaris, as soon as he knew he had saved the life of his Rival. Page 346 Cyrus as soon as he came to the Camp, desired to acquaint the Princess Araminta with some part of what he heard concerning Spitridates, and to dissemble the other part, making him less wounded then he was; but since the relation was before so many, he thought it hard to be done.

Yet thinking it would be more consolation unto her to hear he was wounded, then to believe he was unfaithful or dead, as sometimes she did, he sent Feraulas to acquaint her, that a stranger came to the Camp, who about a moneth since met with Spitridates; for Anaxaris said it was about that time he relieved that Prince: Feraulas, according to his Masters commands went presently unto Araminta, who at the first was extreemly joyed to hear Spitridates was alive: But not contenting her self with what Feraulas told her, and desiring to see the man who had seen him, because she perceived he did not positively consent she should, therefore she imagined much more concerning Spitridates then it was: So that Feraulas promised to entreat Cyrus from her, to let her see him who brought the news. Then returning to the Camp, he performed his promise, and Cyrus desired Anaxaris the next morning to visit the Princess Araminta, of whom the Prince Spitridates did so unjustly complain; withal conjuring him to say his wounds are not so dangerous as they were: But this warning was in vain; for Phraartes had let her know by an Armenian woman (whom he had got to wait upon her when she was at Artaxates, and was all for him) that Spitridates was left for dead, and never like to recover, so that Araminta would not believe Anaxaris, when he told her the real truth. Cyrus hearing of her despair, went himself to comfort her, and assured her that Anaxaris told him no more concerning Spitridates, then he had told her: But to testifie how much he valued the satisfaction of her minde; after good notice taken of the place where Anaxaris left Spitridates, he sent for the Prince of Paphlagonia, and desired him that he would send one of his men, to know exactly what was become of that illustrious Prince. Araminta rendered thanks unto Cyrus with as much civility as her sorrows would give her leave. The Queen of Susiana had also an extraordinary care of her. Cleonice and all her friends never left her; and except Phraartes, all the world did participate of her sorrows. Until this accident unto Spitridates, she was as civil unto him, as afterwards she was unto Anaxaris, when she knew he was his preserver: But she began to treat him much worse then usual, imagining that it was by reason of him that Spitridates had named her Perfidious.

Thus the malignant joy which Phraartes had at the misfortune of his Rival, lasted not long; but he endured all the torments that Love and Jealousie could inflict upon him. In the mean while, Cyrus, the King of Assiria, and Prince Artamas began to be exceedingly impatient that they received no intelligence from the friends of Menecus, nor from those of Timocreon at Ephesus and Sardis; but afterwards their expectations were answered, and those they expected being returned, they understood that the setting forth of the Princesses was deferred for eight days, precisely nominating the day and hour they were to set out; naming also the Troops which were to guard them, and describing every circumstance with such particularities, that if these Princes did but justly observe their true measures, their enterprize must needs take effect; yet there was some dispute did arise amongst them, concerning the execution of the business: For the Prince Artamas, who was very well acquainted with the Country, was of opinion to divide their Troops, and place of one part of them in a wood by which the Princesses were to pass, and to hide the rest behinde a hill which was full of Trees, and which was upon the left hand of the plain, which the high-way between Ephesus and Sardis doth cross; to the end, that when the Coaches are just between the wood and the hill; and almost over against the Castle of Hermes, where also some men should be left, they might com|pass about the King of Pontus, by cutting off his passages on all sides, and might get the Princesses over the River, almost before their enemies knew where they were. Cyrus understanding the scituation of the place better then the King of Assiria, did concur with the opinion of Artamas; but the King of Assiria was of a contrary opinion, and thought that the dividing of their Troops was the way to be vanquished one after the other; and therefore more expedient to keep in one body, and give a sudden and violent assault, then to have any recourse unto stratagems. The Prince Artamas held constant to his opinion, and Cyrus confirmed it with many reasons; but this violent Prince still obstinately opposing them, there was a very strong contest among them. Ligdamis was called to the Counsel, as one that knew the Countrey best, and as one that was well known Page 347 in military affairs; but as the happiness or misery of three great Princes did depend upon this business, he was somewhat nice in giving his opinion; so that not delivering himself absolutely, though he inclined to the opinion of Cyrus and Artamas, the King of Assiria grew more opinionative and hot then before; so that it was resolved to send Chri[s]antes beyond the River, to take notice of the advantages and disadvantages of the places which they were to possess, and when he had well observed them to give his advice upon the matter.

But this course was no sooner resolved upon, then the King of Assiria said he would trust no eyes but his own, in a business whereupon the Liberty of Mandana depended; and therefore he would go himself with Chrisantes and Ligdamis, to see whether they were in the right or wrong. The King of Assiria had no sooner said so, but the great soul of Cyrus not being able to endure that his Rival should ever lay it in his dish, that he exposed himself the most for the liberty of Mandana, did contest no more, though he knew it was against the rules of Prudence, and to no purpose, yet he told the King of Assiria that he would go also; the Prince Artamas also would needs be one of the party, and let them see how he thought of the business. Their departure was resolved upon to be that very same night, in common arms; and that they should carry only two hundred horse with them, to leave them near the Castle of Hermes, and pass over only with fifty to view the place which Artamas maintained to be the most convenient for placing of men.

This course being resolved upon, Cyrus sent for the King of Phrygia, and committed the care of all things unto him, telling all the rest of his Captains, that he was gone only to visit several quarters of the Army: Yet the matter could not be so closely carried, but some suspected some other design, which they would not publish; so that Tygarnes and Phraartes keeping continually about Cyrus, and not leaving him, he was constrained to impart the business unto them, telling them, that if his design had been to fight, he would not have gone without them; but their business being only to view a place to fight on, he would spare them the pains of a journey wherein no honour was to be got: Yet notwithstanding, they were so importunate with him, that he consented. Aglatidas, Chrisantes, Adusius, Feraulas, Ligdamis, Cosicles, Tegeus and Artabases went also; the stranger Anaxaris hearing of an expedition, asked leave to follow, and he could not refuse him. Assoon as night was come, they set out; and made choice of that time, to the end the Spyes which Cressus had in the Army, could not give any intelligence which way Cyrus went. Ligdamis and Sosicles only went first to prepare his father to give a passage over the River for fifty men; and all the Princes did so order their march, that they arrived within four furlongs of the Castle of Hermes two hours before day-break the next morning, where they made a halt according to the agreement with Ligdamis, who came unto them within a quarter of an hour after, and told Cyrus that all was in readiness to receive him: But since there was a necessity of day light for that business, they thought best to rest in the Castle till night was gone. Cyrus, and all the Princes which accompanied him, went then into the Castle of Hermes, where they were received without any ceremony, lest the business should be known unto the souldiers, who were made believe that they were the men of Cressus disguised, who came to view one of the quarters of Cyrus, and would pass over the River in that place; not but that the Souldiers were very affectionate unto that Governor, but because they would not run any hazard: So that Cyrus staid a long while in the Castle of Hermes, as one that was a Captain unto Cressus.

As soon as the sun was up, Cyrus took horse, followed by the King of Assiria, Prince Artamas, Tygranes, Phraartes, Aglatidas, Anaxaris, Feraulas, Artabases, Ligdamis, Chrisantes, Adusius, Sosicles, Tegeus, and fifty Cavaliers for that guard, who went to see the place where ere long they hoped to release Mandana. The Prince Artamas, to let the King of Assiria see he was in the right, marched between Cyrus and him, and as soon as they were over the bridge, shewed them with his hand the hill that was full of trees, on the side of the high-way; the wood which was on the right hand, and the way from Ephesus, which went on their right hand; shewing them so clearly, that what he had proposed was most expedient, that if the King of Assiria did not approve of it, then it was more out of obstinacy then reason.

Chrisantes, who was a man expert in such things, said, to second the opinion of Artamas, That the enterprise could not be executed any other way; because if the first Troops Page 348 which convoyed the Princesses should spie such a considerable body of men together, as theirs should be if they were all joyned, then they would acquaint the King of Pontus with it in an instant, by passing the word from Rank to Rank, until it reached him; and then, since his design is not to gain a victory, but only to preserve the Princesses whom he loves, he will cause them to turn back, whilst he himself is facing us with all his Troops. So that unless an Ambuscado be placed in such a manner as the Prince Artamas proposed, there was little hopes of any good success in the enterprise. Yet notwithstanding, the King of Assyria would not agree, but said, that those which came from Ephesus might easily discover the Souldiers which were behind the hill: And though it was observed unto him, that the way from that side was all low ground, and the hill before them making a demi[ro]und, it was impossible to discover any men behind it; yet needs would he go thither, and all the rest followed him. After Artamas shewed him his error, and had viewed the Hill, they went also into the Wood, and wandred far in it to know all the passes and advenues; Chrisantes telling them, that they must consider as well what to do in case they were vanquished, as if they did vanquish; and they had not stayed so long in this Wood, had it not been for this reason. But the Prince Artamas propounding it requisite, that the Father of Ligdamis was to provide a Boat to stand in that place where the Wood reached to the River, to the end that in case the Enemies should become masters of the Bridge, yet they might that way convey over the Princesses: This proposition seeming good, they went to seek out for a Boat which was a great distance from thence, because the River in that place was serpentine, and turned and winded very much. Then said the King of Assyria, There is a necessity of having Boats. To which Ligdamis replied, that since Cressus resolved upon a war, there was none left upon the River, except one which the Governour kept.

But whilst they were thus reasoning upon an enterprise, which would ere long be enterprised, and Cyrus was entertaining himself with the pleasing thought of being ere long Mandana's Deliverer; the Governour of the Castle at Hermes, who for the safety of so many illustrious persons had set a Sentinel upon the top of the Tower, was advertised that there appeared a great body of Cavalry coming from towards Ephesus, he no sooner heard of this, but he dispatched one of his men immediately into the Wood to acquaint the Princes with it, giving orders unto the messenger to tell Ligdamis he might carry them into the Thick of the Wood towards the river, where they might be in safety till these Forces were passed by, which as he thought were going unto the banks of Pactolus, where Cressus had appointed his general rendezvouz. This messenger obeying his master, and making all haste, went into the wood to seek for Cyrus: But whether it was out of some fears that he apprehended, or that he was unacquainted with the ways where in probability he might find him; he so wildred himself in the wood, that Cyrus had no intelligence from him. So that this Prince and all his Company took into the Plain, intending to march over it towards the Castle of Hermes again. But he was exceedingly surprised to see a great body of Horse marching: And following the motions of his courageous soul, in lieu of stopping he advanced before the rest; and was no sooner entred into the Plain, but he espied a squadron of Horse some fifty paces from him, and likewise he saw Souldiers between him and the Castle of Hermes, and all the Champaign full of Cavalry and Infantry. This undaunted soul still did never tremble, nor was the least moved at this inevitable danger; but in lieu of any hasty retreat into the wood, his first action was to stay, his second was to turn his head about and see whether he was followed; and I know not whether his third action would not have been to have sought out a desperate death amongst them, if the Prince Artamas, Tigranes, and Phraartes had not forced him to take into the wood by a way which Ligdamis had shewed them. Yet could he not get far into it; for since the Lydian Troops had spied them, he who commanded in chief, after he had caused the Body which he commanded to make a halt, he came himself with a hundred Horse to know what they were, not conceiving them to be Enemies, because he could not imagine how Cyrus should pass over the river. However, not to neglect any thing, he went forward; and was no sooner twenty paces within the wood, which was thin in that place, but he perfectly perceived they were no Lydians, and moreover observed they were no great number. So that going after them, and giving orders for those in the Plain to follow, he was presently so neer as to fall on, whilst Cyrus marching last, as he that had least desire to flie, would never so much as turn his head, or offer to take his sword in hand, hoping by this courageous action to make their retreat more easie: But at last, Page 349 Cyrus turning suddenly towards the Lydian Captain who marched in the head of his men, did run his horse so furiously against him, and fell upon him in so courageous a manner that he forced him to retreat a little: All his men made a sudden stop; and Cyrus <◇> condoning his first blow with another which made a river of blood to follow it, then endeavouring the retreat of his friends, he found himself compassed about with enemies on all sides, without any hopes of escaping: He killed one immediately; but the multitude had certainly smothered him, if Feraulas by good fortune turning his head, and seeing Cyrus in that danger, had not called Chrisantes to his relief, who with the Prince Tigranes, Phraartes, Anaxaris, Aglatidas, Ligdamis, and many others, went unto him; as for the King of Assyria, who marched a long way before with the Prince Artamas, and the rest, they were assaulted by another body of enemies, who were sent to cut off their passages. Never was such a thing heard of, as passed in this wood; for Cyrus knowing that the liberty of Mandana did depend upon him and his life, bestirred himself like a Lyon; none who assaulted him escaped, and few who he fell upon could be so quick as to flie, or so ready as to guard themselves, or so valiant as to resist: So that there was very few of all them that were about him, which did not feel the weight of his arm: The valour of Tygranes was very notable, as well as that of Phraartes; the stranger Anaxaris behaved himself so, that Cyrus saw he was the most valiant man in the world; Aglatidas, Ligdamis, Chrisantes, Feraulas, all of them did shew such testimonies of prodigious courage to save the life of their illustrious Master, that it is unexpressable. The more the number of their enemies encreased, the more did the valour of Cyrus double; he turned and winded amongst the trees, with such admirable dexterity, and his horse being so ob[e]dient unto his hand, did so well second his intentions that he could divers times have saved himself, if he would have left his friends engaged; but his great soul could not consent unto such a thought, but he would still fight it out, though there was no hopes of vanquishing.

In less then a quarter of an hour, he made great heaps of dead bodies, all the bulks of trees were bloody, the green grass was turned red, and the ground was all blood. All the Cavaliers which followed him, had perished at this bout, and certainly he had done so himself, if the Gods had not by their supreme Power preserved him. After he had sought a long time, and seeing none about him but Tigranes, Phraartes, Aglatidas, Chrisantes, Ligdamis, Anaxaris, and Feraulas, his valour encreased; but the number of his ene[m]ies still encreased, and one amongst them intending to kill his horse, did thrust his sword through his flank; so that this illustrious Prince could not possibly hold him, for this fulrious animal finding himself wounded, he ran away with his Rider whether he would or no through the thick of trees and enemies, some twenty paces off, where falling down dead, Cyrus had much ado to recover himself from under him: but having at last disen[g]aged himself, he perceived that he had nothing in his hand but the stump of a sword, for it was broken against the bulk of a tree, when his horse ran furiously away with him; then being in an instant compassed about with a multitude of enemies, the Conquerour of many Nations must needs be once conquered; yet did he offer to defend himself, but all in vain, for they tumultuously fell upon him, and took him Prisoner, he having not received one wound. Tigranes, Phraartes, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, Anaxaris and Feraulas, seeing that Cyrus was taken, and that it was absolutely impossible to think of releasing, they began to think of saving themselves by flight if they could, all but Feraulas, who suffered himself to be taken, that he might be a partaker in his Masters misfortune: But the rest onely defending themselves, and retreating towards the thick of the wood, they fled away so happily, that they who followed them hearing a great noise in the place where the King of Assyria and the Prince Artamas were fighting, they made a stop, searling some ambuscado; during which, they got into the thick of the wood, and hid them[selves] until night, all but Anaxaris, who by the stumbling of his horse, was taken: Howlever, the King of Assyria, the Prince Artamas, Artabases, Adusius Sosicles, Tegeus, and those Cavaliers which were with him, had made such a miraculous resistance, and had killed so very many Lydians, that their own valour was their ruine; for those against whom they fought, seeing what kinde of men they had to deal withal, sent for fresh supplies: So that seeing on all sides enemies upon enemies; and that the more they killed, the more they had to fight withal, they thought of selling their lives at as dear a rate as they could, especially Artamas: for besides the general interest which they all had not to be taken, he had a particular reason not to fall into the hands of Cressus: Sosicles and T[eg]eus might Page 350 have the same apprehensions, but yet they were not so deeply concerned as Artamas. However, that fatal Destiny could not be avoided; for after he had received a wound in his <...> ght arm, and in three other places besides, he was forced to yield himself. The King of Assyria also was surrounded with so many men, and was taken Prisoner; so likewise were Sosicles and Tegeus; Artabases and Adusius only escaped this dangerous adventure. These two Combates then being thus ended, and all the Lydians which had fought met, and having put the Prisoners which they had taken together, Cyrus, Anaxaris and Feraulas were much surprised, when they saw the King of Assyria, Sosicles, Tegeus, and some o[th]er of their Cavaliers in the same condition: as for the Prince Artamas, he was so wound[ed], that he could not be brought.

In the mean time, these two illustrious Rivals seeing the equality of their fortunes, were both of them both sad and glad. Glad, because a Rival was no happier then himself; sad, because Mandana was without a Protector, especially since the Prince Artamas was both taken and wounded: They were also very much grieved to see that he was known by two Lydian Captains, who had a good desire to have saved him, but durst not. Then they went to advertise him who commanded in chief, and to give him some testimonies of their victory, they carried with them the Prisoners which they had taken; that is to say, Cyrus, the King of Assyria, Anaxaris, Tegeus, Sosicles, Ferulas, and some Cavaliers. At their coming out of the wood, Cyrus and the King of Assyria viewed all their forces which were drawn up in the plain: and as they went, these two Rivals observing by their manner of using them, that they did not know them, did agree together not to discover each other, in case they could finde ways to escape; and finding an opportunity to hint the same unto Feraulas, as he was witty, so he made it known unto the rest of the Prisoners, hoping that not being known, they would be more negligent in guarding them, and so they might perhaps recover their liberty.

Yet Cyrus did extremely fear to be carried unto the King of Pontus; and when he remembered how oft he had conquered him, and how that Prince had been his Prisoner, the present condition of his fortune was most insupportable unto him; yet he marched on, though he knew not whether they would conduct him. The King of Assyria asked the question of a Lydian Souldier, who answered, that they were to be carried unto Andramites, who in absence of the King of Pontus commanded in chief; and as he was enquiring more precisely into things, an Officer came and broke off their discourse, imagining that the King of Assyria was suborning the Souldier to further his escape. After this, they marched, and were not permitted to speak so much as to one another, each of them contemplating upon his own misfortune.

Cyrus was so generous, as not to upbraid the King of Assyria for being the cause of their misfortune, since but for him they had not come unto that place where they were taken: Mean while, they marched on, and at last came unto the place where Andramites was, who knew Tegeus and Sosicles as soon as he saw them; so that not looking much upon any others; I think my self very unhappy (said he unto them, for he was one of their friends) that you should fall into my hands: but since you know what belongs unto honor, I hope you will not think it strange that I should speak unto you as Prisoners of War, and not as unto my friends; therefore I pray tell me what you were doing in the wood, what number of men you had, and what was Prince Artamas his business, whom I know is wounded, and a Prisoner. We cannot tell you (answered Sosicles very prudently) what was the design of Prince Artamas, for we only followed him, and never enquired further; but we can very well assure you his design cannot be very dangerous, since he had only fifty horses with him: And I do verily believe his designs were rather intentions to promote peace then war. But where passed you over the River? (asked Andramites.) Since I will not prejudice that Prince whom now I serve (answered Sosicles, you must excuse me, if I do not tell you where we passed over. But where is Cyrus? asked Andramites. I saw him in the Camp yesterday, when we came away (answered Tegeus, seeing Sosicles not answer quickly.) After this, Andramites having bestowed a civil complement upon them, commanded an Ephesian Captain to guard them: Afterwards, looking upon the other Prisoners, he found something so great in the aspect of Cyrus, the King of Assyria and Anaxaris, though their arms and habit was very mean, that he called Tegeus again, to ask him of what quality these Prisoners were? And as he answered, that they were only common Cavaliers: If all the rest in your Army were such, said he unto him, Cressus will most infallibly lose the first battel he shall fight; for I must needs confess, he hath none such.

Page 351 After this, he commanded that the Chyrurgion belonging to the Army should go unto Prince Artamas, and consider which was the best way to carry him: For since he knew that Cressus held the Governor of the Castle of Hermes in suspection, therefore he durst not go thither, lest he should render himself suspected; so that resolving he should be carried unto some place nearer Sardis; and understanding that his danger was not great, he commanded the Troops to march. All the Troops then beginning to advance, and all the Prisoners yet staying for want of horses, because their own were either killed or taken by such Souldiers as could not be found, they saw appear many Coaches, in which were many women: This sight made the hearts of Cyrus and the King of Assyria to beat; and both of them advancing at once towards the way side, by which these Coaches were to pass: But when they espyed Mandana there, O heavens! what were their thoughts? their souls were disordered, their hearts trembled, and were so transported, that they thought to discover themselves, and if shame to appear before Mandana in such a condition, had not restrained them; certainly they had staid the Coach, and done some act as bold, as their loves were violent. But the thing which most of all disordered their reason, was, that whilst the Princess Palmis, next to whom Mandana did sit, was speaking unto Andramites on the one side of the Coach, Mandana did cast her eyes upon these Prisoners; so that knowing Cyrus and the King of Assyria, she could not possibly chuse but cry out; which reaching the ears of these two Rivals, produced different effects, though sad in both: However, the Princess Palmis turning herself at the cry which Mandana made, and asking her what she had seen which caused her so to do, that prudent Princess imagining notwithstanding the disorder of her soul, that Cyrus was not known, considering the condition wherein he was, did ask the Princess Palmis pardon for it: But, said she unto her, I could not chuse but be very much moved, when I saw a man amongst the Prisoners, who had served the King my father in a time when I thought my self very happy: In the mean time, Mandana seeing their Coach went, on still, desired the Princess Palmis, to obtain of Andramites the liberty of this Cavalier, not daring then to tell the truth unto the Princess, lest she should be overheard. Palmis desiring nothing more then to oblige Mandana, desired Andramites to let the Coach stay, and this Lieutenant General obeyed her: Then did she entreat him to do her the favour to give unto her one Cavalier which Manda saw among the Prisoners, which he had taken. Madam, said he unto her, you know I ought not to do it. I know very well, said she, that according to the exact and strict rules of war, you are bound to deny me; but withal, I know, that being as I am. you ought to grant me all that is not prejudicial to the King: And you know Andramites, that one simple Cavalier can neither win nor lose a battel. But be it as it will be, said she, I ask him of you; and I promise you the Prince Myrsiles shall recompence it, since I cannot (as the present condition with me is) do it my self. Whilst this Princess was speaking unto Andramites, Mandana looked out on the other side, towards the illustrious Cyrus, who advancing still forward, did both see, and was seen by her.

In the mean while, the Princess Palmis was so urgent with Andramites for the liberty of this Cavalier, that he began to consent, and asked which it was: Then Mandana, both by her words, and pointing her hand, shewing him, and speaking so prudently, that in the end Andramites not being able to deny the daughter of his King so small a favour, was ready to resolve upon it; yet remembering what prodious valour his men reported to be in this Cavalier, he pawed a while, and told the Princess Palmis, to excuse himself, that the courage of this man was so great, that even Cyrus, of whom fame did trumpet so many miracles, could not do more.

But in conclusion, apprehending that this Princess (if Cressus should dye, might be revenged on him) he resolved to satisfy her desire: So that causing Cyrus to come near, without telling him why he brought him to that side where Mandana was, Valiant man, said Andramites unto him, render thanks unto this Prince for the liberty which she hath obtained for you. Cyrus was so surprized at this language from Andramites, that he never thought of an answer; for being so near Mandana, & not daring to speak his real thoughts, nor hardly to look upon her, his spirits were not so free as to behave himself as at other times: yet striving with himself, he saluted the Princess with a most humble Conge, and according to the counsel of Andramites by way of thanks, Madam, said he unto her, I do not know what terms to use, which can sufficiently speak my thanks; and if you judge of my resentments by my words, you have cause to think me ungrateful. You have so faithful Page 352 ly served the King my father, replied Mandana, that I have more reason to acknowledge your benefits then you mine: However (added she, extremely desiring he should be gone, lest he should be known, and yet unwilling to lose the sight of him so soon) fail not as soon as you are returned to the Camp, to let the King my father know, by the first post which goes to Ecbatan, that I will be ever what I ought to be; and that I will never do any thing which shall be unworthy of the honour to be his daughter. I shall not fail, Madam, replied he; But since I fear I shall not be able to obey you any way, but by the Post which Cyrus sends, therefore unless I have some message unto him, he has some reason not to believe me. Tell him from me, said she unto him, that I am very sorry he should so often expose himself unto dangers, as he does for my sake; and I think (said she, and blushed) that Andramites will permit me to entreat that illustrious Prince to do so no more. I should be glad, said Andramites, and smiled, that this Cavalier could persuade him unto it; but I think he will have a hard task to do it. But, Madam, it is time to march, unless you will put yourself unto the inconveniency of night. In the mean time, this Cavalier may pass the River when and where he pleases, for I will give him a horse and a Passport. The Princess thanking Andramites for his civility, turned towards Cyrus, whose mind was so troubled, that he hardly knew whether or no what he saw was true. But whilst Andramites was talking unto one of his men: Will you be pleased to command me any other service, Madam? (said he unto Mandana) I desire you, said she unto him, that you make good use of that liberty which I have obtained for you. Afterwards, Andramites came to them, and desired the Princess they would be pleased to march; and so they did, Mandana looking upon Cyrus as long as she could, with eyes swimming in tears; and Cyrus looking after the Coach, as long as ever he could see it. All this while, the King of Assyria was in intollerable torment to see Cyrus called unto the Coach, and not himself: he was above twenty times ready to have told his name, and if resentment of honour and love had not restrained him, he had infallibly done it: he would needs come up to the Coach also, but his guards stopt him, and Feraulas also did wittily dissuade him. But when Cyrus came to him with the horse and pass port which Andramites gave him, and told him that he was at liberty, his sorrow was so excessive, that he was speechless. Is it the Princess Mandana (said he very low unto him, after he was returned out of his amazed silence) that hath obtained your liberty? It was the Princess Palmis (replied Cyrus) who at her request, did move Andramites to give it unto me. O ye Gods (cried out the King of Assyria, and lifted his eyes up to heaven) is it by the way of slavery you intend to keep your promises with me, and make me happy? Cyrus, who did not understand the sense of these words, because he was ignorant of the Oracle which this Prince received at Babylon, turned himself towards Anaxaris, and told him, he was very sorry that this first adventure they were in together, should prove so unfortunate; but he desired him to be confident, that he would endeavour all imaginable ways to procure his liberty.

Afterwards he addressed some civilities to Sosicles and Tegeus, then drawing Feraulas aside, he conjured him in his captivity, to make himself known unto Mandana, and to let her see him as oft as possible, to the end she might the oftener think upon him. Feraulas promising not to fail, and they who guarded the Prisoners saying they must depart, Cyrus came near the King of Assyria, and most generously told him, that he would endeavour his liberty with as much earnestness, as if he were one of his dearest friends, and that at the last he would most punctually keep his word with him. But withal, said he, be sure you keep yours: Alas, what can a man in chains do? replied he. You are to be near Mandana, said Cyrus unto him; and I know not whether it be more advantageous to be a captive upon that condition, or to be at liberty, and be at a distance from her. After these words, these two illustrious Rivals parted, Cyrus taking his way towards the Castle of Hermes with his Pass-port, as if he had stood in need of it, and the Prisoners going towards Sardis, upon such horses as were given them. The King of Assyria at parting from Cyrus, did apprehend such joy, as for a while kept his minde in much serenity: for when he looked before him, he saw the Coach wherein Mandana was: and when he looked behinde him, he saw his Rival going further from her, and to pass over that River which would separate them for a long while: So that though he was a Prisoner, he would rather chuse that quality in following Mandana, then liberty with Cyrus at a great distance; yet these pleasing thoughts did not last long, but on the contrary, passing from one extremity unto another, he looked upon himself as the most miserable Page 353 man alive, and upon Cyrus as the most happy. Who did ever meet with an adventure, said he to himself, so cruel as mine is? for I have not only the misery of being a Prisoner, but also to see my Rival released, and released by one who makes his liberty insupportable unto me.

Does it not seem as if fortune did make him a Captive only to receive the greater testimony of Mandana's affection? and to let me receive the most horrible sign of her aversion, that possibly could be expressed? for most certainly, she saw me as well as she saw Cyrus. Was ever such a piece of inhumanity as this seen? She sees me a Prisoner, and a Prisoner for her cause; and yet in lieu of asking liberty for both, she hath released my Rival only, and loaded me with chains: Though she would not consider me out of any love to me, yet she might well have done it out of love to himself, since my valour is not altogether useless unto Cyrus for her deliverance. But inhumane woman that she is, she has forced me to believe by this act, that nothing can overcome her. And yet the Gods have promised me that I shall make her sigh and mourn for all her cruelty, and that I shall be at rest: But which way is it possible to come to pass?

Whilst this tumultuous minded Prince was in these contemplations, Anaxaris endured his misfortune with much constancy; telling Tegeus, after he had seen Mandana, that he did not now wonder that her beauty should cause so great and long a war. Feraulas, though he was much vexed that he had not yet got a sight of Martesia, because she did sit on the other side of the Coach, yet began already to project how there might be intelligence between Cyrus and himself. Tegeus, who had got sight of Cylenisa, and was known unto her, did think more of that pleasing object; then of any danger he was in: But as for Sosicles, his thoughts ran all upon Prince Artamas, whose pitiful adventure he did not yet know of. In the mean time Mandana was no sooner out of sight of her unfortunate Cyrus, but turning towards the Princess Palmis, Dare I tell you, said she in a low voice unto her, that you have given liberty unto that illustrious Prince who only can make me either miserable or happy? How, said the Princess Palmis also in a low voice, was I so happy as to release the invincible Cyrus? I wish to the Gods that the Prince Artamas have no worse destiny than his. As soon as she had said these words, Andramites came unto the Princesses, who had been speaking with a man who came to tell him that the Prince Artamas could not be carried any wayes but in a coach; and he desired these Princesses, that they would be pleased to let their women press close in one coach, and permit a Prisoner of quality, who was much wounded, to go in the other.

Andramites had no sooner said so, but the Princess Palmis began to change colour, and asked him the name of this Prisoner: but as he did not give her a direct answer, as if he were unwilling to tell her, she knew it was the Prince Artamas. So that looking out of the Coach as it was entering into the Wood, she saw the Prince Artamas lying at the root of a Tree, his head upon a Buckler, and his Scarf which held up his right arm bloody in divers places; his Complexion by reason of the loss of blood was wondrous pale; and his eyes then being shut, she thought him dead. Ah Andramites, (said she aloud, making a sign with her hand to stay the Coach) how dare you look upon me, since your men have killed one of the most illustrious Princes in the world? The Princess Palmis spoke these words so high, that Prince Artamas heard her voice, and knew it at the first: Then he did not only open his eyes, but lifted up his head also; and leaning upon his left arm, he offered to get up, looking most earnestly upon her whose voice he heard. But the Coach staying, and Palmis going hastily out, she was with him almost as soon as he heard her voice, or had opened his eyes: But alas, how sad was this sight? I ask you pardon, Madam, said this wounded Prince (as soon as he saw her near him) that I am not able to render you those respects I owe; and for having so ill defended that Life, which might perhaps have been serviceable in procuring your Liberty. It is I who ought to ask pardon, replied she, for being the cause of your miseries and wounds, though I did most devoutly pray unto the Gods for your preservation; who though they would not make me miserable in my own person, yet do most severely torture me in yours. Your Expressions, Madam, replied he, make me most happy; and since you are pleased to be a sharer in my misery, let all be converted into joy, since most certainly I shall die without any sorrow. I had rather you would think of living, replied she, though it were only for my sake who cannot live without you. Palmis expressed these words with such earnestness of affection, that they made herself blush, and look about to see whether any Page 352 <1 page duplicate> Page 353 <1 page duplicate> Page 354 heard her: So that seeing the Princess Mandana and all the rest of the women behind her did ask her pardon for so rudely leaving her; and Artamas knowing by it that she was the Princess Mandana, expressed such a Complement unto that Princess, as it appeared he knew the Passion of Cyrus to be most violent: but since he was ignorant of that Prince's adventure, he began to speak as if he were a Prisoner; untill Palmis made a sign he should be silent, and interrupted him by asking whether he could endure the joggling of a Coach?

In the meanwhile Andramites fretting, and fearing if his indulgence should come to the ear of Cressus, he would be angry, beseeched the Princesses not to trouble Artamas any longer, but to lend him one of their Coaches, since it was fit he should be in some place where he might rest himself. Though the Princess knew he had some other reason for what he said, then what he expressed, yet they were contented to satisfy him, and depart from Artamas. I beseech the Gods, Madam, (said he unto her) that either my life or my death may conduce unto your Liberty. And I beseech them (said she, and held her hand out unto him) that I may rather spend all my life in tears for my own misfortunes, then have any cause to shed them for your death: Live therefore, Artamas, if you would have me live; and neglect nothing that may conduce to your preservation. Artamas then most respectfully taking that fair and dear hand which she presented unto him, and looking upon her in such a manner as if he would ask leave to kiss it, he saw she blushed, and gently pulling it back, she silently told him that she should content herself with that favour which she had already done him. So that saluting her with as much reverence as his wounds would permit him, he saw her depart with her eyes full of tears, which she could no way hide but by pulling down her hood. Yet would she not have her Coach to move, untill she saw Prince Artamas in that which was to carry him unto the next Town, which was not above fifty furlongs from thence; Andramites having no mind to carry him unto the Castle of Hermes, because of the friendship that was between Ligdamis and that Prince.

After this, the Princess Mandana and the Princess Palmis began to deplore their misfortunes, and to impart their most secret thoughts. In the mean while Ligdamis, who had carried Tigranes, Phraartes, and Chrisantes unto a corner of the Wood where they stayed with much impatience for night, bethought himself of the best wayes to conduct them unto the Castle of Hermes, and there to advise upon the best course for Cyrus, whose imprisonment extremely troubled them. Whilst they were in this condition, they heard a noise, and thought themselves discovered: but as good fortune was, it proved to be Artabases and Adusias, who seeking to hide themselves did meet with them. Yet their joy to see one another was qualified, when both sides made a relation to each other of the accidents which had happened: For Ligdamis telling Artabases that Cyrus was taken, he was almost desperate: And Adusias telling Tigranes that the King of Assyria was also taken; and Ligdamis, that the Prince Artamas was both taken and wounded, they did nothing but make a mixture of sorrows among themselves. But night at last being come, and Ligdamis, who was well acquainted with all the turns of the wood, being gone to: see whether they might all come out in safety, found that all the Troops were gone, and the coast very clear; so that he presently returned to his friends, and brought them safe to the Castle of Hermes, where they had the comfort to find the illustrious Cyrus, who resolved to stay there that night; but they found him so sad, as their joyes were much mitigated. The sight of Mandana a Captive did so disorder his heart, that he could take no delight in that liberty which was given him; but when he parted from his Rival, he envied him, because he could not part from him but by going further from Mandana. And as soon as he came to the Castle of Hermes, considering his adventure more exactly, the more he envied his Enemy. Yet sometimes he could not well reconcile his own resentments; he no sooner apprehended one thing, but he smothered another; yet he always concluded himself the most unfortunate man alive, and much more unfortunate than his Rival, although he was a prisoner. What good has the gaining of so many battels done me? said he; so many Towns taken, so many Provinces reduced, so many Kings conquered? They have indeed got me a little noise in the world, but they have not all released Mandana, for whom only I made the war. I do not find the glory that I desire; I do not meet with Mandana, but only for her to release me, and not I her. Most miserable Cyrus! (cried he out) why dost thou not dye of shame to appear before thy Princess in such a despicable condition as thou didst? Hast thou not good cause to fear that she released Page 355 thee only, to remove out of her sight an object that was worthy of nothing but her scorn? how canst thou suffer her to release thee, who aspires unto the glory of being her deliverer? There is a necessity of death upon thee; the excess of love and shame must make thee rather receive thy freedom from death, than from Mandana. But how can I dye (said he and reprehended himself) when as I have seen her whom I so much desired to see? and has seen her so admirably fair, and so infinitely generous? Hitherto I was a debtor unto the illustrious Mandana, only for some good intentions, and some favourable words; but now, by this adventure, she has given me that which is the most precious thing in the world, my Liberty: She has so loaded me with obligations, that a million of services cannot repay my debt; no, though I should dye ten millions of deaths: She has kept me from falling into the power of my Rival and my enemy: She has put me into some hopes of breaking her chains: what would I have more? ought I not to be fully satisfied with my journey? It is true, many of my illustrious friends are Prisoners; but to my comfort, so is my most terrible Rival also; and I shall be delivered from the sight of a Prince, whom I shall be glad to see no more, untill Mandana be out of Captivity, and then see him with a sword in his hands.

But why do I rejoyce at that which ought to grieve me? since certainly it would be more advantageous to me to have the King of Assyria at liberty, and in my Army, then a Prisoner with Mandana; and it would be more tolerable unto me to see him continually, then to know that he is continually in the sight of Mandana; for the King of Assyria will be known, as soon as he is at Sardis; and as soon as he is known, Cressus will treat him as a Prince of his quality ought to be, let the King of Pontus his Rival do what he can.

Thus will this happy Captive see the fair and illustrious Mandana; and whilst I am tumultuating for the liberty of them both, and loaded with chains as he is, he will perhaps win the heart of my Princess, and take from me the sweet fruits of all my Conquests: And if so, what good will all my Conquests do me? And though I should overcome Cressus, and take Sardis, and deliver only unconstant Mandana, can I be at all happy? or if I should fight with a loved Rival, can I ever have force enough to overcome him? or so much as desire a victory, since I am certain to have no share in Mandana's affection? Yes, yes, I will yet desire to conquer, though that cruel chance do happen; and I will not think my self absolutely miserable, if I can but outlive my enemy. But why (said this grieved Prince) do I torment my self with imaginary miseries, since I have so many real ones to complain of? Is it not enough that I have lost my hopes of releasing Mandana so soon as I thought, but I must further persecute my self? Yet would I gladly know whether Mandana, who could not chuse but know the King of Assyria, did forbear asking his liberty for the love of me, or for the love of him; and gladly would I know, whether the reason why she asked mine, was only to set me further from her. Yet methought her words and her looks were so obliging, as I need not doubt that she is the same she was at Sinope and Themiscira. But yet her beauty is the same, so that I have cause to fear her heart is altered; for if it were true that she did at all love me, she could not possibly but be sensible of my miseries; and then it is impossible she should preserve her beauty so well, amidst so many causes of sorrow, if they were not sweetened by some consolations which I understand not.

Then the jealousy of Cyrus changing object, the rare qualities of the King of Pontus began to trouble him, and presently after the King of Assyria came into his fancy: but however, his mind did change objects, his sorrow still continued constant, and he could not any ways comfort up himself, because in lieu of his releasing Mandana, she had released him. Cyrus past over all the rest of the night in such turbulent agitations of mind as these; and he could not understand how it should come to pass that the King of Pontus did not himself conduct these Princesses: or how the friends of Meneceus and Timocreon had given them such false intelligence concerning the setting out of the Princesses. But he understood from the Governour of the Castle, who had it from a Captain belonging to Cressus, that their departure was published to be deferred on purpose to deceive any spies which the Prince Artamas should have about them. And that which kept the King of Pontus from being of the Convoy was, because he was gone with another party of Souldiers to a Ferry and a Ford, and to guard that place where in Probability their enemies would pass, and intended to meet them nearer Sardis; and since the place where they were to meet was above fifty furlongs from the Castle of Hermes, he could not be there where the fight was.

Page 356Cyrus apprehending all these circumstances, was much more grieved then before: For he plainly perceived, that if he had received right intelligence, Mandana had most certainly been released: Then did he renew his complaints with more bitterness then before, which yet were interrupted by Artabases, who told him that one of the Cavaliers who had escaped from the fight, had brought him a Table-book which as he said he saw fall out of the King of Assyria's pocket whilst he was fighting, and which after the fight was past he took up. He told him further, that finding something written in it in a language which he understood not, and considering how the interests of the King of Assyria and his were linked together, he used his best endeavours to get it out of the hands of this Cavalier, and bring it unto him, since he knew that he understood the language. Cyrus took the Table-book, and being full of curiosity to see it (for it was Cedar, and very magnificently adorned) after he opened it, he read these lines in the Assyrian language.

The Oracles rendered at the Temple of JUPITER BELUS.

Well mayst thou hope to make her mourn

For all her cruelty and scorn:

Because hereafter in her arms

Thou there shalt find such pleasing charms,
As quite shall terminate thy pain,
And turn thy sorrows into gain.

Whilst Cyrus was reading this Oracle, Chrisantes entred, and knew it presently to be the same which Martesia told him was rendred unto the King of Assyria at Babylon. So that looking upon Artabases in such a manner as let him know he was very desirous to know who gave this Table-book unto Cyrus, and Artabases telling him it was himself; Chrisantes murmured in such a manner, that Cyrus understood what he said, and turning towards him, Did you know of this Oracle, said he unto him, and when it was delivered? Chrisantes something surprised at this question, sought out for a handsom excuse, but could not meet with one: so that he confessed the truth, and told him, that Martesia, Feraulas, and he were resolved to conceal it from him, lest it should be an addition unto his sorrows. Whilst Chrisantes was excusing himself to Cyrus, he was reading this Oracle over again: Afterwards when he had ended it, Is it possible, oh ye just Gods! (cried he out) that a Prince whom you have so long loaded with misfortunes, should be now so much favoured by you as to make Mandana sigh and mourn for him; and that he shall find such charms in the arms of my Princess, as shall terminate all his sorrows? Why (if I may ask it without crime) did you let her hate him, and love me, if you thought him worthy of your protection? or why did you suffer him to be thrown out of his throne? And if I was thought worthy of your favour, why was not he my Conqueror, or why did he not kill me at the first battel?

Sir, said Chrisantes, (and interrupted him) As it is not fit for men to prescribe rules unto the Gods, so it is not fit to dive too far into the exposition of their words. I know it very well, Chrisantes, replied he; but this Oracle is so clear, that there needs no other interpretation, but an expectance of the event. For my part, replied Chrisantes, I do con|ceive it to be more obscure then you think it, since I never heard that the Gods did speak in this manner of future events. Did you never hear of any Prince, replied he, so unfor|tunate as Cyrus? Do you not plainly see that fortune is favourable unto me, only to be the more inhumane, since she does advance me only to throw me down a greater preci|pice? And on the contrary, do you not perceive that she has afflicted my Rival to no other end but to make him more sensible of his happiness, and dejected him purposely to advance him? Do you not indeed observe that all his misfortunes prove advantages to Page 357 him, and conduce unto his happiness? and on the contrary, all my good fortunes are most sensible causes of my misery? For does not his imprisonment bring him neerer her he loves? and does not my liberty carry me further off her whom I adore? It is so long since this Oracle was given, replied Chrisantes, and so little good fortune hath happened unto this Prince since, that methinks he cannot build any great hopes upon such a foundation. Ah Chrisantes, said Cyrus, you dissemble your thoughts to comfort me a little.

As he was saying so, Artabases was said to be come from the King of Phrygia. Alas said Cyrus, and sighed, that Prince does not know that misery is contagious, nor that his illustrious son is wounded and taken prisoner. After this he commanded that Artabases should enter; and asking him what business he had, he told him that the King of Phrygia had sent in all haste to advertise him, that the friends of Tegeus and Timocreon which were in Ephesus and Sardis, had sent word how they were deceived, and that the departure of the Princesses would be sooner then they had formerly writ; so that the King of Phrygia desires to know what course you intend to take. Why, I have no course to take but to die, replied Cyrus. He thought fit also, said Artabases, to advertise you that they sent him word from Sardis, how Cressus depended much upon an Oracle which he had received from Delphos, so that he makes himself sure of victory. Have they sent this Oracle unto Timocreon? asked Cyrus. Yes Sir, answered Artabases, and the King of Phrygia hath sent it unto you. In saying so, he presented it unto him, which he found to be in these words. The Oracle.

Cressus, if to this War he go,
An Empire great shall overthrow.

Oh that it would please the Gods (said Cyrus, after he heard the Oracle read) that I were only to lose Empires and Crowns! if that were all, I should be glad. But alas, since the Gods do promise Mandana to the King of Assyria, and the Empire unto Cressus, what can remain for me? I do not know whether they will leave me a grave, or shew me so much favour as to let me die as gloriously as I have lived: However, I am resolved not to yield without resistance; but if I must lose Mandana, and be conquered by those over whom I have been a Conqueror, it shall be after such a manner as shall let all the Earth know I have not merited my misfortune. But yet though it should be so that the heavens do hate me, yet what hath Ciaxanes done, unto whom the Empire belongs? He, I say, who enjoys the fruits of all my victories? Was there such poysen in my Conquests, that he must perish, because the Gods are pleased to ruine me? Or at the least, would it be just to confound things so together, as in promising Cressus that he shall overthrow a great Empire, that of Ciaxanes must be ruined? Why then I must die, (cried he out) but my death shall cost my Enemies and Rivals very dear. I have hitherto been something wary of my life in hopes of some happiness hereafter; but since there is nothing but miseries and misfortunes to be expected, I will carry it after another manner, and in ruining my self will ruine as many of my Enemies as I can for company, to the end there may be fewer rejoycers at my death. But oh my divine Mandana! what's become of all those favourable words you have bestowed upon me, if the words of the Gods be true? Can I think you did not speak the truth, or must I think your heart is changed?

In saying so, he cast his eyes casually upon Madates and Ortalques, who came with Ar|talan, and yet he did not see them; and they seeing the turbulencie of his spirit, durst not present themselves unto him. As soon as he saw them, I hope you bring me some consolation, said he unto them, and can tell me that the King is well. He is in perfect health, replied Madates: But I left him something troubled, because he had received in|telligence that Thomiris hath raised a puissant Army, and gives out she intends to make as deep a progress into Medea, as the Scythians did under the reign of the first Ciaxares; and to communicate this intelligence unto you, the King was pleased to send me hither. He had better have declared war against me (replied Cyrus most violently) then sent to Page 358 ask my advice: For considering the state of things, I do think that his only way to be happy, is to be my persecutor. But you Ortalques (said he and turned towards him) who hath been consulting with that famous woman who (as all that have seen her say) speaks all truth: Pray let me have her answer; and tell me if you remember what I ap|pointed you to ask her from me? Yes, Sir, replied he, and according to your direc|tions; I asked her when you might hope for any rest. I also told her, you desired her an|swer under her hand; so that she giving me this paper sealed up (said he and presented it unto him) I cannot tell you whether I have brought good or bad fortune to you. How|ever, you may tell me whether this woman be as famous in her own Country (said Cyrus whilst he was opening the paper) as she is in others? Sir, said Ortalques, this Helespontique Sybil is beyond all comparison more famous then all that ever preceded her; and they say she never yet told lye unto any that ever came to consult with her. Let us see then, said Cyrus, what truth she affords me; and then he began to read these words;

The Answer of the HELESFONTIQUE-SYBIL.

It is a Loving enemy,

Will rouse her sleeping hate, I see;

And plunge in blood a Horo's head,

No fate can keep from being dead:

This is his Destiny at best,

In only this thou shalt have rest.

As soon as Cyrus had done reading it, he was a while silent, and afterwards made a sign with his hand that every one should withdraw, except Chrisantes. Then he read over again what he read before, and caused Chrisantes to read it also, who no sooner returned the Paper, which contained this dismal answer, but Cyrus looking upon him: Come Chrisantes, said he unto him, how can you any ways interpret this which you have seen unto my advantage? Sir, replied he, I see it is not easie to give it a favourable sense, yet I do not see which way it is possible this misfortune which threatens you, can come to pass; for this loving enemy cannot possibly be Mandana, it must certainly be Thomiris; so that as the state of things stand, I cannot see it is possible you should dye by her hand; yet she is raising a puissant Army, replied Cyrus; and they say Ciaxares had not sent Madates unto me, but to interpret the answer of that Sybil which Ortalques brought unto me.

I do not understand, replied Chrisantes, that you should quit the War in Lydia, where Mandana is, to go and carry the war unto Massagetes Country where Thomiris is; or if you should, that after you have conquered so many valiant Kings, you can ever be van|quished by a woman. Nor do I my self understand it, answered he, but I understand plainly that my ruine is inevitable: For indeed Chrisantes, both the Gods of Greece, and the Gods of the Assyrians do all presage nothing but dismal Destinies. The Oracle of Babylon gives Mandana to the King of Assyria, the Delphique Oracle promises the Em|pire unto Cressus, if he pursue the war; and the Helespontique Sybil does promise my head unto the Queen of Massagetes: Yet this last menace is not the most terrible to me, for my soul is much more troubled for the loss of Mandana, then for the loss of my life: I have hitherto lived in such a manner as well may afford me some hopes I shall dye with honor, and therefore I fear not the revenge of Thomiris. Let her hate me as long as she pleases, let her arm both the Scythians against me if she can, my soul will not tremble at it: But that Mandana, the most fair, illustrious, divine Mandana should leave loving me, after she hath given me some hopes of an inviolable fidelity; this is most intol|lerable: All my constancy, and all my reason, cannot keep me from expressions of my weak|ness. Were I but assured of Mandana's heart, I would not care one pin for all other mis|fortunes that can be threatened against me: The loss of so many crowns, as in all appear|ances are to fall upon my head, shall not cost me half a tear; though the implacable Thomiris were ready to take off my head, yet I should rejoyce in the hopes of one tear from the fair eyes of my adored Princess. But alas, how can I hope for one moment of rest, considering all that hath hapned in one day unto me? For it is so very apparent by Page 359 the multitude of disasterous adventures which have befallen me in this journey, that the Gods will overwhelm me with miseries, and it were extream folly to retain the least beam of any hope. I come (out of the fantastical humour of my Rival) to view the place where I hope to release my illustrious Mandana, and in lieu of that I am taken Prisoner my self; also the Prince Artamas, who was my only supporter in the War, he is also taken and wounded: Also it is my fortune to see the Divine Mandana; but though she released me, yet she keeps my Rival. I had no sooner got into a place of safety, but the Oracle of Babylon is brought me, which tells me the Gods intend to make my Rival happy; im|mediately after that, I receive another from Delphos, which precipitates me from the highest top of glory, into an abyss of misery; after this, I had hardly breathed, but Ma|dates accosts me with a fresh disaster; and I had no sooner heard his tale, but Ortalques brings me a sentence of death pronounced by the famous Helespontique Sybil: Judge, Chris|santes, if after all these, it is possible I should apprehend the least glimpse of hope: However Chrisantes, I must not merit my misfortunes, I must fight for the liberty of Mandana with as much courage and zeal, as if the gods had not promised her unto my Rival. I must fight al|gainst Cressus with as much magnanimity, as if the oracle had not promised him the Empire; I must also carry my self with as much serenity of soul, as if I were not to be the Victim of Thomiris. See Chrisantes (said this grieved Prince) what I ought to do, and what I will do: but I do not know whether I can or no. My soul is questionless above all ambition, and also above any fear of death: but love is so infinitely predominate over my soul, that I know not whether I can endure the loss of Mandana, if it should happen unto me: But proud Thomiris, unto whom the gods have promised my head; though Mandana do prove perfidious, yet you shall never triumph over me: For I am so assured, that my sorrows for Mandana's inconstancy will be my death, that I never need fear the fury of your hand. After this, Cyrus desired to put in practise those couragious resolutions which he had set unto himself: and therefore commanded Chrisantes not to tell the answer which Ortalques brought unto any, lest the Souldiers should be dismaid, and lose that confidence which does such wonders in war. After this, he went unto Tigranes, Phraartes, and the Governor of the Castle, with whom he conferred about many things which related unto the war, and to the Prince Artamas: Then taking horse the same hour with those two Princes, Chrisantes, Sosicles, Artabases, Adusius, Madates, Ortalques and Ligdamis, who would not leave him, he took those hundred and fifty horse which he had left near the Castle of Hermes, and returned unto the Camp, with a soul so sunk with sorrows, that he could not possibly all the way he went, rid himself one minute from the multitude of these disastrous events: So that Mandana a Captive, Mandana perfidious, and the King of Assyria happy, were the only thoughts that took up the soul of Cyrus, all the way between the Castle of Hermes and his own Tent.

The Fifth Part.

Book. I.

CYrus was no sooner come to the Camp, but he bethought himself how to comfort up the King of Phrygia, with all imagineable consolations, after the imprisonment of the Prince Artamas; and to that end, without any stay at his own Tent, he went immediately unto that of the sad Father, to acquaint him with all the particulars of the bad success in his enterprize, and to assure him, that he would neglect no possible opportunities which might regain the liberty of his Son. Sir (said that generous Prince, and interrupted him in his talk) had he lost his liberty in releasing the Princess Mandana, the misfortune had not so much moved me: But I do confess, that since I see his endeavours conduce not to your service, I stand in need of some consolation; it grieves me to see him in a condition so far from being able to pay that debt of services which he owes you, that he is like to perish, unless you become his Liberator: I cannot imagine (replied Cyrus) that our Armies are so inconsiderable in the King of Lidia's esteem, as that he dare offer any violence unto any Prince who is engaged in our quarrel, to a Prince unto whom he is a debtor for many victories; he cannot be ignorant, that Kings are obliged by the Laws of gratitude, as well as other men; and that by how much their degree is elevated above the spear of subjects, by so much is the sin of ingratitude more horrid in them; therefore let not any fears of any violence from Croessus unto the Prince Artamas disturb the serenity of your soul. Moreover, without all doubt, the King of Susiana, and the King of Pontus will be his Mediators and Protectors; for they being men of generosity, will most certainly oblige Croessus to be no more rigorous unto the prisoners which he hath taken, then I am unto the Queen Panthea, and the Princess Araminta. However, since there is no discretion in trusting too much unto the generosity of enemies, I will to morrow dispatch an Envoy unto Croessus, to let him know what interest I have in the person of the Prince your Son: I will also move the two Princesses, Page 2 which I named before, to write some Letters in his favor; and my earnest endeavours shall tell you how much I esteem his person and how dear his interests are unto me. The King of Phrigia expressed abundance of thanks unto Cyrus for his indulgency towards him, and took the sad disaster with a magnanimous constancy. Cyrus thought it no discretion to tell him that the Prince Artamas was much wounded: as well because he would not oppress him with too great a load of sorrows at one time, as because he was in hopes to hear some happy news of his recovery. After this, he retired unto his Tent, where common civility obliged him to spend an hour or two with the Commanders of his Army who came to see him; and after that, he allowed another hour in dispensing requisite orders in his Martial matters: after which, retiring himself in private, with none but Chrisantes, he spent the rest of the night in contemplation of his great misfortunes, and the multitude of his miseries: And though the consideration of them did most sensibly grieve him, yet did they not at all blunt his courage; but on the contrary, the more miserable he perceived himself, the more did he rouse up his soul to oppose the malignity of his Fate; and although he had a hurt which was most tender and sensible, yet was it ever firm and unshaken. This advantage he had, that he was sensible of no miseries, but such only as Love brought upon him; as for any others, his soul was seated so infinitely above them all, or any thing that could hap, that they never reached him, or if they did, it was but weakly. He had been a prisoner, and fallen from the top of happiness into an Abyss of misery; but since he was not guilty of any crime, he stood not in need of all his virtues, to support him: Death it self, how terrible soever, could never stagger his soul, though he had a hundred and hundred times been so near it, that he had reason to believe himself swallowed up by it: But as his soul was as constant as any Rock against the rigorous surges of Fortune, so was it also most tender, and so sensible, that it could not endure without unconceiveable sorrow, all those torments which Love brought upon him. This Prince, who questionless could lose Crowns and Scepters without any alteration of countenance, could not think upon the loss of Mandana without such trembling of heart, as all his Reason could not master. He spent a great part of the night in talk with Chrisantes, but at last, being more desirous to allow some rest unto a man whom he loved, then to take any unto himself, he dismissed him, and lamented his misfortunes unto himself, until very weariness did insensibly against his will cast him asleep, and gave some respite unto his restless thoughts. 'Tis true, this truce lasted not long, for he awaked by break of day; he forgot not the least circumstance of his promise unto the King of Phrygia; so that casting his thoughts upon Aglatidas for an Envoy to Croessus, he caused him to be sent for unto him; and appointing him a Herald to conduct him unto Sardis, he commanded him to follow after him unto the place where the Queen of Susiana and the Princess Araminta lodged, to the end, that when he had obtained his desires from them, he might there give him his last instructions. He took horse then immediately, and a very small train followed him, because he desired it should be so: He arrived at the Queen of Susiana's lodging, whom Araspes said was ready, and might be seen: Indeed that Princess was then newly returned from the Temple, which every morning she frequented, because her restless thoughts would not give her leave to sleep much. When she knew what had happened unto Cyrus, she was extremely sorry for him, and for her self also; For truly Sir (said she unto him) If the Gods would have permitted you to have released Mandana, most certainly you would have kept your promise, and all Warres being at an end, I should have been in hopes to have seen my dear Abradates, and have seen him your friend, since being so generous as he is, I am very certain, that when he knew how you have treated me, it would have most sensibly wrought upon him. However Madam (replied Cyrus) It is in your power to do me a very good office, until it shall please Fate to be weary of persecuting me. Alas Sir, (replied Panthea) Is it possible, considering my condition, that I should be able to do any thing which can testify my resentments of all your favours to me? Doubtless you are, answered he, if you will be pleased to take so much pains as to write a word unto the valiant Abradates, and desire him to move Croessus not to treat the Prince Artamas too hardly, and to use all the other prisoners which he took in this sad adventure very well, for I make no question but he will consent unto whatever you shall desire: I do not tell you Madam, that according as he shall do unto them, you shall be better or worse treated; but on the contrary, to induce you unto a more obliging Letter, that though he shall deny what I desire, yet I will never fail in those duties which I owe unto your Quality and Virtue, and that by my consent you shall never receive the least distaste. Your expressions are so full of generosity (replied she) Page 3 that I were most unworthy of your protection, if I did not use the utmost of my power for your satisfaction, especially since your demands are only such as equity it self ought to enforce from me. After that Cyrus had returned some thankful language, he told her, that he would leave her at liberty to write, and go to address the same desires unto the Princess Araminta to the King her Brother. He found her no less disposed to grant him a Letter unto the King of Pontus, then Panthea unto the King of Susiana: She thought her self something interested in it, for the person of Anaxaris was now very precious in her thoughts, since she understood he had saved the life of Spitridates, in so much as she told Cyrus, that he was not at all beholding unto her for writing in favour of those prisoners, since there was one amongst them unto whom she was so much obliged. When Cyrus had stayed as long with her as he thought Panthea might be in writing her Letters, he left Araminta, to give her the same liberty, and returned to the Queen of Susiana's Chamber; who would needs shew him the Letter which she had writ unto her Husband. He did a long time refuse to see it, testifying a compleat confidence in her: But since she would needs have him understand it, she began to read aloud what she had writ: These were the words.

PANTHEA unto her dear ABRADATES.

SIR,

When I shall relate unto you all the miseries of my Captivity, I have nothing to say that troubles me, but the deprivation of your self: Questionless, it troubles you to be an Enemy unto such a Prince, as knows so well how to use a Victory, and who renders me as much respect in his own Camp, as I was wont to receive at Susa when I was there: Wonder not then, if I intreat you to become a Mediator and a Patron unto all the Prisoners which Croessus hath, or shall hereafter take, especially unto the Prince Artamas, who is infinitely dear unto the illustrious Cyrus. I do not intimate, that you may do him most acceptable offices in the Person of the Princess Mandana; for you may judge by those which he doth unto me, how he will resent those which you do unto him: I say those good offices which you do unto him, because I question not but you will repay that debt which I owe unto this generous Conquerour. However, let me assure you, that notwithstanding all his favours and goodness to me, I must needs think my self the most unfortunate woman in the world, as long as I am separated from my dear Abradates.

PANTHEA.

This Princess had no sooner done reading this Letter, but Cyrus rendred her a milion of thanks; and as he was ready to take his leave, the Princess Araminta comes in, and brings hers, which was no less obliging then the other; needs would she have him see it before she sealed it; so that after he asked the Queen of Susiana's leave, he read these words.

The Princess ARAMINTA unto the King of Pontus.

Since I know what thoughts you entertain of the invincible Cyrus, I know you will be very glad to understand, that you may most sensibly oblige him in behalf of the Prince Artamas, whom I beseech you to Patronize and protect; for I doubt not, but that in all things which relates not unto your love, you will be ready to do him all possible good offices. I thought it my duty to give you this advice, and to conjure you for my own sake, to take especial care of one Prisoner, whose name is Anaxaris, unto whom I am a debtor for the life of the Prince Spitridates. I thought it also convenient to tell you, that since our last meeting, when I could not obtain my desires of you, the illustrious Cyrus hath not altered his course of treating me most civilly, and that the bad success of my negotiation has not made him more rigorous: Be therefore, I beseech you, a prevalent Defender of all the Prisoners which the King of Lydia took, especially those whom I named, if my prayers have any prevalency with you, or if you value the friendship of unfortunate

ARAMINTA.

Page 4 I wish unto the Gods (said Cyrus after the reading of the Letter) that it were permitted me to restore unto you your absolute liberty, thereby to testify my acknowledgments unto you both, but I hope I shall not die without that satisfaction. In the mean time, since I must lose no time, I beseech you give me leave to go and dispatch Aglatidas; and then, after that, these Princesses had returned answers unto his civilities, he went out, but without taking any leave, because he intended to dine there: Then did he give full instructions unto Aglatidas, as well what to do in behalf of the Prisoners, as to enquire concerning the Princess Mandana: He did also hint unto him to have a most tender care of Feraulas; then going unto the Chamber of Araspes, who seemed alwayes to be extremely melancholly; he writ unto Croessus in these words.

CYRUS unto the King of Lydia.

Though I doubt not of your generosity, in using those prisoners well, whom the Fate of Warre has brought into your hands; yet I must needs write unto you in behalf of those prisoners which one of your Lieutenant Generals did take near the River of Hermes, especially for the Prince Artamas. Consider, I pray you, that he ought not to be treated as a Prisoner of State, but only as a Prisoner of Warre, with whom you ought to deal according to the Lawes of Generosity and Justice, both in treating him most kindly and civilly; his quality, his vertue, and the services which he hath done you, oblige you unto it. If this be not sufficient to induce you thereunto, let me add further, That I have not hitherto been so unfortunate, but that I have a good ground of hope before the Warre be ended, to retaliate civility for civility; transact then the matter more justly for my friends, then you have equitably for the Princess Mandana; you may put an end unto the Warre, whensoever you shall please to restore her unto the King her Father, and be assured, that when you do so, I shall as zealously fight then for your Interest, as now I do for hers.

CYRUS.

As soon as Cyrus had writ this Letter, he gave it unto Aglatidas: he enjoyed him also to inquire whether the King of Assyria had seen Mandana, and to negotiate in his behalf, as well as for the other prisoners: Not but that it is a piece of difficulty, said he, to be so officious for a Rival; yet since my word is engaged, and generosity exacts it, I must needs do it. He put him in mind also of the stranger Anaxaris, of Sosicles, and of Tegeus, and he was just ready to dismiss him, when Ligdamis, who followed Cyrus, to the end he might have a sight of his dear Cleonice, came unto him, and told him, that since he understood Aglatidas was preparing for Sardis, he thought it his duty to acquaint him with some things there, which happily might be advantageous to him. Cyrus both thanked and embraced him, and told him, that it appertained unto such a man only as was deep in Love, to have compassion of another Lover. Then conjuring him to be as good as his word, to the end Aglatidas might more easily meet with exact intelligence, concerning Mandana, Ligdamis in order thereunto, gave him a Letter to be delivered unto a friend of his in this Lydian Court, unto whom he might safely intrust him|self, especially since the transaction was a good office to the interests of the Lydian King. Then after Cyrus had seen the Letter which Aglatidas was to carry, and had once again repeated the most important matters which he was to negotiate, bidding him endeavour to see the Prince Artamas, he dismissed him, and stayed still in the Chamber of Araspes, without any other company then Ligdamis, whose conversation did infinitely please him, although there be a vast difference between a happy Lover, and an unfortunate: Yet, Ligdamis had a soul so tender and complaisant, and did so serve himself into the opinion of Cyrus, that his company was a great comfort unto him. This Prince did principally intend to spend part of that day in this Castle, because it was full of such persons as were possessed with the same passions, that took up his own heart. He knew Panthea loved Abradates, that Araminta loved Spitridates, and that Ligdamis and Cleonice loved most extremely: So that finding some sweetness in condoling with those that sympathized with him in the same miseries, he resolved not only to dine there, but to spend the rest of the day there also. Mean while, because he would not lose any time, he sent Chrisantes with divers orders to the Army, to visit the works which he was there making in a Quarter, not above fifty furlongs from thence. As soon as Cyrus heard that the Princesses were Page 5 ready, he went to see them: for his part, he had dined in private at the Chamber of Araspes without any other company but Ligdamis, whom he carryed along with him in this Visit: So that the Conversation consisted of the Queen of Susiana, the Princess Araminta; of Cleonice, Ismenia, of Cyrus, Ligdamis and Araspes. As soon as each one had placed themselves, Cyrus turning towards the Queen of Susiana, beseeched her to pardon him for coming thither, to seek for some comforts in his miseries. Sir, answered that di|creet Princess, if my miseries can afford you any ease in yours, I shall endure them with much more patience then I have done. No Madam, said he, I came not to see you to that end, but because I thought you all goodness, and full of pity: Most men I meet with do think, that because I am not unfortunate in matters of War, I cannot be unfortunate in any thing else: Indeed they think Love to be but an imaginary Passion, a Chimera, which reigns only in the fancy, and never disturbs the rational parts: Whatsoever I say, they beleeve that the loss of one Battel does trouble me more then the loss of my divine Man|dana; though most certainly, the loss of a hundred Battels, and as many Crowns to boot, does not comparably trouble me so much as one hours separation from that Angellique Princess: Imagine then, I beseech you Madam, what a vexatious life it is, to be perpetually amongst a company of men who are ignorant of my sensibilities; and) judg also how pleasant it is to me to be amongst such as are composed all of tenderness and compassion: yet must I needs except Araspes from the number of such, because his Soul seem'd always most insensible, but since Ligdamis became a Convert, I will not despair of him, but on the contrary, knowing the tenderness of his affection towards my self, I am perswaded it is no impossibility, but hereafter he may fall in love with some excellent Beauty or other. Araspes blusht at this discourse: but Cyrus taking no great notice of the alteration in his face, the discourse went on; and the Princess Araminta, addressing her self to Cyrus, For my part, said she, I am of your opinion; but as for the Queen, if she do not contradict you, certainly it is out of her complaisance; for she has several times told me, that she never found any great comfort either in pitying or being pitied; and indeed, she does so closely lock up her sorrows in her own heart, that she never speaks the first: But, I who am nothing of her humour, have related all my misfortunes unto her; and not a day passleth but I am discoursing of them. It is very true, replied Panthea, I do not much care for talking of any thing which concerns my self, I never think of things past; the future is it which engrosseth all my Soul: methinks I have so little enjoyed my self in any thing which hath happened unto me this three or four year, that it is much better for me to think only of what is to come. Things future are so full of obscurity (replied the Princess Araminta) that I am so far from thinking of them, that I banish them my thoughts, lest I should forge such miseries unto my self, as Fortune perhaps never thought on. Gladly would I do as you say, replied Cyrus, but I find it impossible. For my part, said Pan|thea, since fear and hope are two passions which divides all my Soul between them, and that I find nothing either to hope for or fear in things already past, I cannot rest my mind upon them. Yet is it much better, replied Cyrus, to have a heart divided between hopes and fears; for I do know some who stand in fear of every thing, and hope for nothing. Since the virtue is so great, and the Gods so just, replied Panthea, it would be an injury unto them to despair of your good fortune. Since you are not happy, replied Cyrus, and since the Princess Araminta is unfortunate, it were presumption to be over confident of that little virtue which I own: We see Madam, there are some things which seem just in the eyes of men, which are not so in the sight of the Gods: for truly, it must needs be acknowledged, that the King of Assyria, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Mazares, who dyed near Sinope, were three Princes who could be taxed with no Crime, but that of over-loving Mandana, yet we see how that Princess, who is virtue in the abstract, hath caused all the miseries of their lives and mine: Mazares lost his Life; the King of Pontus his Throne and Liberty; the King of Assyria his Crown and Liberty also: After all this, Madam, what should we think of the future? must it not needs be concluded, that who|soever never thinks of it, is certainly most wise? But yet I must confess to my shame, that I cannot chuse but foresee the miseries which ought to befall me. It is much better there|fore, replied the Princess Araminta, to apply ones self to the memory of things past. If they be delighting, replied Panthea, to think that they are not still enjoyed, is vexatious. If they be disastrous and irksom, replied Araminta, the thoughts of them now are pleas|ing, because they are past: for my part, when I remember the condition I was in when I was at Cabira, and when the Coward Artanus kept me there, methinks that since I am Page 6 come out of his rude captivity, I may well hope to come out of one more pleasant: And for my part, said Panthea, when I remember how happy I was at Susa, after I had over|come all those obstacles which opposed my happiness, I do not think it possible ever to be in the same condition; and therefore I strive as much as I can to forget those things, the memory of which does but the more trouble me: However you have promised me, replied Araminta, to acquaint me with all the joys and miseries of your life, as I have acquainted you with mine. Indeed I did consent (answered she) that Pherenice should acquaint you, and therefore your curiosity shall be satisfied without reviving such things in my memory, as I wish I could quite eradicate: Why then (said Cyrus, and addressed him|self to the Princess Araminta) do you not urge the promise? Sir, replied she, till now I have not had the opportunity, for it was but this morning at our return from the Temple, that the Queen did make this promise: Then it is fit I should absent my self, replied Cyrus, lest I should hinder you from what you desire, for indeed I dare not presume to ask the favour, not but that I have a great desire to hear the passion of the illustrious Abradates discoursed of, that I might compare his with my own; but I know the duty which I owe unto a great Princess, and therefore will not be too pressing to know her se|crets. Truly Sir (replied Panthea with a modest smile) I am not very free in imparting them, yet I am most willing you should know the whole story of my life; and it does in some sort concern me, that you be acquainted with that innocent passion which yet posses|seth the heart of Abradates and my own; therefore when you have any hours of leisure Sir, she who was appointed to satisfie the curiosity of the Princess Araminta, shall satisf|ie yours also. Methinks Madam, replied that Princess, that without the expence of a|ny more time in talk of things indifferent, it could not be better employed then in satisf|ying the desires of the illustrious Cyrus, and my self. Since it is my resolution to do a|ny thing which shall please you (answered Panthea) you may employ the time as you please, provided I be not present. Then the Princess Araminta rising up, said, that she would carry Cyrus into her Chamber, who without any further opposition presented his hand to conduct her thither. Panthea did blush as much at their salutes, as if some crime which she had committed were going to be related: But considering seriously it would be advantageous unto her, that Cyrus were better acquainted with the vertue of Abradates, she sent her woman, who was to relate the story of her life, with the Princess Araminta; she was one of good quality and wit, and who had alwayes been a confident of her secrets. In the mean while Cleonice and Ismeni stayed with Panthea, unto whom Araspes and Ligdamis, after they had accompanied Cyrus to the Chamber of Araminta, returned. Araminta being conducted by this Prince, and followed by Pherenice and Hesionida, she was no sooner in her Chamber, but desiring Cyrus to sit down, and placing Pherenice over against her, she desired her to begin the story, and not to conceal from them the least thought of Panthea and Abradates: After Pherenice had in a complement desired pardon unto her deficiency to make such a relation, she began thus.

The History of ABRADATES, and of PANTHEA.

The honor which I have had to be educated with the Queen of Susiana, and the hap|piness which I have had to be ever loved of her, enables me with any difficulty to let you know all the particulars of her life, the beginning of which was much freer from disastrous adventures then was the sequel. I shall not need Madam to speak of her high birth, for you know that the Prince of Clasomena her father was of an extraction so ill|ustrious, that the blood of Croessus was not more: The Princess her mother was also des|cended from a great house, but she lost her so young, that she cannot remember she e|ver saw her; 'tis true, that this Princess was educated by one that was Sister unto the Prince her father, and lived with him, under whom she was as well educated, as she could hope to be under the Princess her mother. Basolina (for so was the sister unto the Prince of Clasomena called) was a Lady of a high spirit, and great vertue, who since she had lost her Husband when she was very young, would never marry again: She had been fair and Courtly; and though she was as compleat in all vertue as any Lady of her Quality was capable of, yet was she not of the too too austere Sect: She would say, that one must be young once in their life, and it was much better to be of a young disposition at fifteen, then at fifty; so that the Prince her brother wholly referring the education of his daughter unto her, she allowed her an honest freedome, without any rigid hand of Page 7 severity over her, which course did produce in her a more early and riper wit, then o|thers of her age were accustomed to have; so that at twelve years of age the Princess of Clasomena did behave her self with as much discretion and judgment, as if she had been compleatly twenty: As for her beauty, I need not enter into any Elogies of it, since you may very well conclude what it was, by what it is; yet let me say thus much, that her beauty did at the very first appear, and she was most admirably fair from her very Cradle; her disposition, though something serious, yet was ever complaisant and sweet; so that joyning a perfect goodness unto one of the purest wits upon earth, and unto one of the greatest beauties of all Lidia, it may easily be imagined that the Princess of Cla|somena did attract the admiration of all the world. Some glimps of her beauty and wit did sparkle throughout all the Town, for in her passage from infancy to the age of rea|son; indulgent cares to please her made all the women amiable, and the men compleat: Being both handsom and free, she was adored by all that came neer her, and all those al|so who heard of those rare qualities wherewith she was adorned; so that the fame of this Princess did in a very short time spread over all those Provinces which bordered upon that over which her Father was Sovereign. Cleonice whom you see here may easily induce you to imagine, that she was not amiable only in Clasomena; for the truth is, all strangers stayed there with abundance of delight, and did confess there was not so much wit and politness to be found in any Town of all Asia, as in that. Residence in Clasomena became more delightful a little while after Cleonice went to dwell at Ephesus, because then many strangers of great quality came thither, and stayed a long while; amongst which some were most compleat men, who made society most dilectable, and took away from Clasomena that defect which was found in all the Provinces and petty Courts there, which was, that every day none but the same faces were to be seen. One thing did sometimes much perplex the Princess Basolina, which was, that there was not one man in all the principality of her brother, who was a fit match for her Neice; so that all those who saw her, were such as durst only admire her, or at the least durst not express any other thoughts. Al|mongst all the compleat Gallants in Clasomena, there was one, whose name was Perin|thus, being older then Panthea some five or six years, who devoted himself unto the Prince, and who did so much obtain his liking, that he would never be without him; his Father spent all his daies in the Princes house, and also died in the service of his Master. It must needs be confessed, that Perinthus stood not in need of any commendums, for his person was very handsom, and his wit charming, so that it was impossible to deny him favour, to be a very compleat man as he was; he had one odd quality, which was, that he never contracted any intimate friendship with any one in particular; he held fair with every one, but he opened not his heart unto any; he would sometimes say, when he was chid for so doing, that he gloried in hiding his most secret thoughts, even from his best friends, However, he was very well beloved: Those who were frequently with him, would trust him with their business of greatest importance; as well because he had great abilities to give good advice, as because he was a man of exact honesty, and incorruptible fide|lity: Thus without discovering his own heart unto any, he saw into the hearts of many men: Perinthus was handsome, and of a good behaviour, of a pleasant conversation, and without being either too serious, or too free, did equally sort with all manner of humours, and people of what quality soever; and indeed as the Prince of Clasomena loved him most dearly, so the Princess Basilina loved him no less. Panthea also esteemed him as much as his de-ines could wish, all my companions did most tenderly affect him: All the Ladies of the Town did the same; and indeed Perinthus had been the most haply man alive of his quality, had he not entertained a secret enemy in his heart, which troubled all his joys, and rendred him as unfortunate, as he seemed happy unto all those that knew him. For Madam, to the better understanding the sequel of this History, be pleased to know, that Perinthus did fix his love upon the Princess of Clasomena above the capacity of his heart; but yet his love was so respective, so prudent, and so violent altogether, that he was never heard to utter one syllable of any such passion: He has told me since (when by the consequence of things which since fell out, he was forced to confess the truth) that as soon as he perceived this predominate passion, which he could not master, to be in his soul, and from which he could never hope for the least satisfacti-on, he resolutely determined to contract no intimate friendship, neither with any man, nor any Lady, lest it should so fall out, that through weakness he should discover unto all the world that which he desired to keep a secret. He has also told me, that he was so Page 8 perfectly acquainted with the folly of loving, so disproportionable to his own quality, that he durst never so much as think of letting her know he loved her: For since the verltue of Panthea began to appear in lustre, and to dazzle his eyes, he has sworn a hundred times unto me, that after many years of service and Love, he never enjoyed one minute of any hope; however he strugled with his passion, yet not knowing why or to what end he should either oppose or cherish it: Still he loved the Princess, but in such a secret manner, and with so much reverence, that there was not one in all Clasomena as long as we were there, no not the Princess her self, which could have the least suspi-on of it; and truly, to speak the very truth, although Perinthus was descended of a very Noble Family, yet there was such a vast difference between him and her, that it is no wonder that none should suspect any such thing; all humble respects was but his duty by birth, and it was an easie matter to umbrage his real thoughts under that, when he every day did render her a thousand agreeable services: However, considering with himself, that he could never pretend unto any of her affection, no nor so much as acquaint her with his, he limited his desires to obtain her esteem: And being desirous to purchase some glory in the Warres, he went thither where the illustrious Cleander, now Prince Artamas was in Mysia; where he performed such admirable acts, that if there were not a secret Load-stone which drew his heart unto Clasomena, he might well have raised himself unto a great fortune under this generous Favorite. In the end, he returned loadned with ho-nors unto the Prince his Master, who made him extreme welcome at his return. The Princess also received him very well, and questionless Perinthus had this consolation amidst his miseries, that he was arrived unto such a point as he desired to be. This Madam is the description of Perinthus, to wit, the most discreet, but the most unhappy Lover in the world; and this was the state of his passion, when the Prince of Clasomena took his resolution to go and dwell at Sardis, and to carry thither with him the Princess his daughter, with intentions not to return until he had bestowed her in marriage. As he was a Tributary unto Croessus, and had been at a Treaty, by which the Princes of Clasomena were obliged to live the half year at Sardis; after a long absence from thence, under several pretences and excuses, he resolved to go thither, and discharge the duty; and the rather, because he saw unto what a height the valour of Cleander had raised the Authority Royal; therefore he yielded obedience by fair means, rather then to draw a War upon his Country, and be compelled unto it by force. Sardis being at that time in her highest lustre, the whole Train of the Prince and Princess were very glad of the journey, except Perinthus, who fretted at it in secret, by reason of some resentments proceeding from his love. Hitherto he had this advantage, that he saw none make any attempts of service upon Panthea, because as I told you before, there was not one man in all the principality of Clasomena, who could pretend marriage: But when he considered, that now she was going to Sardis, where many men suitable to her own quality did inhabit, he made no question but she would be loved and adored by many; so that his fear of halving many Rivals, rendred him most miserable. I remember when I observed, notwithstanding all his disguise-ment, that he never made any expressions of such joys for going unto Sardis, as all the rest did, who were to go this voyage: I asked him the cause, but he answered with as much civility as subtilty, that it was because he should no longer enjoy neither the sight nor society of all those that were most dear unto him. For (said he further, the better to disguise the matter) all the gallantry of the men which the Prince carries with him, will there fall all in Love: Then he said further, (because his discourse should reach at me) and I see that all the Gallants in that place unto which we are going will fall in Love with all the Beauties which the Princess carries with her. My Master himself will be so busie in making his addresses at Court, that I cannot make mine unto him: And as for the Princess, I believe she and her thoughts will be much taken up with variety of Courtships; so that foreseeing that I shall be without Master, without Mistriss, and without friends; it need not be wondered if I be not so gay and pleasant as you are. For my part, said I unto him, and smiled, I am so far from understanding your last discourse, that I know no reason why we should remain in the desarts of Lylbia, rather then go unto Sardis. Perinthus smiled to hear me say so, and without any further continuance of this discourse we parted, and every one prepared for the voyage. The Princess Basilina could not go this journey, for she had some Controversies, and Suits of great importance with the kindred of her late Husband, so that Panthea went to Sardis only with the Prince her Father. I shall not relate unto you Madam, Page 9 how she was received by Croessus, by the Prince Atis, by the Prince Myrsilles, by the Princess Palmis, by Antaleon, by Mexaris, by Artesilas, and by the illustrious Cleander: but I shall employ the time better, in relating things more necessary to the story. Let it suffice that I tell you only in general, that they rendred unto the Prince and Princess all the honors that was due unto their quality and merit: The Princess Palmis, and the Princess of Clasomena did at the first contract a great league of amity, and though they were both of them fair enough to beget envy in the hearts of each other, yet the least spark of it did not appear: Their souls were certainly of a far higher and more noble temper, then to be capable of any thoughts so base: but love they did, and that with all sincerity, though to speak the very truth of things, they did never enter into any such deep confidence of each other, as to impart the secrets of their lives, not but that they had sufficient esteem of each other for it; but since Celenisa had ingrossed all the confidence of the Princess Palmis, I also had the happiness to enjoy that of the Princess Panthea. The truth is, her secrets at that time were of small importance, however I was much obliged to her for her imparting her real thoughts of things unto me, which she never did before the rest of my companions. I make no question Madam, but you are acquainted with that contrariety of humours that is between the King of Lydia, and his Brothers, and therefore I need but hint unto your memory, that the Prince Antaleon was most violently ambitious, one that would ruine all so he could but reign; and that Mexaris was as colvetous as Croessus was liberal, though Mexaris in riches was not inferior to him: And certainly, this vice did never appear so strange in any as in this Prince, as you will see by the sequel of this discourse: However, he was capable of one passion, one of whose noble effects was to produce liberality. I am verily perswaded Mexaris thought that in mat-ter of Love it was enough to give his heart, and that's the reason he never offered to stifle that passion which the beauty of Panthea did inspire into his soul: But his only thoughts were to obtain the affection of the Princess, without any conditions of charge unto himself, and therefore he never offered to hinder his growing passion, but loved her as much as his soul was capable of loving. This fire for a while was closely smothered up in secretsie, and in the interim, the Princess was visited and courted by all the great and illustrious Gallants of Sardis. Amongst the number of those who came to see her, there was one whose name was Doralisa, of good quality, who did infinitely please her; and the truth was, she was no ordinary person, for besides her charming beauty, she had a pleasing and merry wit, but so full of reason, that she brought all the world unto her own sense of things. She had a subtil and witty way of jesting, against which there was no defending ones self, when she was in the humour of it, and that which was most rare to be found in one of that humour, she was full of goodness and sweet[ness also; she did in many occasions more delight those which heard her, then hurt those whom she did play upon, but yet she made many stand in awe of her when we came to Sardis: But yet for my part, I must confess, I ever loved her without any fear, and en-deavoured to confirm the Princess in that advantageous opinion which she entertained of her; and truly I found no difficulty in doing so, for her own natural inclination did byass that way so strongly, that she loved her most tenderly. Doralisa also made such respectful and obliging returns unto the goodness of the Princess, that within a few daies the Princess of Clasomena was as affable and familiar with her, as if she had been acquainted from the Cradle. She understood from several reports, and afterwards from her self, that though she had living neither Father nor Mother, but lived with an Aunt, who had no compulsive power over her: and though she was yet very young, yet had she already refused above twenty offers of Marriage; for when we came to Sardis, she was not above eighteen years of age, not that she appeared of any rigid or savage disposition, for rather on the contrary, she was of a free and jocand Spirit; she was a lover of company and divertisements, and there was not any Gallantry in all the Court wherein she had not her share, insomuch as there seemed no inclination in her to become one of the veiled Nuns of Ephesus, and therefore they would sometimes desire her reasons why she refused so many Gallants and compleat men which proffered themselves in way of Marriage: But she would always answer with a smile, that it was, because she had not yet met with such a man as she sought for, and whom she phancied as a good fortune unto her self. Thus turning the matter alwayes into a kind of Rallary, and leaving every one to gheess at her meaning, they imagined that she had an aversion towards Marriage, and that she had no other reason for carrying the matter as she did. The Princess then knowing thus much, upon a time when she was not very well, and had sent for Doralisa to divert her, she told [Page 10 her, that she had a great desire to know who that man was, whom she said she sought for, and could not find. Since it is your desire Madam, said she and smiled, be pleased to know that I have a phancy never to marry any man, but such a one as I am sure loves me, and such a one as I do love. The first of these, replied the Princess, methinks is easily found: It is not so easie, replied she, but in truth the second is as difficult, or to express my self a little better, impossible. Methinks, said the Princess, you offer a great affront unto the Town and Court of Sardis, to think that there is not one man in it sufficiently accomplished to win you by his services to accept of his affection. Madam, said she unto her, there is a thousand accomplished Gallants in Sardis, but amongst them all, there is not one who has not already loved some or other, and that's my reason why I can affect none of them; For truly, if I could suffer my self to be loved, and could resolve to love, I would chuse one whom Nature only has dressed up a compleat man, without the adulterate helps of Love, one who should offer me a fresh new heart, which ne-lyer had received any impression but my own, nor burned in any flames, but such only as kindled at my eyes. But Madam, where is it possible to find such a modelled man as I seek after? at the least I am sure, that amongst a hundred thousand which I have seen, there is not such a one to be met withall. Nature alone (added she) does sometimes make them handsome and fair, but they are never of a good behaviour if they have never been once in Love with any; and a man can never have a pleasing spirit, unless once in his life he have made it his business to please some or other. The Princess began to laugh at the dis-course of Doralisa, but afterwards said unto her, Love does never infuse spirit into those who have none of their own. I do assure you Madam, replied Doralisa, that though it do not infuse spirit into those who have none, yet it does marvellously augment and polish it in those who have any of their own. I do believe, said she, that such a compleat man as is described by one of the wise men of Greece, who is so much spoke of in the world, may be found without any sparks of Love in him; for those men require no more, but that they know how to manage the business well which they have in hand, and that a man know honesty, and courage, and vertue: But such a compleat man as I would have, ought to have (besides these things so absolutely necessary) some things in him which are dilectable, and complacential, and these are absolutely impossible to be found in a man that neer was in Love. In sum Madam, call into your memory all the young men whom you have seen enter into the world, and tell me the reason why there is so many of them, whose conversation are Pesantique and gross; you will find the only reason to be, because they want that respective and convenient boldness, and that spright-ly and gallant civility which Love only can infuse. Their discourse and actions do not please; and for my part, I like the conversation of those old men, who were sprightly Gallants in their youth, much better then those young Simpliciaris, who think more upon the Ribbands which they wear, then the Ladies whom they talk with. 'Tis very true, said the Princess and smiled, I must confess, that I have observed many such as you speak of, but I do not attribute it unto the same cause; for I do think that their want of expe-rience in the world, is the true reason why their discourse and demeanour is not more dilectable. To demonstrate unto you, said Doralisa, that it is not so, I beseech you do but observe those who never were in Love, and yet have sufficient experience in the world, you shall find them so rude, and of such a savage spirit, that there is no complacency to be found in them; you shall find that such men are steel-hearted, and men of Blood, whose lives are spent in Wars, or els such hunting dispositions as affect only Forrests, or such dumphish pieces of solitariness, as are alwayes cloystered up in their Studies with a company of books, or such as entertain themselves in Grots and Caves in the Country: So that I must ingenuously confess, that it is Love only which compleats a man to be such a one as I am in quest of. However, said the Princess unto her, since Love is of such an efficacy as you speak of, do but suffer your self to be loved, and those men who are not such as you desire, will in time become so. Ah Madam, cryed she out, if I do not esteem him whom I am to marry the very first minute that I shall see him, I shall never love him; and therefore I must find him a most accomplished man, and not make him one. Make choice then (said she unto her) of one of those who have compleated themselves by loving some other, and has made a retreat, and now loves none. I have already told you Madam, replied Doralisa, that I would have a fresh new Maiden heart, newly kindled with pure and lively flames, and not one of those hardened ones, as have burned whole years together. The truth is, as men use to offer unto a Divinity Page 11 such offerings only as were never upon the Altar of another; so would I have such an affection as was never dedicated to any but my self. So, since I cannot love any man who has loved one another; and since it is not possible to find out a compleat man, unless he have been in Love, I am resolved, and truly very willingly, to love none at all. This your rule is not so general, replied the Princess, but it will admit of some exceptions; for Perinthus you know is a most accomplished man, yet he never was in Love. Ah Madam, cryed she out, it is impossible, Perinthus either is infallibly in Love, or at the least hath been; it is impossible to be as he is, unless he were. The Princess then called me, Is it not truly Pherenice, said she, that Perinthus was never in Love? It is most true Madam, said I unto her, that I never knew he was, nor ever knew him to be suspected by any. Then certainly he is most subtil and wise, replied Doralisa, for let me tell you once again, that Perinthus cannot be what he is, unless he had been in Love. As she was saying so, he entred; So that the Princess beginning the discourse, and being ignorant of that passion which was in his soul, she told him, that she was very glad to see him, because he would help her to convince Doralisa of an error, wherein she persisted: But said the Princess, and addressed her self unto Doralisa, I would have you ask him the question, to the end you shall not think he dare not tell me the truth. I do confess Madam, answered Doralisa, that I am so full of curiosity in the business, as though it be something against the Rules of handsomness, yet I will immediately obey you; therefore Perinthus, said she, and turned towards him, I pray tell me whether you did not leave one in Classomena whom you wish were at Sardis. Perinthus was so surprized with this question, that he blusht, and knew not how to answer; So that Doralisa turning towards the Princess, Very well Madam, said she, I am much deceived if you be not mistaken, and if the blush of Perinthus do not sufficiently argue that I am in the right. But you do not give Perinthus time to answer, said Panthea, and you will condemn me before you understand him: I pray Perinthus convince Doralisa, that it is possible to find such a compleat man as your self, who neither is, nor ever was in Love; and therefore tell her whether you left any beauty in Clasomena, who think you upon at Sardis. Since I am obliged to answer directly (replied Perinthus after he had a little recollected himself) I do seriously protest unto you without any lye, that since I came to Sardis, I never so much as thought of Clasomena, or any in it: Perhaps the reason is (said Doralisa to the Princess) because Perinthus is in Love with some of your Women, and by consequence left none there to love. Perinthus blusht the second time at the discourse of Doralisa, which the Princess observing, and imagining that the alteration in his countenance proceeded from no other cause, but because he was ashamed to confess he loved not any. Truly Perinthus (said she unto him) you are a strange man, in being ashamed to confess that thing whereof you ought to glory; for I do conceive it Honorable, never to be vanquished. There are some Conquerours so illustrious (replied he very coldly) that a defeat by them may be confessed without any dishonor. But whether are you in Love, or not in Love, said Doralisa, for that is it which we would know? If I be in Love, replied he, you may think it concerns me not to discover it, since none knows it: And if I be not in Love, it concerns me not to acknowledge it also, since it is to be thought (as I collect by the discourse of the Princess) that one cannot be any wayes a compleat man, unless amorous; and I must not possess you with an opinion which will be to my own disadvantage. However it be (said Doralisa) though you will not explain your self, yet within a while, I shall find out the truth; for if you be in Clasomena, there your disquiet and melancholy will sufficiently discover you; and if you be at Sardis, then I shall more infallibly find it out. But what if he be not in Love at all, said the Princess, as I do verily believe he is not, then Perinthus wants none of those qualities which you desire to be in a man: Yes, he wants one thing, replied she, and that's as necessary as all the rest, which is, that he love me as well as he can Love. But I conjure you Madam, never move him unto that, since I am most certain he can never love me; and if I were as sure that he is in Love with none else, I should look upon him as an absolute Miracle. As Perinthus was going to reply, a messenger from the Princess Palmis interrupted the conversation, for he came upon a visit, to see how the Princess did, and to know whether she was in such a condition of health as to meet her in the morning at a Hunting which they had appointed some few dayes since; or whether it was her pleasure to defer that sport until another time. The Princess, who was not very ill, but hoped to be perfectly well the day following, returned this answer, That she was so far from any desires of Page 12 deferring any delights which she should receive, as that in the morning she would assume the honor to wait upon her at the Chase. Immediately after the Prince Mexaris entred, so that the discourse between Perinthus and Doralisa was put off till the next day. In the mean while, the poor Perinthus was in a pitiful condition, to understand from the Princesses own mouth, that she did not think him to be in Love, and his sorrows were extreme to hear those cruel words pronounced by her whom he only loved, or ever could love, and unto whom he never durst discover his passion; and though he did, as he thought, limit his desires to be only esteemed by the Princess; yet many a minute in a day had he further wishes, which immediately he would stifle: However, since he was fit for any employment, the Princess sent him to see whether the servants of the Prince her Father had prepared all things necessary for this Hunting, and whether the Horse which she was to ride upon was ready, and well conditioned. Perinthus, who was ravished in rendering any service unto the Princess, were it never so trivial, did so punctually obey her, that the next morning the Princess Palmis her self was not better accoutred then she: And really I cannot think, that a more gallant and glorious sight could be seen then this Hunting diversion. All the Ladies were drest, as they use to picture Diana, unless in that they had a little more care of their Beauties then that Goddess, who despised her own: She had about her head a Chapplet of such lively coloured Feathers, as vyed with the Sun for Beauty, and preserved her from its heat, under which she wore a Vaile waving at the pleasure of the winde, wherewith she could unbrage her fair face when she pleased: Their horses were all trapped and trim'd with lovely coloured Ribbands in their Mains; each had a rich Scarf, in which hung a Bow and Quiver of Arrows, in one hand they held their Bridles, which were all studded with bosses of Gold, and in the other hand they held light Javelines of Ivory and Ebony all enamelled with the richest work of the Goldsmith, their saddle-cloaths were imbroydered with Pearl and Jewels: So that a sight more magnificent and fuller of delight could not be seen; for all their dresses being in several colours, and the trimmings of their horses so also, it made the most beautiful object in the world amongst the woods and Lands of the Park: Every Lady had a Huntsman to conduct her, who always rode before her, and two Footmen, on each side one: Each of the Princesses had two Women drest in the same garb following them; so that the Princess desired Doralisa to be one of hers, and did me the honour to make choice of me amongst all the rest for the other. It was so ordered by the Princess, that Perinthus should be Doralisa's Huntsman, and the Prince Mexaris was hers: The Prince Atis was Huntsman unto a Lady, whose name was Anaxilla, with whom he was in Love; and the Prince Artesilas was Huntsman unto the Princess Palmis. But since to tell all the passages of this Hunting, is nothing pertinent unto my discourse, I shall only say thus much, that all the men were no less glorious and magnificent then the Ladies: A world of people came in Chariots to the banks of the Lake of Giges, where all the equipage of Hunting, and all the horses did rendezvouz and wait: Doralisa and my self were in the Princess Chariot, because we were appointed to wait upon her; and as it was the office of the Prince Mexaris, who was Huntsman unto the Princess, to help her out of her Chariot; so he was very obsequious in it, but he no sooner appeared, then Doralisa observed, that in lieu of a habit made purposely for this jolly recreation, as the Prince Atis, the Prince Myrsilas, Artesilas, Cleander, and all the rest, even Perinthus had: It was a suit, as I was told, which he wore at a Horse-race, some two years since; So that not being able to hold from laughing, rellajly (said she to me, so loud as the Princess might hear) I see that all which hath been told me concerning the Prince Mexaris is not true: What have they told you (said I unto her) They have confidently told me (replied she) that he was in Love with the Princess, but since he is yet so covetous, I cannot believe him to be in Love. Mexaris was then so near the Chariot, that neither the Princess nor I could say any thing to Doralisa, and truly it was very well we could forbear laughing, not but that Mexaris was of a good port, and well made: But since his gold did look but dim in comparison of that fresh lustre which is upon any thing that is new, it was impossible to hold from laughing at the words of Doralisa. Also some daies are so devoted to jollity, that the least thing will incline the mind into a pleasant rally and mirth. Cleander, who was the only he that day, and who because he could not be Huntsman unto the Princess Palmis, (though he was then her Lover, as afterwards we knew) he would not be one unto any. Colouring the matter with this pretence, that he would give orders unto all the Page 13 rest; so that he would go sometimes to one, and sometimes to another. This Hunting was in a great Park, which well deserved the name of a little Forrest for its large extent: A great common rode doth cross through it, otherwise such as would go unto Sardis would be forced to go much about; so that at either end of the Park there are two Gates to let passengers in and out. I will not stay you Madam with a long description of this dayes Hunting, nor tell you how the Hounds hunted, or the Hart stood, nor how the winding of Horns made a very merry noyse; or whether all the Hunters followed close the chase, and a thousand such pleasant passages: For besides my want of expression in fit terms, it is not the mark I aim at. And to tell you truly, the Ladies which were assembled together in that place, I believe came thither as much to shew their Beauties, as to run Harts to death: Hunting is too violent an exercise for them, and therefore they pleased themselves in crossing gently into such places as their Huntsmen imagined in probability the Hart might pass, and that way was easie enough for Ladies. At the beginning the Princesses and their Hunters kept close together, but this glorious Troop did afterwards insensibly separate into several companies, some taking one way, some another; so that without any intendment, the Princess was in the midst of a thick Wood, without any company but the Prince Mexaris, Doralisa, Perinthus his two servants, and my self. But she no sooner perceived it, then we understood by the shrill noyse of horns and voices, that the Chase drew near us; and indeed the Hart did pass by so near us, as at that instant we enjoyed the most pleasure: However, as there is nothing more against the mind of him who affects Hunting, then not to follow when he sees the Game running before him, the Prince Mexaris, as much in Love as he was with the Princess, asked leave to follow, and told her he would presently return; so he rid through the thick of the Wood, which tickled Doralisa into a laughing spleen so loud, that she easily imparted her mirth unto Perinthus and my self, so she rid to the Princess: I profess (said this jocund Lady) it must needs be confessed, that though this Prince be not very liberal, yet he is very prudent in taking so handsome an opportunity, to hide his passion to the Princess, and his old Imbrodery also, by getting himself so far off us as he doth. Perinthus, who being prompted by some jealous thoughts; was even ravished at the bitterness of Doralisa against him, did handsomely second her: The Princess seemed as if she would not understand us, for being very discreet, she would not be seen to jeer at the Prince Mexaris; but since we perceived she could not chuse but smile a little, we could not chuse but laugh it on. In the mean time; since the Princess was resolved not to stay for Mexaris in that place, she asked Perinthus which way he thought she might go to meet the Princess Palmis: But since he could not directly tell that, he intended, as he told me afterwards, to carry her as far from Mexaris as he could; and therefore he took a quite contrary way to that which the Chase had taken. As we rid on, and less and less hearing the cry of the dogs, and the voices of the Huntsmen, the Princess turned towards Perinthus, and most sweetly said unto him, That she was very sorry to hinder him from the pleasure of the Chase. Perinthus replied unto this surprizing language in such a manner, as let the Princess see, that he thought himself much more happy in being where he was, than at the death of the Hart. Then the Princess calling to Doralisa, Crafty Wench (said she unto her) who knows that the Prince Mexaris is not in Love with me, because he had rather follow the Chase then stay with us: May you not as well say upon the same reason, that since Perinthus does voluntarily stay with us, therefore he is in Love with you? Not at all Madam (answered she) if he be, I will make him confess it presently; and indeed she had opened her mouth to speak unto him: When being come into the great rode which crosseth the Park, we discovered upon the left hand five or six Horsemen riding towards us, we thought them at the first to be some of our company which belonged to the Chase, but coming neerer them, we did not know them: He who rid first was a young man extremely handsome, and of an excellent garb, whose suit, though in the Country was very rich, and seemed fresh and new. As soon as Doralisa saw him, she began her Rally: This stranger (said she to the Princess) who soever he is, is doubtless more liberal then Mexaris; for since he is so rich and neat in his travel, what would he be at such a meeting as this? His deportment does easily persuade (replied the Princess) that he is one of Heroique virtue, and much takes my opinion of him. However, since the lustre of the Princess Beauty did shine no less in his eyes, then his behaviour was high in hers; and since the dress wherein she was that day did contribute much unto her Beauty, so he seemed to be much surprized, and imagined, Page 14 that perhaps she might be the Princess of Lydia: Yet since he was not certain, he stood a while unresolved what to do: but at last, fearing to run into an error, in making himself known unto one; whom he knew not who she was; and on the other side, being loath to fail in those respects which were due unto a Princess, whose beauty, ayre, and habit, spoke to be of a most high Quality: He went out of the way, and stayed to let her pass, and bowed with a most low reverence: As long as she was within reach of his eyes, he stood still and gazed after: The Princess also turned her self to look upon him, but meeting with each others eyes, she looked no longer. As soon as this stranger had lost the sight of her, he rid a few paces towards Sardis. Afterwards, his curiosity to know who this Beauty was encreasing; and having observed that we left the great rode, and took streight forward, he took such a way as possibly he might meet with us again, and to have the delight of seeing the Princess once more; his project did hit, and better then he looked for. Be pleased to know Madam, that the Princess being come unto a place of the Wood where stood a Fountain, she stayed there, because she found it much cooler then any where else, she had a desire to rest her self there for a while; So that both she and we alighting from our horses, she sat down upon the grass which grew by the side of the Fountain: But she was no sooner set, then she perceived she had lost a Picture which the Princess Palmis had given her, and which was in a Case of Diamonds most rich, yet that was not it which most troubled her; but it grieved her very much that the Princess Palmis might so justly chide her for losing so negligently that thing which she had given her as an especial testimony of her affection; so that exceedingly vexing her self for the loss, she commanded the two servants that waited to tie their Horses unto Trees, and go the same way they came, to try if happily they could find this Picture, not that she had any great hopes of finding it, after so many turnings and windings in a great thick Wood: But since she had a confused kind of memory that she had not it when she met this handsom stranger; and since it is the quality of every one that lose any thing to look for it as well in places where it cannot be, as where it is, therefore she sent these two servants unto the place where she met this stranger: Perinthus did envy their employment, and would have gone thither himself, imagining that he could find any thing which the Princess lost better then another, but it was her pleasure to have him stay with her. Mean while, since these two servants had never been in the Park before, they mistook the way, and took another, so that all their labour was in vain; yet they were diligent in search, and that so long, that the Princess dispaired of ever finding it, seeing they returned no sooner: But presently this handsom stranger appeared, who being more fortunate then they, had found this Picture; So that seeking for an occasion to speak unto the Princess, and making no question but this Picture was hers, since he found it in that place where she passed; and addressing himself unto her in a handsom garb, and with much reverence; Madam said he in the Lydian language, and presenting the Picture which she so much lamented, It is my happy fortune to find that which you have lost, and my honor to restore unto your fair hands that thing, which questionless must needs be very valuable in your esteem: The Princess rising up as soon as she saw the stranger address himself towards her, she knew the Case as soon as she saw it, and taking it with much joy; Generous stranger (said she unto him) had not this which you restore been given me by the Princess of Lydia, I should at least have offered you the Case, and received only the Picture: But since I dare not be too liberal of so great a Princesses favours, especially unto a man of that ayre which your countenance promi[s]eth. I beseech you accept of my thankful acknowledgments, until I meet with an opportunity to serve you in some as important way as this which you restore unto me is acceptable. Madam, answered he, I do think the service in restoring that which you do value, to be a most ample recompence. Whilst the Princess and this stranger were in discourse, Perinthus went unto one of his men, and inquired who he was. The man told him, that he was second Son to the King of Susiana, named Abradates, and Son also unto a Sister of Croessus, who was going into Sardis: So that Perinthus telling the same unto me, I acquainted the Princess in a low voice, during which time, the servant of Abradates inquired who the Princess was, and acquainted his Master, whilst I was informing the Princess concerning him: So that both knowing who each other was, there appeared much joy in both their eyes: Abradates doubled his respects, and the Princess her civilities. I do esteem my self most happy, said he unto her, that one minute of my life hath been spent in the service of so fair a Princess. And truly I think my self very happy, replied Page 15 she, in being thus obliged all the rest of my life unto so great a Princess, of whom Fame speaks so loud in his commendations. As they were thus in discourse, a great noyse of Horses was heard, and immediately after, the Princesses Palmis, Anaxilea, the Prince Atis, Artesilas, Mexaris, Myrsiles, and Cleander appeared, who without any minding of Abradates, alighted from their horses, and began to chide the Princess, for preferring solitude before the Chase, and for not being at the death of the Hart. The Chase which I have had, replied she, and smiled, hath been more happy then yours; and I am confident you will confess it (said she, and presented Abradates unto the Prince Atis, and the Princess Palmis) when you know that I have had the company of the Prince of Susiana, of whom you have heard such Noble reports. At the same time, a servant unto the Prince Atis, who had been at Susa, came to his Master, and confirmed the truth: Then did every one receive Abradates with extream joy, and afterwards with a thousand welcomes and civilities. I do confess (said the Princess Palmis to Panthea) that your Chase hath been more happy then ours, and that you merit all the honour. The greatest advantage is mine, replied Abradates, since I have been presented unto you by so fair and illustrious a hand. You do not stand in need of any such advantageous helps (replied the Princess Palmis) to render you considerable. For my part, said Panthea, I have stood in need of his help, for without it, I should have sustained a lamentable loss; and then she related the adventure of the Princess of Palmis her Picture. Since the place where they were was very pleasant, they stayed there almost an hour; but afterwards, Cleander told them it was time to go and refresh themselves at a Castle on the furthest end of the Park, close by the Lake of Gyges, over against the Tomb of Alliates, and so the Princes and Princesses all together went to this Castle, where a magnificent Banquet and admirable Musique waited for them: In going thither, Mexaris did close by Panthea, but he had not the freedom of discourse with her, because the Prince Abradates did also ride close by her: In the mean time, the poor Perinthus followed after all, fretted to the heart, to see how the beauty of Panthea made every one Adorers that looked upon her: Yet as he since told me, he had this poor comfort in his thoughts; that persons of her Quality are seldom married unto such Princes as loves them, or as they love; and therefore his hope was, that if ever any enjoyed her, it would be some Prince, who married her perhaps more out of some reason of State, then any affection. But whilst he was thus entertaining his own thoughts, Doralisa and I observed how Abradates did continually eye Panthea, with extraordinary attention, not only in the way to the Castle, but during all the time of the Banquet and Musique; one would have thought that she only of all the company was fair, not that he was at all uncivil, or neglected any respects due unto the Princess of Lydia: But for all that, it was an easie matter to discover by his looks, that the Princess of Clasomena's beauty did penetrate deeper into his heart, then any others. Mexaris perceived it as well as we, and Perinthus much more; and I am perswaded that Panthea her self from this very first day did begin to understand the prodigious effects that her Beauty did produce in the heart of Abradates. For be pleased to know Madam, that (as he hath told me since) he was so desperately in Love this very first sight, that his passion would not admit of any augmentation ever since. In the mean time, after all the Ladies had most pleasantly passed away this day, they returned to Sardis in their Chariots; every Prince did ride next them who did most attract their inclinations; to wit, Artesilas and Cleander close by the Chariot of the Princess Palmis, the Prince Atis next that of Anaxila, Mexaris, Abradates, and Perinthus, next the Princess of Clasomena. When we were come unto Sardis, all the Princes did lead their Ladies unto the Chamber of the Princess Palmis; after which, the Prince Atis carried Abradates unto the Chamber of Croessus, and presented him unto him, who received him with many testimonies of affection and joy: For since he always loved the Queen of Susiana his Sister very well, from whom he had received a Letter which did intimate the voyage of this Prince, he was much ravished to see him in his Court, and to find him of so fine behaviour and spirit. The Princess his Mother was so careful in instructing him in the Lydian language, that he spoke it so exactly, and without any accent of a stranger, that every one admired him. We understood within a few daies after, that Abradates was to stay a long time in this Court, because he stood not upon good terms with the King his Father, for driving on the Interests of the Queen his Mother with too much zeal, against an Elder Brother of his, who though he had not so much virtue as he, yet was to succeed in the Kingdom: So that the King of Susiana having with much injustice Page 16 threatened to imprison him, the Queen his Mother desired protection from the King of Lydia her Brother for this her Darling Son, who had not lost his Fathers favour, but only for the love of her. The cause of Abradates his exile being well accepted of by Croesus, he bad him exceedingly welcome, and after his example, so did all the Court; and truly it was but a just due unto his merit, for certainly a more accomplished Prince was never seen then the Prince Abradates. Also, when Panthea was returned home from the Hunting to her own lodging, she continually spoke of him all that night, which was not at all pleasant unto Perinthus, who was present when she related all the pleasant adventure unto the Prince her Father. The next morning Abradates performed a ceremonious visit unto the Princess Palmis, where the Princess of Clasomena, and all the Court were present; and the same day towards night he went unto Panthea as soon as he heard she was returned from the Kings Palace. Some daies passed, before any discovered the affection of Abradates, unless it were Mexaris, Perinthus, Doralisa, and my self: But afterwards it was as apparent as the Sun, for his discourse was all upon her beauty and wit, and he never neglected the least occasion of seeing her. Since the Love of Mexaris was not yet divulged, Abradates gave no check unto his growing passion; and was ignorant how that Prince had any interest in the Princess Panthea; so that clearly submitting himself unto the charms of this admirable beauty, he made no secret of his passion. In the mean while Mexaris, whose Love had took as deep root in his heart, as any thing that was not gold could in the heart of a covetous man, began to publish it, but truly it was after a manner much different from his Rivals, so that it might rightly be said, that never were two Princes more unlike in all things then these two: For Madam, as the state of Abradates his fortunes then stood, it was very like that he would be compelled to live all his life an exile, without any other estate or fortune then his own virtue, nor any subsistence, but either what the Queen his Mother did secretly convey unto him, or what Croessus would please to give him. As for Mexaris, the case was otherwise with him, for he was not inferior in riches unto the King his Brother: And as there was a great disparity in their fortunes, so there was a greater in their dispositions, for Avarice was the rule of all Mexaris his actions, and Liberality was the predominate virtue of Abradates: Indeed, I think this Prince was as liberal as valiant, and as valiant as man could be: Mexaris on the contrary was hide-bound in all things; if he built any thing, he would always have some sparing trick or other, which wasted and spoiled all the rest of the expences which he had been at: If at any time he gave any thing, it would be always too late and little, and commonly with a melancholy grudging complement: His attendance was big enough, but shabbed and ill accoutred: His Table was little, and naught for so great a Prince as he was; and disguizing his covetousness under some weak pretence he commonly wore very mean cloaths; saying, It was much folly to purchase any esteem unto ones self by such expences: If at any time he played at any game, he played for a price, not recreation; and considering how he would chafe when he lost, it was palpable, that it was rather a Trade then a sport unto him: The truth is, it appeared by all his actions, and sometimes by his very words, that the limits of all the magnificence which was in his narrow heart, extended only to himself, and no further; this base disposition was the reason that none loved him: But on the contrary, Abradates though an exile, was so free and liberal, that all the world adored him, and wished him all the treasures of the other: The manner of his Presents was such, as how small soever they were in themselves, yet they were esteemed as great: He conferred his gifts not only speedily, but with alacrity and joy, and one could not any way more sensibly oblige him, then to accept his favours; his Retinue was magnificent and handsome, his Table was open and good, he always wore rich and good cloaths; if at any time he lost at play, it was without turbulence or anger; he sought for occasions to give, as Mexaris shunned them: He carried it so, that he not only the glory of all the good deeds which he really did, but also of those which he did not, but would have done if he had been rich: And certain there had not been any man of parts in a wanting condition in all the Court of Lydia, if Abradates had been as rich as Mexaris. After this Madam, you may easily judg, that Love produced very contrary effects in the souls of these two Princes, their designs also had contrary success, yet did they act alike in all things: For Mexaris was in all things which would put him to no expence, no less obsequious and complaisant then Abradates: And knowing how Panthea affected Doralisa, and esteemed Perinthus, he would comply, and seem to love them also, inso much as this secret Lover of the Princess was extremely vexed to receive a thousand civilities from his Rivals, which he was obliged to Page 17 return; yet was it some consolation for him to see, that in all likelihood Panthea would never love Mexaris, by reason of his base disposition, and that she would never marry Abradates by reason of his low fortunes; so that straining himself, he rendered unto both these Princes all due respects, but spoke as little as possible he could: And since he was too wife to speak openly all the ill he thought of Mexaris, and too amorous to commend Abradates, he accorded both as much as he could: So that carrying fair, both with the Princess and both his Rivals, his life was a mixture of sweet and bitter hours. In the mean time, these two Princes as amorous as they were, had neither of them so much confidence as to discover their passions, when Adrastus Brother unto the King of Phrygia came into this Court, to be purged of that crime which he had innocently committed: The Ceremony of which being performed in the Temple of Jupiter the Expiator, it chanced that Abradates was not well that morning, and could not be there; and coming after Dinner unto the Princess, and finding her alone, she asked him the reason why he was not at the Ceremony? Madam, the reason is, replied he, because I do not much desire to know how it is done, since to tell you truly, if I have committed any crime it is not Jupiter that must pardon me: Yet he is the greatest of the Gods, replied she: Most true, said he, but it is his pleasure to leave it unto other Divinities, of whom he is Supreme, to remit those crimes which are committed against them. For my part, said Panthea, I do not think you have offended any, or that you came unto this Court upon the same reason that Adrastus did: 'Tis very true Madam (replied Abradates) his destiny and mine are different, for he came in a criminal, and I shall go out one: If so, said she you may be justified as he is: Then Madam (said he unto her) it is you who must pardon my boldness, in presuming to love you above all the world. Panthea being extremely surprized at this discourse, though she was not ignorant of his passion, yet she looked upon him and blush'd, and being to speak with more severity in her eyes: I know very well, said she unto him, that it is the common custome of the World to take such language as this only as bare civility, and to let it pass as a piece of Gallantry spoken without any further design: But I am perswaded there are some, who perhaps could wish such words twice spoken, because they give no credit to the first: Yet since I have been obliged unto you from the very first minute of our acquaintance, and does infinitely esteem you; therefore I must with all sincerity tell you, that whether you spoke those words in earnest, or in jest, the boldness does much displease me. And let me further tell you, since I would be loath to rank you in the Catalogue of Indifference, that it will be more advantageous to you, to use such language no more, and not to fail in that respect which is due unto one (I do not say of my Quality) but of that virtue which I profess. Can it be Madam, (replied he) that the less I speak of my passion, the more violent you will believe it? I do not say so (answered she, and smiled, whether she would or no:) But I tell you (said she, and assumed a more serious countenance) that if you speak any more of it, I shall as long as I live think that you do not esteem me, and by consequence I shall be less beholding to you. How Madam (cried he out) is it a testimony of disesteem to tell you, that I adore you? If so Madam I shall say no more. But I beseech you Madam interpret my silence always as it ought to be, and remember as often as you see me alone with you, and speak not a word, that then my heart says you are the fairest upon earth, and that I reverence you with an unparalleled devotion, and shall love you as long as I shall live. As Panthea was ready to answer, Mexaris and Doralisa came into the Chamber, but her looks gave such a sharp answer unto the poor Abradates, that if he could have suffered his Rival to have been alone with Panthea, he would have immediately quitted the Chamber; But having not so much power over himself he stayed, and was pleasing enough in his conversation all the day, much company coming in within a quarter of an hour after. At first the discourse was only of the Ceremony in the morning, unto which the Princess Panthea added not a word, because it had given a subject unto Abradates to discover his Love; but desiring to turn it into something else, she began to talk unto Doralisa upon some affair of matters. But passing insensibly from one discourse into another, every one began to chide Doralisa, for wishing Nature to work a miracle in favour of her self, and make up an accomplished man without the helps of Love, every one asked if she had changed her mind: Since Mexlaris had formerly loved another besides the Princess, he began to argue against Doralisa, and maintain his own case; and since Abradates had never been in love, he seconded her reasons, for saying, that she would never accept of any heart that had been scorched Page 18 n any other flames besides her own. Perinthus gave a listening ear unto what his Rivals said, and endeavoured to guess at the thoughts of the Princess: Tell me Doralisa (said Mexaris to her) What reasons can you give for scorning all compleat men, only because they have been in Love with some other before your self? The number of them is so large (replied she) that I cannot tell which I shall give you first, and truly that is the greatest difficulty of my answer. I cannot believe it so easie a matter (replied Mexaris) to maintain your error with all the wit you have; for what does that which is past concern you, as long as you know it not? By what is past (replied she) I can judg at the future; for whosoever can quit another for me, give me some cause of fear that he can quit me for another whom yet he knows not, but may perhaps hereafter know her: But have you any better security for the fidelity of that man who never loved any but your self? (replied Mexlaris) Such a one, replied Abradates, did never give so bad an example, and there is greater grounds of hope that his first passion will be constant, then there is to believe that one who has loved many will ever become constant: It cannot be doubted, replied Doralisa: But the worst of it is, I could never meet with a man of my Quality who is such a one as I wish, one that will love me, and never was in Love before: As for such as wear so many several fetters, as suits of cloaths, and offer two or three Sacrifices with one and the same Victime, in offering the self-same heart unto two or three Ladies one immediately after another, I cannot endure them, but should use them scurvily as long as I lived: I may perhaps meet with such compleat men as will serve to make friends of, but I'll have none such to be my Lovers, for I can never believe that any who can quit a black Beauty for a fair, or a fair for a brown, can ever have any constancy of heart: Admit (said Mexaris unto her) that one should meet with a heart of flint, which nothing can mollify; were it not wisdom to cure the misery by a discreet retreat; and if such a one do afterwards love another, why should he be taxed with inconstancy, when as he would not have changed, if he had been more favourably entertained? Though I should not tax such a one with inconstancy, replied Doralisa, yet is he such a one as I should never favour, since he is but the refuse of another. Admit her rigour proceeded from a phantastical and extravagant disposition (replied Mexaris) Why would you treat such an unfortunate Lover with rigour? Because such a man as would ever love such phantastical and extravagant Woman as you speak of (replied Doralisa) would never honor me by assuming my Chains. The truth is, whether he loved a mild or severe disposition, whether he have been well or ill treated, whether he did reject, or was rejected: All's one to me, I should never love him that ever loved any besides my self: If he have been severely used, he knows by example how to be severe; if he have been favourably treated, I will think, that since the favours of another could not keep him, mine cannot neither; If he betrayed his Mistriss, there is no trusting of him; If it was she who forsook him, it is to be conceived that he has made himself unworthy by some secret crime or other which we know not of, or at least it is to be feared, he was either phantastical or jealous. Moreover, if she whom he loved be fair, there is no security of his loving me, since he hath quitted her, if she be not fair, it is to be thought that he relished her so ill, that he will quit me for one that is fairer: Therefore if ever I permit any to love me, it must be an entire heart, and none of those that has been pierced with a thousand Arrows; it shall be a heart, I say, which is sensible of the least touch, and not one that is hardned with the rigour of another; freshness and newness in love, as in o'ther things, is a grace: And whosoever will ever hope to be acceptable, in my esteem, he must perswade me that I am, and ever shall be, his first and last love. I do profess (said Abradates) that I think the opinion of Doralisa to be very just; and so much the more replied Panthea, because by taking up that resolution, doubtless one resolves never to love any, because it is to desire an impossibility: I must needs concur with you in that opinion, replied Abradates; So do not I (replied Doralisa) For I do not hold it a thing impossible, that one should love but one only in all their life. The great difficulty of all is to find out a compleat man, who never loved any but me. The Princess would perswade me Sir (said she, and addressed her speech unto Abradates) that Perinthus was never in Love; and truly though I have much ado to believe it, yet I see that I can't win much upon his heart, therefore I will give over all thoughts of any Conquests. The Conquest of me (replied Perinthus, a little surprized) would add so little honour unto you Madam, that questionless you are not sorry for it: Really Perinthus, said the Princess, you are too much in good earnest, and Doralisa will perswade me that you are Page 19 in Love indeed; for if you did not fear that she whom perhaps you love, should know what answer you give unto Doralisa, doubtless you would have returned her a more civil answer. You may think what you please Madam (replied he) but I do not think what I said to be any incivility, but that rather it deserves the name of Respect. There is a kind of respect so hollow and indifferent (replied Doralisa) as does not at all oblige one: But however Perinthus, I am more indulgent then you think I am, for I do not complain against you? yet notwithstanding to find out the cause of that incivility which the Princess doth tax you with, I shall keep an observant eye over you, to the end I may more plainly discover, whether such an accomplished man as you are can be, and not be in Love. And since my own eye cannot be always over you, I will entreat both all your friends and mine to observe you, as well as I will, and to give me an account of your visits, of your addresses, of your words, of your Studies, of your melancholies, and if it be possible of your very dreams. For my part (said the Princess) I will be the first that promisheth to tell you all I know concerning him. You shall when you please Madam, replied he, know all that I myself know: No, no, said she, It is not by any verbal relations, but by a hundred passages which you never think upon, that I will know how to assure Doralisa you love none. Perinthus is very happy (said Mexaris) in that you will honour him so far, as to observe his actions, For my part, I should limit my ambition to aspire no higher then such a favour: What I do for Perinthus, replied the Princess, I would not do unto all the world; for truly I do desire to dive into his heart, because I think there are no secrets in it, or at least none such as I can have any interest in. Are you more inquisitive Madam (replied Abradates) after such things as does not concern you, then after such as do? Yes, in some things, replied she: But however, in order to the satisfaction of Doralisa (added the Princess, desiring to turn the discourse) I do entreat every one here to aid her in the discovery of that truth which she desires to know, and to observe Perinthus most vigilantly upon all occasions: Truly Madam (replied Perinthus) if there be no passion in my soul, then you put all these illustrious persons unto an unprofitable trouble; and if there be any in my soul, then you expose him who has eternally devoted himself unto your service, to a most severe punishment: However it be Perinthus (replied she) it must be so: Then did she cause every one that was there to promise her in particular, to acquaint Doralisa with all they knew concerning Perinthus: So that Mexaris and Abradates, as well as all the rest, did promise her they would, and so that the poor Perinthus had the misfortune to see his Rivals made his Spies; yet could they not find what they sought after, for their aims were never levelled at that mark, which this unfortunate Lover looked at. Thus Madam was the first day spent, in which Abradates discovered his passion unto the Princess Panthea, who since that day did prevent all opportunities to talk with him in private, not but that she did highly esteem him, and perhaps also had a good inclination to him: But considering the state of his fortunes, she thought him no convenient match, and therefore she would add no fuel to those flames which she saw began to kindle in him, but lived with him after a more reserved manner then ordinary; yet since it was always with much civility, this reservedness was rather a pair of Bellows to blow that fire in his heart, then a means to extinguish it: So that the more reserved Panthea was, the more earnest was Abradates to see her, and follow her in all places; his addresses and Courtships were not only to her self, but unto her Father also, and also to get the love of Perinthus, Doralisa, my self, and all the servants, even of the meanest; and to speak the truth, he obtained his desires; for except Perinthus (who could not love him, because he loved the Princess) all the world was his: Some he gained by presents, others by obliging language, all by a free, open, and lovely aspect, which none could resist. Moreover, since all his own servants did ever adore him, they were continually presenting Elogies, in commendation of their Master, unto the servants and women of the Princess. On the other side, all the servants of Mexaris were continually complaining of their Masters nigerality, and of the little that was to be gotten in his service, so that nothing was to be heard in Panthea's house but commendums of Abradates, and Satires against his Rival. In the mean time, since Mexaris thought the souls of others to be like his own, he conceived that as a means to move the heart of the Princess, and to induce her to receive the first protestations of his Love more favourably, it were first expedient to shew her the magnificence of his Treasures; which as I have already told you, were almost equal to the riches of Croessus. Then did he invent how he might get her unto his house under some handsome colour, Page 20 which might not put him unto over-much expences: And after he had well thought upon it, he resolved to invite her to hear the Kings Musick (which would cost him nothing) in a great vaulted Room, which was very fit for the sound of Instruments: So that the Proposition being made by the Princess Palmis, whom he desired to do him that office, it took effect within a few daies after. When Doralisa and I heard that the Prince Mexlaris did invite the Princess unto this Musick at his own house, then did we believe his Love would break out in good earnest; and that we should see he was not grown unto such an ill habit, but this passion might correct him. Then did we long for this day, with as much impatience, as was in Abradates and Perinthus; for the first of these began now to perceive that his Uncle was his Rival, and the other perceived it from the very first. In the mean time, since the Love of Abradates could not be perswaded by any reason, he prepared himself to suffer the worst that could come: Mexaris for his part, made no question, but the very sight of such a vast Treasure would work as much for him, as against Abradates, when Panthea should see it; so that he longed for the day and hour when this Assembly should be at his house; and he gave such orders, that there should not be one Room in all his house wherein there should not be some signs of the riches and magnificence belonging to the late King of Lydia his Father, who since Mexlaris was his Darling, gave him half of all his Treasures: Nothing could be imagined more magnificent and sumptuous, then all this that was shewed unto the Princess in this house; for not only all the ground Rooms, all the Chambers and Galleries, were most richly furnished, but also there was one Gallery, and three Closets, full of most rare, rich, and precious things, not only Statues and Pictures, but abundance of prodigious Cabinets, Vessels of gold and silver set with precious stones of an inestimable value. There was also great figures of gold, and Dishes of Agath, and Oriental Alabaster enriched with Diamonds: It may rightly be said, that all the chief works of the Sun and Nature were to be seen in that place; Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, Rubies, and all manner of precious stones. After a sight of all these, Mexaris let the Princess Panthea see one admirable thing then all these; and the principal reason why he shewed it unto her, I believe was, because it should give him an occasion to speak of his Love. I make no question Madam but you have heard tell of that famous Ring of Gyges, who, as you know very well, did usurp the Crown from Heraclides, and who was the first King of Lydia of the Race of Croessus: You are not ignorant, I say, how it was by means of this Ring that he got up on the Throne, and afterwards, by the miraculous virtue thereof, he made himself invisible unto the King Candalus, whose life he took away. Alliatte loving Mexaris better than he did Croessus, amongst the rest of his Treasuries did leave him this. After this Prince had shewed all these unto the Princess Panthea, he called her unto a Table of pure Gold set with Stones, upon which stood a little Cabinet of Agatte, he took out this rare Ring. Madam, said he unto her, after an offer of all these things which I have shewed you, in offering you the heart of him that owns them, I dare not put this Ring into your hands, lest as a punishment for my boldness, you should deprive of her sight who is the fairest upon earth; therefore it is requisite you see the experiment of it by the means of some other. Though the Princess had often heard of the wonderful Quality of this Jewel, yet she was much taken with it; when Mexaris called one of his servants who knew how to hold it, and caused him to shew its virtue: She observed, that when he turned the Stone towards himself, he absolutely vanished out of the sight of all the company; so that without any answer unto the Princess Mexaris but this, that it was impossible this could be without Inchantment. All the company were no less amazed at it then her self; and to say truly, the thing is so full of wonder, that though one had seen it before an hundred times, yet one shall be still admiring at it; for as long as any one held this Stone, which is called the Heliotropus, and is found in Ethiopia, one shall be absolutely invisible.

Is it possible said the Princess Araminta, and interrupted her, that it should have such a Quality as you speak of? It is most certainly, true Madam, replied Pherenice: For my part, said Cyrus, I have long since inquired of several persons, whether there was any truth in those reports of the virtue in the Heliotropus; and if I may speak it without any incivility unto Pherenice, though a hundred several persons have assured me that it is very true, yet I must confess I had much ado to believe it; though when one considers the marvellous quality of the Adamant which attracts steel with so much violence, that it Page 21 seems to assume life, and follows it, it must be confessed nothing is more to be admired: So the sight, being of all the senses most easie to be deluded, it is not impossible, but that there may come out of this Stone a certain kind of brightness which may dazzle the eyes of beholders, or which may beget a kind of Mist that may cloud the person which carries it from the eyes of those that are standers by. Moreover, there is another Stone called the Amianthus, which every one knows, upon which the fire makes no impression, nor can consume; this if well considered, is no less admirable then the Heliotropus: The brightness of a Stone may as well take away the sight, or at least suspend the use of it, as the Basilisk can kill with a look. Araminta being convinced by the discourse of Cyrus, concurred with him in opinion, and Pherenice proceeded in her story.

When every one had admired this miracle of Nature, the cause whereof was so secret a mystery, the Princess Panthea would needs take this Ring, though Mexaris was exceeding against it, telling her he could not endure she should be invisible to him, who of all men in the world took greatest delight in seeing her, yet he could not prevent it, but must be contented. After this Ring had wrought its effect in her hands, Doralisa took it, and when she had it, she went and told the Princess, she desired that Mexaris might always wear it. For my part (answered Panthea in a low voice) I would not wish that for your sake, for then he might often understand all the ill you use to say of him. In the mean time, Mexaris imagined it to be a short minute of pleasure to take away the sight of his Rival from Panthea, and therefore told Doralisa, that perhaps Abradates would be glad to make the experiment upon himself as well as she: Then this Prince taking the Ring, and going to the Princess, he told her in so low a voice as none could hear; that if Mexaris did not make use of this very often in coming to tell her of his passion, he was as simple as covetous. As the Princess could not chuse but laugh at what Abradates told her, Mexaris knew thereby, that this invisible man made use of his Ring otherwise then he wished: So that being vexed that his design took no better effect, he could not hold from venting some expressing of displeasure. But Abradates was so pleased with vexing his Rival, and since Panthea began to laugh, he told her many other things very low, which made her laugh so heartily at the chafing of Mexaris, that she could return him no answers; yet notwithstanding she excused the matter, and said it was impossible not to laugh when she heard one close by her, and could not see him. But at length, fearing least this Rallary should produce some sad consequence, she desired Abradates to restore her the Ring, which he did; after which, she gave it to Perinthus, and Perinthus to another, so that there was not one in all the company which had not the experiment: But at last they restored it unto Mexaris, who locked it up very carefully: After which the Musick began, which was seconded with a short collation, suitable to the avarice of him that gave it, and very unworthy of the company to whom it was presented, yet was it served up in twenty four Basons which were the godliest in the world, but his slovenly servants were so thrifty for their Master, that the least Bason was worth a hundred of such collations. I leave you to imagine Madam, whether this was not sport unto Abradates, Perinthus, and Doralisa. Methinks (said Doralisa to me) Mexaris should not have left off his Ring till after this Banquet, but by it have concealed his shame to see it so poor. His best course had been, said Perinthus, to have made it and himself both invisible: The Princess did easily guess what we talked on, when she turned towards us, and much feared least Mexaris should perceive it; so that to prevent exceptions, she did fall to a very bad repast out of her complaisance, and told him confidently, that it was an admirable good one: One might easily see, he hardly believed her, and yet he thought it good enough, because it cost him but a little; and thus the rest of the day passed on. Mexaris making no question, but that after a sight of so much wealth and fine things, he should find Panthea very gracious unto him, the first time he spoke of his passion unto her. In the mean while, Abradates did emulate his Rival, for having the start of him in entertaining Panthea, and began to think which way he might obtain the like happiness. For the furtherance of his intention, he found out that there was a great number of Phrygian Musicians then in Sardis, and you know the Lydian and Phrygian Musick is conceived to be the rarest, not only of all Asia, but all the world, yet those who had heard them both were of various opinions, according unto the conformity of their several humours to those various harmonies: Those who were of melancholy inclinations, or had passionate souls, preferred the Lydians; and Page 22 those whose temper were more sprightly, and pleasant, gave the prize unto the Phrygians; But all sides did agree, that both did merit much commendations. Abradates then making use of this controversie to bring about his design, did so foment the contest, that the next day after the entertainment of Mexaris nothing else was discoursed upon at the Princess of Clasmoma's lodging, who without declaring her self either for the one or the other, only said, That before any exact judgment could be given, it were requisite to hear them both on the same day, with a premeditated intention to observe them very well; and that those who were competent Judges in such matters should have knowledge in the art of Musique, and be impartial persons. It were requisite also, said Abradates, that to put the Musicians equally into a good humour, a prize should be propounded unto that side which should excel, to the end they might both of them strive to do their best. After this, it was thought upon, in what place was the most convenient to hear them; and one of the Kings houses, which was about thirty furlongs from the Town, was nam'd most convenient. Now since all the company did think this only a Proposition, which would never be put in execution, each one began to order the business, only to drive on discourse. In the mean while Abradates, who had not so lamely contrived the business as to leave it imperfect, did say, that the greatest defect would be the want of a fit person to be a Judge. I do conceive (said Mexaris, who was then with the Princess) that there is no great difficulty in that, but where will you find one that will give the prize unto those who are judged best, and be at the charges of the Feast? When the person who is fit to be a Judge is named, (replied Abradates, and smiled) it will be no great piece of difficulty to find the other; for I think it a much more easie matter to find Gold and Jewels, then to find one that is accomplished with all requisite qualities to pronounce Judgment equally in such a Nice, and rare business as this. Yet Madam, (said he, and looked upon the Princess) if you will be pleased to take the pains I am most certain it would then be done without injustice, for you both know Musique, and love it, and most undoubtedly would be equitable. Mexaris did approve of this Proposition, and so likewise did every one, saying, that Abradates spoke all reason. The Princess did deny to take it upon her very resolutely, and would have persisted in that denial, if the Princess Palmis had not came in, who hearing of her refusal, did extremely condemn her modesty, and told her, that if she her self did understand Musique as well as she did, she would not deny the desire. In conclusion Madam she consented, and it was a thing resolved upon, that three daies hence they should go unto the Castle which I told you of before, and that he who made the Proposition, should provide the Musique, not imagining there would be any other provision. In the mean time Madam, this generous minded Lover, who was composed of Liberty, did not carry it like unto Mexaris; for never was Feast more magnificent and gallant. To have a little more time for preparation, Abradates procured the Musicians to ask five daies more to be added to the other three, that they might better consort their Musique: So that as if it was no motion proceeding from Abradates, it was deferred until then, at which time every one resorted to the place appointed. I will not give you Madam a Catalogue of all that were there, only say that the whole Court was present; nor will I make any exact description of the magnificence, for the truth is, it was such that I cannot. Let me tell you the entertainment was most admirable, both for the neatness of the order, and the abundance of every thing rare and delicate that the place and season did afford: He also prepared a great number of Golden Meddals for the Princess, on which her Picture was engraved with a facetious devise, that she might give them unto those Musicians whom she thought most worthy. Moreover, as Presents for the Ladies, he had provided abundance of several sorts of most curious and delightful Toys, as Perfumes, Sweet Waters, Essences, Powders, and such like, which she was to present unto those who kept silence during the Musique, or unto those who most commended the Musicians, or unto whom she pleased; and so under several pretences of Gallantry and Wit, there was not a Lady, nor any of any Quality, which carried not away some ingenuous remembrance of the Feast. The Princess her self, as well as the rest, did participate of Abradates his Liberality: And the Musicians, in favour of whom Panthea did not declare her self, also received very bountiful Presents. The Princess knowing it, did ask him what difference there was between the Conquerours and the conquered: But his answer was, that the Gold which carried her Image, and passed through her fair hands, was of a far higher rate then that which passed only through his, and which had not the representation of her Beauty: Page 23 And truly Madam, it is so great a misfortune to want your judicious approbation, that those who had not the honours to obtain it, did stand in need of some Cordials to comfort them. All this while Mexaris was desperate to see himself out-done by the magnificence of Abradates, and to hear all the Ladies commend him. Perinthus also at the root of his heart was no less troubled; for having bounded his desires that Panthea would love no body, he was exceedingly grieved to see Abradates so amiable, Courty and indulgent to move affection: So that for all his forceings of himself, he was so very melancholly all that day, as Doralisa took notice of him, and caused the Princess to observe him also, who beginning to chide him, did put him to the necessity of an answer for himself: And to colour the matter, he told her, that Musique ever used to have that operation in him, and he could give her no other reason. For my part, said Doralisa, this seems to me a certain sign that you are not the same you seem to be, for men of hard and flinty souls are never sensible of Musique; but without all question you either are in Love, or have been, since Harmony has such a power upon your Spirits, that it makes you melancholly. It may be the reason is, said the Princess, because Perinthus is so far from loving, that he hates the Musique, and is weary of waiting upon it so long. Oh Madam (cried he out) I had rather Doralisa should think me such a man as she looks for, and that they should suspect me to be in Love, then to think I am so stupid, as not to love Musique: And since Madam you do love it, and think I hate it, I am afraid you entertain an ill opinion of me: Not at all, replied she, for do you not meet with many very rational men, who neither love it, or can endure to hear it: 'Tis true, replied Perinthus, But certainly such men in my apprehension are men of dull sordid souls, and it ought to be blamed as a great fault. Do you think it a greater fault (said the Prince Altis, who was present at this entertainment) to have ears, and not love Musique, then to have eyes, and not love Beauty, as you have? Perinthus blushed at this question, and had been extremely puzzled for an answer, if Doralisa, as good luck was, had not said, No, no, Sir, Do not deceive your self, I cannot believe Perinthus to be insensible, I did never in my life see such a man as he that was so; certainly he does love, let him say or do what he will. For my part (said Abradates, to shew his obedience unto the Princess in observing Perinthus) I begin to be of Doralisa's opinion, for I have seen him all this day so reserved and retired, that I do not think any passion except Love can so much alter his humour. Mexaris added, that he had seen him pronounce some words in a low voice to himself alone: Another said, he would often fix his eyes, and muse without regard unto any passage. And indeed there was not one in all the company which had not something or other true or false to bring in against him, which moved every one to think him in Love, and his Rivals employed all their wits to perswade the Princess of it; yet was all this so far from being any addition of happiness, that on the contrary it procured him much misery, insomuch as he hath told me since, that he was amazed he did not discover some evident symptoms of that passion which possessed his soul: Yet notwithstanding all this, he did cunningly disguise it, and thus was the rest of this day spent. But at our return to Sardis, these three Adorers of Panthea had thoughts much differing one from another: For Abradates was much joyed that the Princess seemed to be pleased with his entertainment: Mexaris was vexed to the heart at the liberality of Abradates, and it grieved his soul that he had come off in his Courtships better than himself. But as for the poor Perinthus his sorrows were unconceivable, to see Abradates so compleat a Gallant; yet he would sometimes comfort himself, in hopes that the state of his Fortunes would keep the Prince of Clasomena from bestowing his Daughter upon him. But alas, said he unto himself, the Princess may for all that bestow her heart upon him; yet (would he say) since her heart must never be mine, and since I shall never dare to ask it, what does it concern me, if Abradates have it? Is it not my duty to wish Panthea happy in elvery thing? And ought I not to desire, that if ever she marry, it may be unto such a Prince as loves her, and she can love? Yes doubtless I ought, if I do consider my self as a servant unto the Prince her Father, who infinitely honors me: But if I consider my self as Perinthus, who hath loved her from my Cradle, and shall do to my Coffin, I cannot chuse but wish that she would never love any; therefore what should I do but oppose Abradates in all his designs, and favour all the projects of Mexaris, whom I know she can never Love: I will imploy all the credit that I have with the Prince her Father to that end, and I will omit nothing that may supplant my Rival that is most dangerous out of the heart of Panthea. But do I know well what I say? (would he suggest to Page 24 himself) No, no, I do not; There is such variety of differing apprehensions in my soul, that I cannot distinguish between the suggestions of my passion, and the counsels of my reason: Alas (would he say, for he hath since told me every tittle of his thoughts) can I think that I have any reason at all? I, who cannot banish from my heart the most rash and stubborn passion that ever was? but who hath been so far from opposing it, that I have cherished it as much as possibly I could? and yet all this without the least hope, or knowing at what mark I aimed. I ever knew, that I was not loved, and I confess my hopes were, that none else ever should be, but I see Abradates so lovely, that I am afraid he will be loved again, and that I must die with despair. These Madam were the thoughts of Panthea's three Lovers, who for her part did think much upon Abradates; for besides her own inclination, both Doralisa and my self did nothing else for three daies together, but harp upon the liberality of Abradates, and the avarice of Mexaris: For my part (said Doralisa unto the Princess, one afternoon when none was with her) I am confident that if this Prince were not in Love, he would not be so liberal: But for all that (said I unto her) as much as you attribute unto Love, it must be confessed, that this passion does not produce such good effects in the Prince Mexaris; and by consequence it must be concluded, that Love does not create all virtues in men: 'Tis true, said Doralisa, yet I conceive that Love does in the hearts of men, as the Sun doth in all places where it shines, for the Sun does not plant Roses, but it ripens and blows them; So Love, it does not give the first root and inclinations of virtues, but it makes them grow and flourish; and questionless if Mexaris were not in Love, he would yet be more covetous than he is, he is grown to that height, replied the Princess, that if I should judg of his Love by his liberality, I should not think it very great; yet if the trouble in doing things do set a greater prize upon them, replied Doralisa, and laughed, you are much more obliged unto Mexaris than Abradates; for certainly that little which he hath done for you, hath stuck more upon his stomach, then all that his Rival hath done, did upon his: There is no doubt of it; replied the Princess, but his trouble proceeds from the baseness of his soul: For all that, I conceive it easie to maintain (said Doralisa, who infinitely esteemed Abradates) that he who gives a little trifle against the hair of his disposition, doth more oblige, then he who gives much, and in that gift doth follow his own inclination: You are very witty Doralisa (replied the Princess) but yet it is no such easie matter to defend the humours of a covetous man; and if there were any to judg the matter betwixt us, I dare undertake to maintain against you, that avarice is so far from setting any value upon any act whatsoever it be, that it entirely takes away all that such a one hath done, who is possessed with that base passion. If you will be pleased to admit of Perinthus for a Judg (said Doralisa, when she saw him come into the Chamber) I dare undertake the controversie, and once in my life dispute against you: I am contented, replied Panthea, upon condition Perinthus will without any impartial complacence speak his thoughts. That will be something difficult, (replied Perinthus, not yet knowing what they desired, because he understood only their last words) but after Doralisa had acquainted him with the subject of their contest, he apprehended that the liberality of Abradates, and the avarice of Mexaris, had caused the dispute, so that he did refuse to be Judg in a difference, wherein himself had a hidden interest, though he durst not reveal it; yet notwithstanding, the Princess did require and exact obedience from him, and he was forced to promise that he would judg the matter without any partiality or complacencie; and certainly he was as good as his word, as hereafter you shall know. After these conditions, the Princess told Doralisa, that it was her part to declare her reasons first; That I shall very easily, replied she, I shall only alledg some of the strongest Arguments, unto which you may reply, and interrupt me when you please, for I think it a good help unto one that cannot speak very readily, to be often interrupted. Although there is no need of such helps, replied Perinthus, yet you may chance to have interruption enough, for methinks I see the Prince Mexaris coming, and if I be not deceived, Abradates also, and indeed they entred one after another presently after. Though the Princess made signs unto Doralisa to turn the discourse another way, yet this crafty Lady seeming to misunderstand her, continued on: So that Mexaris and Abradates were no sooner entred, but Doralisa in her usual jocandry began to complain, that they had hindred her of the glory in overcoming the Princess, and I wonder Perinthus does not murmur, because you have deprived him of the greatest honour he ever had in his life. I was so unworthy of it; replied he, and should have so ill discharged the office, Page 31 that I am not sorry it is taken from me. As great an inclination as I have to advance your glory (replied Abradates, unto whom Doralisa addressed her speech) I must confess I am not sorry that I have hindred you from overcoming the Princess, who in my opinion deserves always to conquer; yet I must withall acknowledg my self very sorry that I have taken any advantage from Perinthus, therefore I beseech you acquaint us with the business: For my particular, said Mexaris, my desires do second Abradates, to the end that knowing the injury I have done, I may endeavour a remedy. Since the Princess imagined that Doralisa would out with all, she thought it better to make no secret of it; so that telling them the matter in controversie, but not the cause upon which it did first arise, both Princes did say, they should have been extremely sorry, if they had interrupted such pleasing discourse; though Mexaris expressed himself in a much more forced manner then Abradates did; and though he did not think himself to be a covetous man, yet I believe he knew he was far from prodigal. In the mean while Perinthus, who had so many secret resentments in his mind, that he was sorry he was very present, did use the best endeavours to prevent the giving his opinion upon so nice a matter: But Doralisa, seeing the Princess permitted her to speak, began thus to argue: Must it not be confessed Madam (said she unto her) that when our friends do no more for us, then what they do every day out of common course, we cannot count it the greatest service they can do us; and on the contrary, when we move them to do such things for us as go against the grain of their dispositions, we are more obliged unto them for doing things against their wills, then for doing things which is a pleasure to them in doing. This being thus, it must needs be confessed, that a covetous man who gives little, does more oblige one, then a liberal man who gives much, since the one hath much grief, the other much pleasure in giving. Truly Doralisa, said the Princess, since you allowed me to interrupt you, I cannot forbear; for I cannot allow, that because my friend is guilty of a most abominable vice, therefore I should be at all obliged unto him for that little which he bestowes more then unto him who is owner of an Heroique virtue: No, no, Doralisa, do not deceive your self, for there is no Justice or equity in it. Yet Madam (replied Doralisa) is there no recompence due unto this poor covetous man, for all the pain he puts himself unto in bestowing his little: I do not say, that he who gives against his mind deserves more commendations then the other; I am not so far out of my wits, but I do affirm, that he who loves that which he gives, and grieves for the parting from it, and cannot give it, unless it grate his heart, such a one, I say, does give greater testimony of his affection, then he who out of his generosity only can bestow great presents upon his very enemies: I do concur with you, said the Princess, that what you alledg, may upon some certain occasions hold true, and that it is not impossible to find some covetous man, who in giving little, may love better then another that gives much; but though I grant this, yet I must maintain, that he who gives with a grudge, does take away all the heart of his Present, and deserves no thanks: I know very well Madam (said crafty Doralisa) that in cases of Love, he who has not a heart to give all he possesseth, does Love but imperfectly; but in case of ordinary friends, it is but just to thank a covetous person, for the trouble he puts himself unto in being at any expences for us: No, no, replied the Princess, never separate Love and friendship in this case, for he who is a miserable Lover, will never make a liberal friend. Then Mexaris not being able to contain any longer, I pray tell me, said he, if it be a fault in a Lover not to be liberal, is it commendable in a Lady to love gifts: By no means, replied the Princess, I equally condemn them both, yet of the two, the Lady more then the Lover: I am of the Princess mind in that, replied Doralisa: However (said Abradates) He who is a Lover, must have a soul able to bestow all: If so (replied Mexaris) what difference between it and prodigality? The difference is in this (replied Abradates) that the Prodigal does give without either choice or judgment, which he who gives all unto her whom he thinks worthy of his affection, doth not; for he who gives his heart, may easily give all the rest which is not so precious. This is not our question, said Doralisa, my Argument in favour of this poor covetous man is this, that his sufferings when he gives any things, supplies the smallness of his gift: Though I should grant this, replied the Princess Panthea, and acknowledged, that some acknowledgment were due unto such a one for all the pain which he endures, yet I could not chuse but at the same time have an extreme aversion towards him: How is it possible Madam, replied Doralisa, that gratitude and aversion should be in the same heart at the same time? It is not at all impossible, answered Panthea, for one may acknowledge Page 26 a benefit, and scorn the benefactor. These two are so conjunct, replied she, that I do not understand how they can be separated: However it is not just, that he who loves his treasures above his life, should bestow them upon an ungrateful person: It would be as unjust in me, to be friendly unto him that shall in his heart such things as are unworthy of passionate Love before me; and to speak rationally, all those sufferings and troubles which you mention in a covetous man, are strong inducements and reasons not to value his gifts; but on the other side, to consider them as some bargain or exchange which he expects I should return in lieu thereof, and look upon him as a man that has secret ends, and would not give but to receive again: I beseech you Madam, said Doralisa, do not dive too deep into the heart of a covetous man, for there is nothing to be found that is good: But grant me only this, that his regret in giving, is a stronger argument of his Love and affection, then the freeness and facility of a liberal man can be in him. I can by no means grant so far, replied the Princess, for I am fully perswaded that a covetous man loves nothing but his coyn and riches, and therefore I can never be obliged unto him: Pronounce judgment then (said Doralisa to Perinthus) for I am so weary of maintaining a bad cause, that I had rather lose it, then precious time in giving bad reasons for it: Since by your own words it appears you are of the same opinion with the Princess (answered Perinthus) there needs no judgment to be given: How/ever pronounce it, replied Panthea, for I had rather get the better of the cause by the equity of my Judg, then the weakness of my Adversary: Since you command it (said Perinthus in favour of Mexaris) I shall condemn you both: Doralisa for defending a good cause so ill, and you Madam, because you would have a man who does all he can, lose the merit of that little which he gives, and which cost him more then that which the liberal bestowes: I pronounce then, that sometimes one may put a favourable construction upon the great affection that may be in a little gift; and sometimes it is not requisite to proportion gratitude according to the richness of the gift, since, if he from whom we receive it, did confer it only for his own glory, we are not so much obliged unto him, as unto one who does not give but only for the Love of us, and who contends and strives with himself to pleasure us. Indeed Perinthus (said the Princess, after he had done speaking) I did not think you would have given sentence against me: If I had received your commands (replied he) to lay aside all partiality and complacence, I had not then done so, but should have pronounced as you pleased: Rather say (replied she) that it argues more ability and wit to maintain a bad cause, and in taking an ill side then a good one. However, since I am perswaded you do not think as you say, I will pardon you. Pray Madam, said Mexaris, are you as great a hater of prodigality as avarice? I know very well, answered she, that the one is a vice as well as the other; but I must ingenuously confess, that I am not so averse to a prodigal man as to a covetous; and the same temper which prompts one to give, and to esteem those which give, does prompt one to hate to be a receiver. All this argues, said Doralisa, that it is most convenient for a covetous Lover to have a liberal Mistress. I am confident, replied Mexaris, that though it be better being the Mistress of a Prodigal then a miserable man, yet it is better being the wife of a miserable then a prodigal man: And I am confident (replied Abradates) that a profuse prodigal in the very conclusion of his Riot, is not so poor as a covetous rich wretch; for to what end does he hoard up all his Treasures, when as he dares not so much as touch them? It is ample satisfaction, replied Mexaris, to know that he possesseth them; or rather (replied Doralisa, that they possess him. I perceive (replied Mexaris, having a desire to divert this discourse) that if this compleat Gallant which Doralisa looks for be not liberal, though he never was in Love, yet he shall never move her heart: There is no question of it (replied she) for certainly that virtue is rarely found in one of those that never were in Love; but Love infuseth more liberality in one quarter of an hour, then all the study of Philosophy can in ten years. I do not wonder (said Abradates) that you who have an opinion that Love inspires all virtues, should think the same which you speak: But I would entreat you to tell me, why there are so many rare accomplished Ladies who never were in Love, and why it is more requisite for men to be accomplished? The reason is Sir, replied she, because their cares to please doth refine and polish the wits of men, and this care does not suit with the Sex of Ladies, whom Nature hath made amiable without other helps. If there want nothing to make up a compleat man (replied this Prince) but to endeavour to please, I know one that would be more exact then ever any was. Abradates, in saying so, look't upon Panthea, who Page 27 meeting her eyes with his, could not chuse but blush, and did thereby let him know, that she applied his words unto the same end that he desired. The alteration in her countenance was not only observed by Abradates, but by Mexaris, and Perinthus: The first of these was red with anger, the other pale with sorrow; and this trivial passage of almost no consideration, did so take up the minds of these four persons, that the conversation was quite spoiled. Panthea was vexed to the soul that she should blush, because she saw Abradates observed it: This Prince made a construction of this blush in favour to himself. Mexaris on the other side did interpret it unto his advantage: Perinthus without any question how to expound the meaning of it, did so certainly conclude, that Panthea had an inclination towards Abradates, that he became more miserable then he was before: For though redness be sometimes a sign of anger as well as Love, yet the eyes of a Lover are too subtil to be deceived: Also Perinthus did so narrowly observe how the redness of Panthea did only adorn her, and not ruffle her countenance as an effect of cholor; for there is a great difference between such a redness, and that which proceeds only from modesty, or else from such a kind of weakness as I dare not name, since those who are capable of it, do not call it so. In the mean time the company parted, every one carried that evil which tormented him in his own heart, only Doralisa excepted, whose pleasants humours would not suffer her to forge Mountain miseries out of molehill matters; and therefore she went as merry home, as Mexaris and Perinthus did melancholy; yet Mex[aris] did verily believe, that if he would demand Panthea in Marriage from the Prince of Clasomena, he should easily obtain her; but he believed that Croessus out of some politike reasons of State did not desire the match, fearing lest the principality of Claso[me]na being in the hands of the richest Prince in all Lydia, should after his death raise C[ivi]l War; so that Mexaris apprehended this as some obstacle, and therefore would not publish his design, until he had brought it so forward, that he might execute it, whether Croessus would or no. And in order to this, there was a necessity of gaining the heart of Panthea, and the consent of the Prince her Father, that he might have a place of retreat when need should be, and therefore he courted all occasions to obtain it. Abradates, who knew that Croessus would never consent Mexaris should marry Panthea, drew from thence some hopes for himself, though he fear'd the Prince of Clasomena would not be against it; but his fears were higher, lest Panthea should be gracious to him: He knew by a hundred circumstances, that she esteemed him more then she did Mexaris; but yet he found so much reservedness in her humour, and such severity in her carriage towards him, since that day he discovered his passion unto her, that he was a tormented Lover, though less then Perinthus, who which way soever he looked, saw nothing but misfortunes, and sad thoughts had so dulled his soul, that he became extremely melancholy, and so deeply, that Doralisa by a hundred circumstances which would too long to relate, knew that he was in Love; and being ravished with joy, that she was now able to main[tain] there never was a compleat man known, and not amorous, that she did not only tell the Princess, but all the world, and indeed so far, that it was grown to a general belief Perinthus was in Love, but the difficulty was to know with whom. The Princess thought it to be with some Beauty in Clasomena, and that the melancholy which hung so heavy upon his soul, had no other cause but absence. But Doralisa, who for her sport had observed him most narrowly, she affirmed it was not at Clasomena, and that she was certain of it: For the Prince of Clasomena desired to employ him upon some bu[sin]ess of consequence thither; and we know that he was very earnest to beg excuse, and was importunate until he obtained it; so that this is an undeniable argument his Love leans towards Sardis. The greatest matter of wonder to the Princess was, that he could never be discovered to make any applications of Courtship unto any one: 'Tis true, he saw Doralisa very often; but though he did much respect her, yet she never saw any signs of passion. However Perinthus lost the opinion of insensibility, though there was not any who could suspect the true cause of his Love. About this time, the Prince Atis married Anaxilea, with whom I think I told you he was in Love; so that the Court was full of Feasts, and all manner of delights and Gallantry; yet notwithstanding, though Mexaris received the knowledge from the mouth of the Princess whom he loved, that she had a strong aversion towards all covetous men, yet was he not one jot the more magnificent; yet something he had which was a little more then ordinary, but it was so very little, that it was hardly seen. The Prince Atis, Artesilas, Adrastus, Cleander, and Abradates, did all of them in gallant emulation vise who should excel in bravery: Page 28 But Mexaris was very willing to be excelled in point of magnificence, and always submitted to the lowest of his Rivals in matters of charge: For if he any time did keep the Ball, the company expected dirty rooms; cold collations, and mean Musique; for since the liberality of him that was to pay them, did not incite them, their Harmony was so negligent, that time in Dances could hardly be kept at his house. On the other side, when Abradates gave any entertainment to the Court, or rather to the Princess Panthea, the very same Musique which marred Dancing at the house of Mexaris, played with life, and admirable cadency at the house of Abradates; a Spritly Harmony did inspire the heart when he kept the Ball: The Ladies seemed more fair, as well because they were always more curious and gay in their dresses, as because the room was more light[some] and neat, and indeed every thing was ordered incomparably better at his house, then at the house of Mexaris, or any where else; for Abradates had an Ayre and a Genius so fit for all the Ceremonies and honours of an Assembly, that his very presence only did inspire with joy and delight. You may easily conceive Madam, that the Prin[cess] being of such an excellent Spirit and ingenuity, could not possibly deny her esteem unto Abradates; and in all places where he had the freedom of discourse with her, though but a moment, though she shunned it, yet was he prudent enough to hit upon convenient opportunities in expressing some marks of his affection, without any failing in those respects which were due. Besides the Hunting whereof we spoke before, and besides the Musique entertainment, and besides several Balls which he kept: He had one more, and it was Races with Chariots, which was one of the most magnificent sports in the world, and the most delighting to behold. For be pleased to imagine, that you saw in a Front before you, a hundred little Chariots of Triumph glistening like the Rayes of the Sun; imagine these Chariots drawn by the finest horses eye ere beheld, and in every one of them a man most gloriously habited, who in one hand holds the Reins of the horses, which were made of tissue of gold, and in the other hand a long Javeline adorned with many precious Stones, who exasperating the Horses by the courage of his voice, they make the Ayre echo as loud as a thousand Instruments of War: At the end of the Race were Scaffolds erected unto stately Tents for the Ladies, and where the Garland of Victory is given unto those that triumph by the hands of her who is chosen to bestow it, by him who makes the entertainment: This Madam is the manner of Chariot Races at Sardis. One day there chanced an accident which was very pleasant unto all the compa[n]y, for on that day Abradates and Cleander did both of them equally win the Garland: And the Chariot of poor Mexaris, which doubtless was only an old one newly burnish[ed] up, chanced to break in the middle of the Race. This chance made miserable Perinthus more melancholy, who since he was not one of them that did run, he did stand in the Scaffold of the Princess, and observed her joy at the disgrace of Mexaris, and at the victory of Abradates; so that now he made no question but this Prince had some share in her heart, and so that in the midst of all this publique joy, Perinthus was most sadly melancholy: Not long after all these universal joyes were turned into sorrows for the fatal death of the Prince Atis, which grieved all the Court, especially Abradates; for he did not only lament the loss of a Prince who had most excellent qualities, and from whom he expected his protection; but also by his death, he looked upon Mexaris as one step neerer the Throne, which by consequence might reflect upon the heart of Panthea, and become a great obstacle to his design, not but that the Prince Antaeon was yet alive; yet for all that, he esteemed it a great advantage unto his Rival to be a step neerer a Crown then he was before; and I believe this consideration was a Cordial unto Mexaris to comfort him for the loss of his Nephew: A while after, a new misfortune chanced unto Abradates, which was, that Croessus resolving to besiege Ephesus, would not nominate either Antaeon, or Mexaris, or Artesilas, his Lieutenants Generals, but made choice of Cleander for it, telling Abradates, he would have offered him this employment, if the Queen of Susiana had not sent him word, that she was in hopes of making his peace very shortly: So Abradates being without any pretence of discontent, as Mexaris had, he was forced to go unto the Wars, at a time when his Rival was to stay behind with Panthea. Perinthus also grieved to be so far off the only one he loved; but though Mexaris was left with her yet since Abradates was to be absent as well as himself, his heart was more at ease. In the mean while Abradates, not being able to depart before he did more precisely know upon what terms he stood in the heart of Panthea, he sought all opportunities to talk in private with her; yet since she did carefully avoid it, and Perinthus Page 29 for his own interest did as much prevent it as he could, he found it very difficult: For Madam be pleased to know, that this secret adorer of the Princess had found out an admirable device, that she should never be alone when Abradates came to see her; and thus he contrived it. First he told three or four Ladies of Quality whom the Princess did really esteem, and told them in great secret, that she loved them with abundance of ten[derness], and that they would infinitely please the Princess in visiting her very often: Aft[er]wards he promised them to be so officious as to acquaint them, when she was most at leisure to entertain them, and had least company with her; and indeed he sent so often to some one or other of them, that the Love-sick Abradates could never meet with a fit opportunity to speak with her in private, yet he did not so much accuse his misery as his misfortune, but knew not that it was caused by a Rival as miserable as himself: But at last finding Panthea walking in the Gardens of the Kings Palace, she could not avoid his company: As good luck for him was, Mexaris was not there, and as ill luck for Perinthus was, he met him there, and he led Doralisa by the hand, who was walking with the Princess; yet notwithstanding he could not in civility molest the conversation of two persons of such a Quality: Doralisa told me since, that when Abradates presented his hand unto the Princess, Perinthus did for a while let go his, yet presently after recollecting himself, he took her hand again; but he was so much transported when they two talked together, that he knew not what he either said or did: Sometimes when his imagination told him, that Abradates was speaking of his Love to the Princess; he would gripe the hand of Doralisa so hard for very spite and anger, that he would extremely hurt her. Since Doralisa was one of an excellent wit, and had ever found Perinthus a most wise and prudent man, and the most orderly c[ivi]l in the world, she was now much surprized at this passage: And he looking upon Doralisa, did find that his passion was too strong for him, and that he had discovered some signes of it; so that not knowing how to dissemble the matter, he took the first pretence that came into his mind. It is very unfortunate (said he unto her) that Abradates should at this time come to disturb that pleasure which I took in these walks, for I cannot look upon him, but I must needs remember, that when we parted the last time, I then received some orders from the Prince of Clasomena concerning a business of great consequence, which now forceth me much against my will to leave you very un[civ]illy: I conceive, said Doralisa, that in lieu of complaining against Abradates, you should be glad of his coming to put you in memory of what you had otherwise forgotten: But I conceive (said he, and parted from her at the end of the walk) that I have cause to accuse him, since he is the cause that I must part from you, about that which does not half please me: All that Perinthus said unto Doralisa, was not at all satisfactory to her; yet notwithstanding, there was so little reason to think, that those turbulencies which she saw in his mind should have their original from any passion which the Princess should cause, that she would not yet believe it, but resolved to enquire whether Perinthus after he parted from her, had really been about any such important business as he pretended. During this passage, Abradates not to lose a minute of his precious time, was no sooner with the Princess, but beginning to speak; Madam, said he unto her, I have one favour to ask you, which I hope you will not deny. Since I make no question but what you desire of me is just, replied the Princess, I think you need not fear denials: Indeed I can[not] chuse but fear (said he to her) though upon examination of my thoughts I apprehend no less fears that you will grant my request, then that you will deny me: If you fear to obtain that which you would ask (replied Panthea) your best course is not to ask it: That would not be just, replied he, For truly Madam, being upon the point of departure, my desires are so violent to know upon what terms I stand in your opinion, that I cannot take my leave of you, unless you do me the favour to inform me: But with[all] being conscious of my own unworthiness, I am afraid, and that with much reason, that if you do not grant my desires, you will force me into such despair, as I dare not so much as look upon you, lest I should find the thoughts of your heart in your fair eyes: However Madam (said he, not giving her leisure to interrupt him) give me leave to let you know before you speak, that whatsoever you either will or can speak unto me, I shall for ever adore you with a most unequalled passion; and that as I have loved you from the very first instant I saw you, so I shall love you to the last minute of my life: Therefore never think, I beseech you, that by being rigorous, you can chase out of my heart that passion which the fairest eyes upon earth have created in it: No, no, Madam, Page 30 it is impossible, all your power is not able to reach so far; doubtless you may make me the most happy or miserable man alive, but you cannot hinder me from being eternally yours, and more yours then my own: Tell me then, I beseech you Madam, how I stand in your thoughts, and whether it be permitted me to hope I am in a better condition then Mexaris? Mexaris, replied she, is a great Prince, whom I reverence with all respect due unto his Quality: But as for Abradates, he is not well advised to eradicate that him|self which his own merit had planted in my heart, and which if he had not, I should have infinitely esteemed him; but in the humour that now I am in, he hath put a great obstacle unto that friendship which I reserved for him, by speaking to me as he hath done. Is it possible Madam (said Abradates) that I should have been higher in your esteem, if I had not given you any testimonies of my Love? If so, certainly I am the most happy man alive, and I have no more to ask: Deceive not your self Abradates, replied the Princess, for I am fully perswaded, that since you have took so much boldness as to speak what you have done, you do not esteem me enough: I know not whether I have told you before, but I see though I should tell it a hundred times, yet all would be over|little to perswade you, that though I do infinitely esteem those excellent Qualities which are in you; yet since you do not esteem me so much as I desire to be, I cannot think my self at all obliged unto you for that affection which you tell is in you. Alas Madam, replied Abradates, what higher testimony of a great esteem can be given unto any, then to give ones entire heart, to make you absolute Mistress of my Destiny, and who would neither live nor die, but according to your Dictates and Decrees: In these resolutions I appear prostrate before you Madam; and can you say I do not enough esteem you? You know very well Madam, that your eyes did never afford me one favourable look; what would you have me do now I am ready to depart, and leave such a Prince as Mexaris is at Sardis. However Madam, though you will not be pleased to let me know how I am in your thoughts, yet I beseech you let me know at the least what place my Rival holds there; for if he be but upon worse conditions then my self, I protest I shall depart without any murmur, and without asking any further favour. If there want nothing but that ingenuous Declaration to satisfy you, replied the Princess, and smiled, I pray leave me at rest, and keep your self so also. In the mean time, know Abradates, (said she, and assumed a more serious look) that persons of my Quality and Virtue, never use to dispose of themselves, but to suit themselves and minds unto their Fortunes; therefore though I had a disposition to let you love me, yet I would never permit it, until I were in a condition that I might do it innocently, and without impudence. After this, I have no more to say, unless this, that you will much oblige me, if you will not force me to fly your company. As Abradates was ready to reply, the Princess Palmis came in, & broke off the discourse: And as we were then in a great walk of Cypress Trees, planted so close to one another, that they made a very thick hedge: It chanced as I cast my eyes upon a place where I saw the Boughs to shake, I perceived Perinthus lurking and looking through: I no sooner spied him, but I shewed him Doralisa, which did much amaze her, that he should be so earnest to leave her to that end: Perinthus also was at an extrem nonplus, and told her, that as he was going out of the Garden, he met with him whom he had intended to go unto about his business, which being done, he returned into the Garden again, and taking into ano|ther walk before he was aware, he had a mind to see whether any had come in to supply his place since he went out, before he entred again. I understood you very well Perin|thus (said she unto him) you think to make me conceal your incivility by this excuse, but truly you must invent a better before you prevail. Perinthus being in a terrible fear that Doralisa should go and acquaint the Princess and others with the disorder which she discovered in his Spirit, beseeched her that she would honour him with her hand again; then putting the Boughs of the Cypress close again, he began to conjure Doralisa in a low voice, not to speak unto any of the disorder which she discovered in his soul: I promise you that I will not, replied she, upon condition that you will acquaint me with the true cause, or to say better, confess it unto me, for to tell you truly, I am confident you are in Love with the Princess. Ah Doralisa (cried he out) I must trust my self un|to your discretion, but I do conjure you Doralisa in the name of the Gods, that you do not discover it: I promise you I will not, said she unto him, upon condition you will be ingenuous and sincere: Know then, pursued Perinthus, that the Prince of Clasomena understanding that Mexars and Abradates were both in Love with Panthea, he apprehended much joy for the first of these, and much sorrow for the second; and therefore he absolutely commanded me to discover if I could, the true apprehensions of the Princess Page 31 his Daughter, and if it were possible, to prevent Abradates from having any private discourse with her; yet I can safely swear unto you, that yet I have not told the least circumstance of any thing unto the Prince her Father: For since I am one who admires, and infinitely honour her, I could not become her Spy; yet I must ingenuously confess, that since he is here, I cannot chuse but be angry, and since I could not remedy it, I thought it my best to retreat, lest if the Prince should chance to come, he should think me so far from being his informer, I was a concealer of things from him, and that was my reason why I would not be in the same walk where they were. But Perinthus, said Doralisa, since you have no design to prejudice the Princess, what was your reason for hiding your self so closely amongst the Cypress Trees, and to observe her actions so precisely and closely? I did endeavour to inform my self of the truth (replied he) to the end I might better know how to behave my self between Mexaris and Abradates. Their merits are so different (replied Doralisa) that you might very well guess her thoughts of them, without taking such pains as to observe her actions: It is very true, replied Perinthus, and so I do, yet since the present condition of their two Fortunes is so different, I cannot chuse but be byassed in my wishes; and methinks the fair Doralisa, for her own interest, should desire that the Princess should rather remain in the Lydian Court, then go so far off as Susa. In the mean time, I conjure you not to discover me, and to believe that I will never either say or do any thing, which shall be against those respects which I owe unto the Princess. Doralisa lent an ear unto all this long discourse of Perinthus, but knew not whether she should believe him or no; for when she remembered the perplexity which she discovered in his mind when Abradates first came, she could not doubt but that he was in Love with Panthea: But when she considered the little probability that such a man as he should dare to nourish such thoughts as those in his heart, she gave credit unto his words, yet her faith in them was not so strong, but she was often apt to alter her opinion: However, she resolved not to speak of any of these passages; for said she, if Perinthus do love Panthea, he is so unfortunate in it, that I need not loaden him with more misery, by inconsiderately telling the Princess of that which perhaps he will never tell her himself: And if it be as he tells me, I will not speak of it neither, since thereby I shall prejudice Abradates, whom I infinitely esteem. Perinthus for his part was well pleased with the handsome lye which he had invented, which truly upon such a suddain was very ingenuous; for if Doralisa was faithful, and did not speak of it, he was safe and at quiet, or if she did tattle any thing to the Princess, his hope was, that since she would believe the Prince her Father did disapprove of the Love of Abradates, she would happily and cunningly reject it. And thus the walk continued without much discontent, for to say the truth, the Princess was not sorry at her heart that Abradates was in Love with her: This Prince, for his part, thought the favour he obtained to be very high, in that he heard Panthea her self pronounce him happier then his Rival Mexaris was: Perinthus also thought he had escaped a great danger, since he had put a handsome gloss upon the imprudent discovery of his passion, so that there was none but Doralisa who was not reasonably well satisfied, and she was a little perplexed, that she could not tell well what to believe of Perinthus. After this, Abradates could not have any more private discourse with Panthea, and he must content himself to bid her adieu before much company, so that he durst not make half his sorrows appear in his eyes when he parted. As for Perinthus, since he was one of the house, he enjoyed the sight of his Princess with as much freedom as he could wish, but it was such a freedom as did him no good, since he durst not make use of it to express the passion of his soul unto her, but was forced to hide it with all possible care; yet in spite of all his cares, his melancholly would appear most visible, but since friendship might produce it as well as Love, the Princess would not interpret that to be the cause, which would have been extremely offensive to her, if she had known the cause. Doralisa was not present when he took his leave, and it was happy for him she was not; for since she had already some suspicion of the truth, doubtless she would have palpably perceived, that his sorrows proceeded from a more tender cause then matter of friendship: When he was gone out of the Princess Chamber, she called him back, and enjoined him to write (as often as any opportunities would permit him) all the news from the Army; And in return, said she unto him, I will oblige Doralisa to answer you, though I shall not, and to send you the news of Sardis. At the first Perinthus was much ravished with these commands; but when he began to consider that this favour had never been conferred upon him, but to take all suspicions away, that Page 26 she was so dear unto him as she was; his joyes were less; yet on the other side when he considered it to be a favour which all his Rivals as great Princes as they were, could never obtain, he cheered up himself, and was less grieved. Moreover, since that Rival which he most feared should be absent as well as himself, it troubled him the less: Also he went to bid adieu unto Doralisa, with a mind that was free and jocand enough for a Lover that was to depart: 'Tis true, he was as careful as possible he could to dissemble his thoughts at this time, when indeed he stood in need of all his art: For Doralisa upon premeditated thoughts told him a hundred passages, which would have extremely troubled one to answer that was less subtil then himself: But he replied unto every thing with such Spirit, that she found nothing but what did increase her doubts. In the mean while, as the Princess of Clasomena was a little melancholly for the departure of Abradates, so Mexaris was as joyful as possible could be, yet he found no better entertainment from Panthea; But on the other side, she did as far as civility would permit, express more coldness to him in the absence of Abradates then she did before; and she treated him with such hollow indifferency, as almost shewed him the way to despair, and which moved him unto many things that troubled Panthea; For when he found, that the more obsequious he was, the less gracious he found her, he resolved to transact secretly with the Prince her Father; but yet notwithstanding, he visited and waited upon her with all assiduity, though Doralisa by order from the Princess did bolt out a hundred crafty passages, which surely were nothing pleasing unto him, continually saying, That Sardis now was no more then a Desert, since the Camp had exhausted it, and that it was better being in the Country by a hundred degrees, then there where there is none considerable in the Court: But let her say what she could, he would not be banished, but did continually torment us with his company, yet had he wit and Spirit enough; but yet this base disposition which raigned so tyrannically in his heart, and which made him think all lost that he gave or spent, made every one not esteem him. Moreover, the affection which every one bore Abradates did augment their aversion to Mexaris, so that it is no wonder the Princess should not love that Prince whom no body loved: And on the other side, it had been a miracle if she had either hated or forgotten Abradates, whom all the world did speak of with a high esteem, and whom she knew did love her with a most violent passion; and you may assure your self he was neither hated nor forgotten during all the Ephesian War, nor the Myssian and Phrygian War: Fame did Trumpet his valour so highly in his commendation during his absence, that it may be said he was no less obliged unto his own courage and valour, then unto the Princess for this favour toward him. As long as the War lasted, Perinthus failed not to write unto the Princess: But since he was a man of a most generous soul, you may imagine him a little troubled to pay that obedience; for how could he relate all the passages of the Army, and not mention all the glorious acts of Abradates, who as well as Cleander, did raise himself unto a high pitch of eminency? And how could he find a Genius to commend a Rival, and help him to conquer the heart of Panthea? His way was commonly to speak of things in general, without particularizing the actions of any one, contenting himself to say only, that the Enemy was beaten, and to declare only the advantages of the Army, as presupposing that the Princess desired news to no other end, but as things related to the interest and good of the State: that in all the relations which Perinthus made unto the Princess, the name of Abradates was never used, but only once, and that too against his will, which chanced thus: Two or three daies after the taking of Ephesus, Perinthus having almost finished his Letters to the Princess, Abradates came into his Chamber, and presently after him Cleander entred also, who knowing that it was he who sent all the news of the Army unto the Princess, told him, that the messenger who was to carry the Packet unto Sardis would depart within this two hours: Perinthus answered, that he had not above two words to write; and since it was known to all the world that he had a most admirable faculty in writing, Abradates who never had seen any of his Letters and did not suspect him to be his Rival, told him, that if there were nothing in his Letter but only a relation of the Siege, he should be extremely glad to see it, not doubting but he was as good at writing, as he was at acting his part in Military affairs. Cleander did second the desire: At first Perinthus did modestly refuse, but seeing Cleander was importunate that he should shew what he had writ, he was afraid that if he did not shew it, perhaps it might be conceived, that he had writ something disadvantageous of them, so that submitting un|to the desires of Cleander, Abradates took his Letter which was not finished, and read these words

PERINTHUS to the Princess of Clasomena.

Though Victory were in your power Madam, yet your desires of it could not be more happily accomplished: It waits upon the Kings Armies in all places, and nothing can with|stand them: The taking of the Town of Ephesus does well deserve, that the most illustrious Princess of the world should render thanks unto the Gods for one of the most glorious Conquests that ever was obtained: I believe there ought as much to be attributed unto the prevalency of your prayers Madam, as unto the valour of our Troops: The Enemy resisted so far, as conduced unto the glory of the Conquerours, but not so much as could keep themselves from being conquered: It is the will of Fate, that the Lawrel wherewith Victory crowns the heads of Conquerours is not sprinkled with much blood, since there is not one of any eminent quality died in this last assault. I do not tell you

I intended to add (said Perinthus after Abradates had read the Letter) the particular actions of Cleander; and many others, when I broke off: You do very well (replied Albradates) and they cannot be better commended then by your self, who knows so well how to do it: But since your modesty doubtless will not permit you to relate your own actions unto the Princess (said he unto him in a subtil manner of obligation to speak well of him) and since I dare not presume to write a Letter from my self unto her, having no Commission for it as you have, I beseech you let me add something to your Letter; and then not staying for the answer of Perinthus, who opposed him as much as in civility he could, he writ these words.

The excellent relation of Perinthus would be imperfect, if some part of those praises which he deserves were not included; therefore for your satisfaction, for his glory and my own, I beseech you give me leave to be his Historian, and to tell you, that he hath made himself most highly eminent in all occasions which presented themselves, and that except the illustrious Cleander, he deserves all that glory which he attributes unto others: This Madam I thought to be the duty of a man, who pretends unto no higher ambition then to be thought the most humble Adorer of the fairest Princess upon earth.

After Abradates had Postscribed these words, and that Cleander had read it aloud, the heart of Perinthus was much divided; for he thought it a very advantagious piece of honour to be commended unto the Princess so highly by such a Prince as he: But that he himself should send the Letter of his most feared Rival unto his loved and adored Prin|cess, was a thing not to be endured: So that to prevent it if possible he could, he said, that he was ashamed to be a sender of his own praises, and that it would purchase him more shame then glory Moreover, he feared, that the Princess should think very strange he should take upon him the boldness to send her any Letters from such a Prince as Abradates (For said he very subtilly) that she be pleased to honour me with her commands to write unto her my self, yet that is no consequence that another should do so also: Nor is it my own interest only which I consider; But I am afraid (said he, and turned towards Albradates) that you intend a good office in my behalf unto the Princess by it, yet it may make you worse in her opinion. Since I am certain she esteems you very much (replied this Prince, who exceedingly desired that his Letter should come into the hands of his Princess) I do not fear she will be offended at me for presenting a truth unto her in your advantage. No, no, said Cleander, I warrant you the Princess will never be offended at such a piece of Gallantry as this, for though she be something severe, yet she is ra|tional, and knows how to take things as they ought to be: But it would be well (added he) that Perinthus make an end of his Letter, and present your Encomium also. Albradates out of modesty did forbid him, and Perinthus had a desire to say, that he was not able to command too such illustrious persons sufficiently in so short a time; But Cle|lander told him, he would dispence with him for half that trouble, and conjured him not to mention him, but forced him to end his Letter in commendation of Abradates, of whose passion he was not ignorant: So that Perinthus was forced to finish it in this man|ner, though it was not his first intention.

I will not tell you Madam, how the Prince Abradates hath got abundance of glory by a Page_34 thousand gallant actions; for after what he hath said in my behalf, that would be suspected of flattery. I can also assure you, I am very sorry that his civilities has forced me to alter the end of my Letter, and to relate things after another manner then I intended: Nor will I tell you what Miracles the illustrious Cleander hath wrought, for Fame will do that office for me: But give me leave to tell you without any affected modesty, that I was never in all my life so loath unto any thing, as to this in sending you my own commendation, although it was writ by the hand of a great Prince, and seem to be an infinite honour unto me, that it should be read by the most excellent Princess of all the world.

PERINTHUS.

When Perinthus had finished, he hoped that happily they would go away, and that afterwards he might procure the messenger who was to carry this Letter, to say he had lost it: Yet he had no sooner ended and sealed it, but Cleanders Envoy came in to re|ceive his last Orders, so that poor Perinthus was forced to deliver it before them, and alway went the messenger. Perinthus was almost mad at this accident: What a most mi|serable Fate is this (said he unto himself, as he has told me since) that I should be the means Abradates should write unto that Princess whom I adore? Perhaps she will imagine I did voluntarily do him this office, and that I am the confident of his passion? In the names of all the Gods, Oh my adored Panthea (said he, as if she had understood him) be not so unjust as to think I did this Prince any service to you: It is too much you must not know I love you, without thinking that I would have you love another. But Perin|thus, (said he presently to himself) Art thou not resolved to content thy self with the esteem of thy Princess? Hast thou not determined with thy self never to discover thy Love unto her? And dost thou not know, thou canst never have any share in her affection? Why then art thou not satisfied with that commendations which Abradates hath sent in thy behalf, since it may augment the esteem which she hath of thee? If the praises of an Enemy be glorious, why should not those of a great Prince? But alas, alas, this great Prince is my Rival, and such a Rival as in all likelihood will obtain the Love of my Prin|cess: It is no wonder then that thou shouldest be troubled, to be thus forced to commend him, and to receive any commends from him. Afterwards, when he considered with himself that the Princess would answer in her Letter unto what Abradates had writ, and that he should be constrained to let his Rival see the Civilities of Panthea, he resolved, that if the Letter was over-obliging unto Abradates, to smother it: Therefore he expected this answer with as much longing impatience, as if he had sent a Declaration of his Love unto Panthea, though his curiosity was only to see what the Princess would say con|cerning Abradates, who on his side expected this answer with the same impatience, though not with the same fears, since it was only three daies journey between Ephesus and Sardis, the Letter of Perinthus came thither in two daies, because he who car|ried intelligence of the taking of Ephesus went Post, and made great hast. Doralisa, who never was absent from Panthea, was present as well as my self, when the Princess received this Letter, which at the first she began to read aloud, for knowing that Perin|thus never used to intimate any thing but matter of news, she expected no other. But when she came to the place which Abradates had writ, and saw it in another hand diffe|rent from that of Perinthus, she read it in a low voice and blushed, whilst Doralisa and my self had several apprehensions of it: For Doralisa having some suspicions of his passi|on, imagined that perhaps he had took heart, and writ unto the Princess concerning it: But I, who had no such conceits, only thought it something which she would not have us know: Yet after the Princess had done reading, and that the disorder which the name of Abradates caused in her soul, was appeased, she gave the Letter unto Doralisa, and my self to read; and being desirous to colour the tenderness of heart which she ex|pressed, she told us, That when she saw the alteration of hands, and the name of Albradates, she was afraid lest he had intimated something, w|hich vould have given her cause of complaint, both against Abradates and Perinthus: How|ever Doralisa (said she, after the Letter vvas read) you see that Perinthus, though not in Love, yet he can be valiant; and that to be brave and gallant, it is sufficient that one be only in Love w|ith glory; for though I seemed to believe, as others did, that Perinthus vvas in Love, yet I assure you, I never did really believe it at all: And I assure you Madam, replied Do|ralisa, I am not of your opinion; doubtless one may be valiant and not amorous, but Page_35 I do confidently maintain, that if a Gallant man vvas never in Love, he shall be brave and valiant, but brutish w|ithal: And since Perinthus, though valiant, is not brutish, therefore I must conclude him to be in Love. However (said the Princess) as friendly as I am to Perinthus, and as joyful as I am to see his praises wr|t by the hand of so illustrious a Prince, yet believe me, I am almost angry with him, because I am forced to answer something unto Abradates. Truly Madam (said Doralisa to her) I should conceive the difficulty not great to answer any thing in that Letter: It is true (said she, and blushed) the difficulty is not in answering any thing to that Letter, but to something which he said unto me at parting; and then the Princess was pleased to acquaint us with the conference she had with him; yet notwithstanding, after she had well considered upon it, she re|solved to write, as I shall presently relate unto you. In the mean while, Abradates and Perinthus, who waited impatiently for an answer from the Princess, were so exact to in|quire the day when the messenger would return, that they knew to an hour when he would come to give an account unto Cleander: But as ill luck to Perinthus was, Clean|der, who loved Abradates, and was not ignorant of his passion to the Princess of Cla|somena; also longing to know what she answered, went immediately unto Abradates, who was then in the Garden of the house where he lodged, and Perinthus with him, who in his presence received the answer from the Princess: You may imagine what the thoughts of Perinthus were, in opening this Letter from Panthea, suspecting it to be too gallant and obliging unto Abradates; and this Prince perceiving some disorder in the face of Perinthus, he imagined only that it proceeded from his fears of the Princess an|ger, for sending his Letter; so that he bestowed a complement or two upon Perinthus, unto which he replied as well as he could <◇> but thought it not advantagious for himself to open the Letter so soon, yet Abradates and Cleander so pressed him unto it, that he was forced to open it, and read aloud these words,

PANTHEA unto PERINTHUS.

IT appears sufficiently, both by what you have related concerning the Prince Abradates, and the illustrious Cleander, and by Fame also, that victory is much rather a consequent of their courage, then my prayers; yet I will never cease them for the augmentation of their glory, which can never be so high as I desire them. As for yours Perinthus, I find it ari|ved at so high a pitch, that I think it impossible to wish it greater: For to be commended by such a Prince as merits all praises himself, is an honor so great, that the height of your am|bition ought to be compleatly satisfied; yet since your modesty would have debarr'd you from telling it, I am obliged unto Abradates for it, though otherwise I am sorry for putting him|self to that trouble: Assure him, that as he hath much augmented the esteem which I had of you, so you have most strongly confirmed me in my thoughts of him. After this, expect not that I should return intelligence for intelligence, unless to acquaint you, that Doralisa doth still accuse you, and is absolutely perswaded, that all those glorious acts which you have done are rather effects of that secret passion which lies close in your heart, then of your courage; For my part I am still just, and take your part as well as I can, adieu: Assure Abra|dates and Cleander, that Victory shall always follow them, if Fortune follow my desires: PANTHEA.

Perinthus read the Letter so badly, especially towards the latter end, that Abradates did civilly desire to read it himself again, that he might understand it, telling him with a smile, He wondred that a man who could write so well, should read so ill: But oh Hea|vens, in what a pitiful case was the poor Perinthus, when he perceived the joyes of Albradates in reading this Letter, for all it contained nothing but common civility, yet he was extreemly pleased with it. The delight only to see his name vv|ritten by the hand of Panthea, transported him into a rapture of joy: After he had read it alo|d, he read it over again from one end to the other in a low voice, and vvhen he had done, he would not upon any teams render it back unto Perinthus, whose perplexities vv|ere more exces|sive then the joyes of Abradates vv|ere great: he vvas not only vexed that the Princess should return such a civil ans|vver unto Abradates, but he vvas afraid lest Doralisa should fall into her old jealousies, and in the end discover something; yet he vvas fully per|svvaded she had not yet opened any thing to Panthea, for if she had, Panthea vvould: Page_36 not have vv|ritten unto him. Thus having a soul sv|elled vv|ith thousand several conceits, and not one agreeable to his desires, he seemed very restless; all those obliging words which the Princess had wr|it relating to himself, did not at all satisfie him, because he thought the commendations she gave Abradates, to be a bitter potion after all those sweet civilities she bestowed upon him. In the mean time, Cleander desiring to oblige Abradates, and never suspecting that Perinthus was in Love with Panthea, he desired Perinthus to let Abradates keep the Princess Letter: And indeed Perinthus, said he unto him, the Letter does belong unto him as much as unto you. Dear Perinthus (said this amorous Prince, and imbraced him) I heartily beseech you grant me this favour which Cleander in my behalf hath asked, and which indeed I durst not. Sir, replied Perin|thus, much amazed and troubled, Since you say your self durst not ask what you desire, it may be imagined you know I ought not to consent unto it: And truly what would the Princess say, if I should part with it: For Sir, the more worthy you are to keep this Letter, the more do I fear to offend the Princess in suffering it: If it had been her plea|sure that you should have a Letter from her, she would have wr|it it particularly to you; but this being not so, I beseech you take it not, if I deny it unto you, since I would not have her take it ill from me: But the Princess need never know it (said Cleander to him) and by consequence it cannot prejudice you. However, since I know it my self, replied he, it will be a perpetual trouble to my mind that I should do any thing against my duty: But Perinthus (said Abradates unto him) you will do a thing against the Laws of friendship, if you refuse me this Letter; and therefore I pray permit me to keep it for a few daies, upon promise to restore it back. In good earnest, said Cleander, and looked upon Perinthus) you are too precise, if not too rigid; for be your respects of the Princess never so great) I cannot see you would do her any great injury, in trusting a Letter into the hands of a Prince) who doubtless would preserve it with more care then you can have. However it be (said Perinthus with a troubled visage) I have a great desire to do what I ought: I am fully resolved, said Abradates, not to restore it, unless I have a copy of it at the least. Really Perinthus, (said Cleander, and would not give him time to answer) you must do this, if you have any disposition to oblige at once, both the Princess, and Abradates, and my self. I am most unfortunate (replied Perinthus) to meet with such a cross conjuncture. The truth is Perinthus (said Cleander) you must obey your friends; and to set your mind at rest, I will undertake to tell the Princess, if she chance to know it, that you denied it with as much zeal, as if you had been in Love with her, and as if one of your Rivals had asked a copy of a Letter from your Mistriess. After this, Cleander not staying for any answer from Perinthus, commanded one of his servants to fetch him ink and paper: Perinthus was a long while obstinate, but at last, fearing lest his obstinacy should argue the true cause of it self, and both Abradates and Cleander divine his passion by it, he consented Abradates should have a copy; so that Abradates going into an Arbor, amidst which was a Table of Jaspier, he set himself to write: Mean while Cleander addressed himself unto Perinthus, and perswaded him to do Abradates all the good offices he could unto the Princess of Clasomena, and the Princess his Daughter; but Perinthus was so nee'd and unquiet, that he had much ado to return any answer: He was transported with such violent raptures at this discourse, that he was a hundred and hundred times ready to snatch the Letter out of the hands of Abradates, and to draw his Sword; yet the presence of Cleander, and several others which were in the Garden prevented him, and the first apprehensions being over, reason did reassume his seat in his soul, and he dissembled the matter as well as he could; and to calm the disorders of his mind, he began to think that this Letter was only a Letter of civility, and therefore he ought not to vex so excessively at it: So that <◇> answer to the desires of Cleander, in behalf of Abradates; he told him, That it was very true, he had the honour to be much in the Prince of Clasomena's favour, and a little with the Princess; but yet it was his maxime, which lie ever observed, never to speak unto his Masters of any affairs which they do not first on themselves: And since Abradates himself is a man of most high merit, it is not requisite to employ any either unto the one or the other. As soon as Abradates had done writing, he came unto them, but before he would restore Panthea's Letter, he wooed Perinthus to be contented with the Copy, and to let him keep the Original, but he could not possibly obtain it, so that neither of them were contented; for Abradates was sorry he had not the real Letter of Panthea, and Perinthus was sorry he had parted with a Copy, yet within a few daies after Page 37 his sorrows were much more bitter, for he understood that Abradates did grow more confident upon the Princess her civilities to him, and did write a hundred passages unto Doralisa to tell unto the Princess; and afterwards, when he went from Ephesus unto the Phrygian War, which began immediately after this ended, he writ unto the Princess her self, he knew very well they could not be Letters of secrecie, yet since he was not ignorant, that he who writ them was in Love, his sorrows were extream, and wished very often that Mexaris might thrive by the absence of Abradates, and that the Prince of Clasomena would bestow his Daughter upon him. But whilst both Abradates and Perinthus were in these Wars, Mexaris was a perpetual persecutor of the Princess, for he was not only an eternal troublesome Visitant, but knowing that there was interchange of Letters betwixt Abradates and her, he became so furiously cholericke, that one day he quite forgot those respects which he was accustomed to observe, and thus it chanced. Doralisa, who knew very well what aversion the Princess had unto this Prince, took a great delight in twitting him with a hundred passages before all the company, which were not at all pleasing unto him, and upon every occasion she would commend the virtue of liberality in general, and often of Abradates in particular. One day then, when he was with the Princess, and when she saw that his discourse was not pleasing to the Princess, she did so handsomely turn the talk, that Mexaris fell insensibly to speak of prodigality, and by little and little she scrued him up to that point, as he maintained prodigality to be the greatest of vices. For my part (said she unto him) I am not of your opinion, since I cannot possibly believe, that Vice which resembles one of the most Heroique Virtues, should be worse then Avarice. How, said Mexaris, do you prefer Liberality in the Soul of a Prince before Valour and Prudence? And had you rather have him liberal, then wise and courageous? I know not, said she, Whether I had rather have him liberal then valiant and prudent; but I am sure I would not have a Prince to be covetous. There are some (said Mexaris then) who love liberality in another, only because they have Mercenary Souls of their own: 'Tis true, said the Princess, some such there are, but not always, for I am certain Doralisa is none of them, but of a generous disposition: Liberality and Generosity, replied he, are not the same: I grant it, said Doralisa, for I am not ignorant how there are some men liberal, who are not generous in all other actions of their life: But yet I will maintain, that he who is not liberal, is not generous, and that Prince who does not possess that virtue, cannot possess any; For can it be goodness to see a hundred men of excellent merit, who are out of favour with Fortune, and not to assist them? Is there any prudence in getting hatred in lieu of a thousand honorers by benefits? Is there any policy in procuring enemies in lieu of benefits? Is it glorious to dote unmeasurably upon that which so many wise men have scorned? Is there any friendship to be expected from him that denies every thing that is asked him? Can he elyver be a good Master who never doth recompence those who serve him? Is there any gallantry in having such a hide-bound soul as is never ready to give? Or can he be a rare Prince that is covetous? And hath not such virtues as raiseth them above other men, for indeed I know no other virtue but liberality which sets them above others: Valour is a virtue as Heroique in the soul of a simple souldier, as in the greatest King: Goodness is common to all men, and commonly more to Subjects then Sovereigns: Prudence is not peculiarly theirs, others may be as wise, and put their wisdom in practise as well as they; but as for liberality, the glory of it is peculiar only unto great ones: It is in vain for those who have nothing to give, to have that virtue, since they cannot make it appear and shine in its glory: Also it is in vain, that great ones should have the power to give, if they have not the will to do it. Yet I can hardly believe, replied Mexaris, That it is the intention of the Gods, that those men whom they honored with riches above others, should lavishly throw them away as they please: And yet it appears as clearly, replied Doralisa, to be the pleasure of the Gods, that those things which they give, should be converted into publique good, and not hoarded up to satisfie the avaritious humour of a private man. We have a thousand glorious examples of that, said the Princess, The Sun affords his rayes and light to all the world, the Sea gives of his waters unto the Rivers and Fountains: And Kings also, unto whom the Gods have given authority, are obliged to contribute it, and all their cares for the good of their Dominions, and defence of their Subjects. Ha, as for matter of cares (said Doralisa, and smiled) I know some who are not very covetous of them, though otherwise I am sure they are not over-liberal. I wonder, said Mexaris, since liberality is so commodable, we never Page 38 heard of the liberality of Doralisa: I have already told you Sir, replied she, That the practise of that virtue belongs only to Princes, yet I have given more perhaps then you imagine: As for matter of cares and circumspection (said he, intending to speak of the good offices she had done Abradates) I know you have not been very niggardly, for you are very diligent to serve your absent friends. Why Sir, (said the Princess to him, desiring to turn the discourse.) Do you chide Doralisa for that, as if it were a crime? I conceive it to be an excellent quality, not to forget ones friends. I perceive Madam (replied he, transported with anger and Love together) That Doralisa inspires you with all these inclinations, and that she has made you so liberal, that you will not only give your own heart, but also refuse the heart of all others, except—Mexaris stopt at these words, perhaps as being angry that he had spoken more then he wished he had; but the ayr wherewith he pronounced those words did so offend the Princess, that she could not forbear some expressions of displeasure. 'Tis true (replied Panthea unto the insolent language of Mexaris) that there are very few hearts which I will accept of, though they should be offered me; and yet more true, that if ever I give mine, it shall be unto a person so illustrious, that this my liberality shall not make me pass for a Prodigal. How Madam (replied Mexaris, desiring to mend the matter.) Can I hope that your heart is not yet given? This word Hope, said she unto him, is not in its due place, for whether my heart be given, or not given, those who wrong me, ought never to pretend unto any part of it: I do not know any that wrongs you, replied he, unless it be such as love you, who are unworthy: I grant it, said she unto him, for such I mean: Yet we do not well understand one another, replied he, for you mean Mexaris, and I mean Abradates, who though but an Exile, yet presumes to look so high as your self. Abradates has the honor to be so neer allied unto your self, replied she, that you cannot be offended at him, unless you are so at your self, therefore I do not defend him. However Sir, I beseech you do not take it ill if I tell you freely, that if I could dispose of my self as I would, I should receive no more visits from you: I am contentled (said he in rising up) but in exchange I will address my self to the Prince your Father, which perhaps will be more advantageous to me: After this, Mexaris went out from the Princess, who was more moved with anger against him, then I am able to express; and I believe he did a very good office unto Abradates, for methought ever since that day, there appeared more esteem of him in all the discourse of Panthea. In the mean time, Mexaris went one day to the Prince of Clasomena, and after much common discourse, he told him, that he could give him some advice which might be advantageous to him: After which, he told him, that honoring him as he did, he thought it expedient to tell him, how he thought it a piece of prudence to take such order, that the Prince Abradates at his return to Court should be desired by the Princess his Daughter, not to carry himself any longer as her Lover, that he knew it was an Alliance which Croessus would not approve on: That moreover, it would not be advantageous unto Panthea to marry an exiled Prince, who had nothing to subsist upon but the benevolence of the King as long as his Mother lived. Afterwards he told him, that if he would transact the matter after this manner, she would not lose the opinion of a Prince, who might place her in a more considerable rank then that of Abradates. The Prince of Clasomena gave Mexaris thanks for the advice which he gave him; and since he was not ignorant of the affection which he bore unto his Daughter, and since the death of the Prince Altis, he wished rather she would marry him then Abradates, he promised him to take his counsel, insomuch as Mexaris driving the nail more home, did discover his Love unto his Daughter, and moved him to make up the match before the King returned: But for all the good language which he gave unto the Father of his Princess, he could not move him unto his desires, nor to give Croessus any such cause of complaint as perhaps might start a Civil War: So that contenting himself with a promise that he would prevent the desires of Abradates as much as he could, and that he would favour his, he refused to marry his Daughter unto him without the Kings consent, or at least until he had refused. However Mexaris thought he had played his game very well, and had obtained very much, in that he was promised his Rival should not thrive: And indeed that very same night, the Prince of Clasomena spoke unto his Daughter, and told her, that she would highly displease him, if at the return of Abradates she did not reject all his offers of service to her; and on the contrary, if she did not with much civility receive the visits of Mexaris. The Princess was much surprized, and vexed at this discourse, yet answered with much wisdom Page 39 and generosity both; for after she had assured her Father that she would be most obedient unto him as long as life was hers, she beseeched him not to injoyne her any thing unworthy of her self and him: As for Abradates, said she unto him, though I do very much honour him, yet I can most easily obey you; but as for Mexaris, who hath most manifestly wronged me, and against whom I have an unalterable aversion, I most humbly beseech you, do not command me to behave my self so unto him, as if I esteemed him, or as if I were any thing obliged to him; for besides the injustice in it, I am afraid I cannot obey you in my heart. Then the Prince of Clasomena would know the cause of her exceptions against him; but though she did aggravate the matter in relating of it, yet he did not take it as she desired he should, but on the contrary told her, that all his misdemeanours were only effects of his extream passion towards her, and therefore he did exact peremptory obedience from her: Until now Madam, it is most certain that Panthea never thought of Abradates, but only in the degree of esteem, and she thought it no difficulty at all unto her to treat him more coldly then usual at his return: But yet for all that, she resolved to look a little better upon Mexaris, by casting some frowns upon Abradates: But her drift was, that if she concurred with her Father in half of his desires, she thought she might the better refuse him the other half; so that to treat Mexaris the worse, she resolved to use Abradates something severely: But Madam, the illustrious Cleander returning in triumph unto Sardis after so many glorious Victories; the Princess began to perceive, that there was more difficulty in acting her resolutions, then ever she imagined: For since every one spoke of nothing but the valour of Abradates, her heart was so moved unto excessive joy, that she saw she was not an absolute Mistriess of her own heart; yet since she could not find a heart absolutely to resist her Fathers commands, she permitted Mexaris after a complementive submission, and asking her pardon to visit her; and though she held but a cold and hollow-hearted correspondency with him, yet he Courtied and followed her to all places. The day of Cleanders Triumph being come, all the Windowes in those streets where he was to pass were filled with Ladies; so that the Princess being there amongst the rest, Mexaris, who had been a dayes journey from Sardis to meet the King, and who for some reasons best known to himself, would not enter the Town with him, came to the house where the Princess was, and many other Ladies with her: As soon as she saw him, she was so exceedingly vexed, that she could not chuse but impart her thoughts unto Doralisa: Good Madam, answered she, by any means do not let the Prince Abradates when he passeth by crowned with his Laurels, have the sorrow to see you with his Rival; nor let him have any cause to fear that this Rival has the least corner of your heart. Really Doralisa, replied the Princess, I wish Mexlaris further off me for my own sake, without any consideration of Abradates, but I know not which way I should berid of him: I must then begin some stinging disputation, said Doralisa, and that perhaps will keep him from looking out when Abradates passeth by: The Princess liked the project, but it did not take, for Mexaris was premeditatedly resolved to observe how the Princess looked upon Abradates when he passed before her, and likewise to make his Rival sad at the sight of him so neer the Princess, and therefore he would not leave her an inch, though she had no kind of inconstant action in her garb, as many have, yet she changed her seat above twenty times, and he likewise changed as often; sometimes she would sit at the Window, and cause Doralisa to sit close by her, but she was no sooner seated, then he would uncivilly intrude unto the same Window, to the end Abradates might see him neer Panthea, and do what she could he would not be shaken off. I shall not relate unto you Madam the magnificence and glory of this Triumph, because time would be but frivolously spent. But give me leave to tell you the Prisoners, the Colours, and all the plunder of the Field, taken from the enemies were passed by, we saw at the last (after above ten thousand Horsemen) the King appear, and after him Abradates and Cleander, as those who had merited all the glory of the Triumph. For my part, I did most circumspectly observe all passages: I observed that as soon as Abradates appeared, he knew the Princess, and saw Mexaris next her, for his eyes payed their devotion only up to that Window where she was. This Prince was that day of so becoming a garb, and his accoutrements all so magnificent, that I never saw him so glorious and amiable in my life. Mexaris no sooner spied him, but he looked whether the Princess saw him, and indeed he was so happy, or to say more truly, so unhappy, that he was an eye-witness of the first thought which the sight of Abradates did raise in her; for although she had before this first sight prepared Page 40 her self against it, yet as soon as she saw him, she blushed, and blushed so as Mexaris observed the joy in her eyes; what sorrow soever his soul suffered, yet he stayed still in his place. But whatsoever he spoke unto the Princess, with intention of moving her to speak unto him when Abradates passed under the Window, could not make her answer him one single syllable. Doralisa observing it, Sir, said she unto him, you need not wonder why the Princess is so silent, for it is impossible she should look, and hear, and speak all at once: Nor would I have her, replied he, For I wish she would not look so long upon Abradates, but that she would hearken unto me, and afterwards answer me. In the mean while, the King, and by consequence Abradates drawing neerer, Mexaris was more sad to observe how this Prince saluted her with such Love and devotion, and in such a becoming manner, that all the Ladies about Panthea did extreamly commend him: But to compleat his misery, the Princess who did intend only to salute him with a common cold civility, could not keep within that compass, but most obligingly leaned out of the Window, and such a free, sprightly, and pleasing ayr appeared in her face, as she made it plainly appear she was ravish'd with joy, so that her looks did cure Abradates of more then half his sorrows to see his Rival so neer her: In exchange, Mexaris was so extreamly vexed, that not being able to abide this any longer, he retired from the Window, and walked up and down the Chamber, whilst the Princess was looking upon Abradates, who looked still that way, until turning into a street upon the left hand, he could look no longer. The poor Perinthus, who being prompted by the passion of his soul, was very desirous to see this first interview of Panthea and Abradates, followed this Prince very close, and had observed how the Princess saluted him most obligingly, he stayed a little behind him, pretending to speak with some body, in hopes the Princess would cast her eyes upon him; but the mind of Panthea being very busie, he saluted her three or four times, and she perceived him not, though her eyes were turned that way, and I think he had made all his complements to no purpose, if Mexaris leaving his walk, had not come unto the Window, and perceived him, and caused the Princess to perceive him also: Madam, said he unto her, I think it may be said, and not improperly, that you see, and you see not; you do not see that which you look upon, otherwise I believe Perinthus to be so compleat a man, that he deserves some return unto his long sallute. The Princess was much surprized at the discourse of Mexaris, unto which he would return no answer, but spied Perinthus under her Window, unto whom she made a hundred obliging signs, by way of excuse, for not seeing him sooner; she called unto Doralisa, and shewed him unto her. Thus did Mexaris much against his mind, make his Rival receive a hundred obliging favours: It is true, Perinthus was not a jot more happy for all these, as well by reason of his cruel thought that the Princess was not friends with him, as because she was ignorant of the passion in his soul. In the mean while, since there was a necessity of Mexaris his going unto the Kings house, and since the Princess told him she would pass the rest of the day in the house wherein she was, he was constrained to leave her: Within a quarter of an hour after he was gone, Perinthus came in, unto whom the Princess expressed a hundred testimonies of friendship towards him. Doralisa, according to her old custome, fell upon the secret passion whereof she was wont to accuse him, and did strive with as much diligence to clear all her suspitions, as if she had some particular interest in him, and she used all possible endeavours to discover whether his heart were already captivated, as she had after suspected; and therefore she never saw him, but she put a hundred odd questions unto him, which did exceedingly puzzle him. After much discourse upon the happy success of this War, the Princess asked Perinthus whether he had not contracted a great knot of friendship with Abradates during this War? For I conceive it very fit, said she, that you two were intimate friends: Friendship Madam, replied he, is not like unto Love, which very commonly grows between two unequal persons; but on the contrary, to compleat a friendship, there is a necessity that it be between two persons of a suitable age, humour and quality: So that since I am very short of Abradates in almost all things, it were rash presumption in me to pretend unto the humour of his friendship: For my part, said the Princess, if I did not think that what you say were out of modesty only, I should wonder your opinion should be so contrary unto mine, for I am fully perswaded, that Love ought always to be between persons of equal condition and quality, but in matters of friendship it is not absolutely necessary; and I should think the fate of Princes to be of all men most miserable, if they should never have any friends but of their own condition, Page 41 who are not always the best accomplished men, and who however are but a very small number. Since your reason Madam, replied Perinthus, is much more clear then mine, perhaps I am mistaken; but I have ever thought that Princes can have only creatures and servants, but few friends: Yet on the contrary, I have thought that the power of Love was never confined into such narrow limits as you prescribe: Ah Perinthus, said the Princess, I conceive there is an absolute necessity in it, yet I do not hold it impossible, that one of high quality should and may stoop so low as to love an inferior: But I say that disproportion in Love, is one of the most extravagant things in the world. But Madam (said Doralisa, and smiled, and having a desire to make Perinthus speak) You do not consider how this passion was in the hearts of men, before ever force put a difference between them, or had made some Sovereigns, and some Subjects: So that according to the first intention of the Gods, the necessary equality to make Love reasonable, is equality of merit, and equality of person, and not of condition and quality, which are strange things, and which serve oft times to render those that possess them in the highest degree, the more contemptible and scorned, when they are not found to be persons of Merit. I conceive Madam, replied Perinthus, that Doralisa speaks much reason: I conceive rather (replied the Princess) that she speaks much wit: But for all that I must maintain, that there is a certain kind of universal discretion, which custome hath established, and ought to be taken as Reason and Law, that the quality of persons who are to Love, should not be disproportionable: If Love, replied Perinthus, were a thing voluntary, I should then think some equity in what you say, but since it is not, I conceive it to be most unjust. By this discourse of Perinthus, (said Doralisa) one may conclude, that if he Love, he Loves above himself, or below himself: Perinthus (said the Princess) speaks this only in general, and makes no particular application; And to tell you truly, I do love Perinthus better then to suspect him of any such thing, for I think him so wise, as that he will aim at no impossibilities, and so full of honour, as that he will not Love below his Quality. Perinthus was now exceeding at an non-plus, for his Love would not permit him to confess the Princess was in the right; and to say she was in the wrong, were either to discover his secret, or to be suspected of a passion unworthy of himself: So that returning a witty enigmatical answer, neither the Princess nor Doralisa could thereby make any certain conclusions. In the mean time, said the Princess, we do the greatest injury in the world unto so many illustrious Heroes, who have hazarded their lives for our safeties, and have not been sparing of their bloods to the end they should be talked on; for in lieu of discoursing upon those glorious acts which they have done in the Wars, we are talking upon matters of Love, which is full of extravagancies and folly. After this, since now it grew late, she rise up, and went home, where Abradates was already come to visit the Prince her Father, who received him very coldly. But as soon as he spied the Princess out of a Balcone, he presently left the Father, and as his devotion called him, went unto his Princess the Daughter. Panthea received him with much civility, but with somewhat less freedom then he saw in her eyes when he passed by her, but his joyes to be neer her was so great, that at the first he made no great reflection upon it; and the less, because he being alone with her, she did it purposely to prevent his boldness in talking of his Love; yet he would not lose such a favourable opportunity, for as soon as the first complements of common civility were performed, and when he had expressed his sorrows for being so long absent from her, also his joyes now to see her, and to see her fairer then ever. If it had pleased the same Gods who give you that lustre Madam (said he unto her) to have also rendred you a little more affable, I should be the most happy man upon earth, I should forget all the sorrows I have suffered, and should think upon nothing but adoring you with delight and reverence. The Princess hearing Abradates say so, and knowing very well by the ayr wherewith he spoke, that the same passion was in his heart which he expressed in his words, her mind was much divided. On the other side, she was not sorry Abradates loved her; and on the other side, considering her Fathers charge, she thought it not permittable to entertain his passion. In the mean time, not being able to fix her resolutions, she took the middle way, and without either too much affability, or incivility, she ordered her conversation so, as Abradates did neither presume, nor despair; yet unquestionless he observed, how her Spirits were not so free and genuine as they were accustomed, but he could not penetrate into the cause. At his departure from her, he went unto Doralisa, whom he highly esteemed, and looked upon her, as one whom the Page 42 Princess loved, to the end he might thoroughly inform himself by his discourse with her, whether Mexaris had reaped any benefit by his absence. Doralisa was ingenuously free to discover what he had desired to know, and told him, that Mexaris was worse in the opinion of Panthea then ever. Moreover (said she unto him) I believe that Prince is not more in Love then he was when you departed, for I am sure he is not more liberal: Also I have used my best arguments to perswade the Princess, that he stayed here behind you, rather to keep and preserve his Treasures, then either for any Love to her, or any reason of State, as he would make her believe he did. Ah Doralisa, said Abradates, you do so fully satisfy my wishes in telling me what I desire to know, that I am afraid you only invent it to please me: You cannot chuse but confess, replied Doralisa, and laughed, that in probability the Prince Abradates is much more esteemed then Mexaris: I know not whether it be probable or no, replied he, but I wish with all my soul it were true: If that be all which wants to make you happy, replied she, then be so, since I do not think there is any one in all the Court who does not esteem you above Mexaris, without any exception of himself, for indeed you are so terrible unto him, that he fears you. Since it is your goodness to answer me so favourably in all things, said he unto her. I am almost imboldned to ask you other questions, which rather then my life I desire to know. Since perhaps I do not know the state of those things which you would inquire of, replied she, so well as I did those unto which I have already answered: My replies unto them will neither be so pleasing, nor so certain. Ha Doralisa, said he, you do most precisely know upon what terms I stand in the opinion of that Princess whom I infinitely adore: Have I not already told you, replied she, that she esteems you more then she doth Mexaris? Yes, replied he: But after a more serious examination of that discourse, which at first did much joy me, I find that to be esteemed a little more then that Prince whom she esteems not at all, is no very great favour: Therefore Doralisa, since you have already engaged me so far, as to tell me thus much, and since the violence of my Love forces me to speak of that which takes up all my thoughts, I most earnestly beseech you, be so generous as to tell me, whether I must die in despair, or live in any hope? Sir, said she unto him, you ask me more then I know, and by consequence more then I can tell you: If I should judge according to your merit, and by the mind of the Princess which is able to discern a compleat man, I should believe that her choice would be of you; but if I judge according to the capriciousness of Fortune, who makes them that most merit to be happy, most miserable, there is cause to fear that many things will cross your desires. Fortune, replied he, may doubtless so frown upon me, that I may never enjoy Panthea: But this Fortune ought not to make any alteration in her heart and thoughts, which is the thing I desire to know. Since I did never precisely ask her what she thought of you, (replied Doralisa) I can tell you nothing of certainty: All I can say is, that knowing Panthea so judicious as she is, I think if you do not prosper in your desires, it will be rather through the fantasticalness of another, then through any aversion she hath towards you. Abradates perceived that Doralisa would not any further explain her self, but he conceived that she knew he should be crossed in his Love. Doralisa the next morning went betimes unto the Princess, and told her all that the Prince had said, and desired to know from her what answers she should hereafter return him, for she imagined that further discourse might be upon the same Subject. You shall allways tell him, replied the Princess, that you are not acquainted with my thoughts, and that you will not undertake to bring any message from him to me. But Madam, replied Doralisa, I hope you will permit me to tell him (what you desire I should) in such a manner of ay, as I may a little better explain your meaning. As for the tone of your voice, replied Panthea, and laughed, I will not regulate you, since I do not think there is any in the world who has a better art to tell things angrily without any harsh words then you, nor who can express any thing more sweetly without any gross flattery. It is not your pleasure Madam, replied Doralisa, that in telling Abradates I do not know your thoughts, I should tell it in such a manner, as if I knew you had an aversion towards him; and it would be an irreparable injury in him to Love you with a most respective passion? No, replied the Princess; nor on the other side would I have you to tell it in such a manner as may let him think, that if you do not tell him my thoughts, it is because they are very advantageous for him: What then, would you precisely have me make him think? (said Doralisa.) I would have him think (answered Panthea) that without any suspicion of subtilty in your words, you dare not speak unto Page 43 me of him, and that you do not at all know the secrets of my heart concerning him, and without any perswasions of him that I am any thing averse, to make him think there is much difficulty in the enterprise; and in sum, that without either making him hate me, or accuse me of his misfortune, or suspecting me of any weakness, I may still have his esteem, and live in quiet. Ha Madam, said Doralisa, if all these must be interpreted by the sound of a voice only, I had need to send for all the Phrygian and Lydian Mulsique about Abradates to help me in the expression of all these passions without any words: For seriously Madam, I cannot do all this, but I must either create hopes or fears in Abradates: Then infuse fears, (said the Princess, and sighed.) Doralisa, who thitherto did but jest with the Princess, according to that usual freedom the Princess gave her, perceiving that the Princess sighed, assumed a more serious look; and Panthea acquainting her with all that the Prince her Father had said unto her, then she considered that great circumspection was to be used in speaking unto Abradates, for she conceived it not convenient to let him know that Mexaris was the man who thwarted his design, lest some bad consequences might thereupon arise, and she knew also that the Princess would not have him think she slighted him: So that Doralisa undertaking the translation of this negotiation, she did manage it with much discretion, and for some daies did so suspend the Spirit of Abradates, that he knew not what to think. In the mean while Perinthus, who heard it from the mouth of the Princess, that nothing was more extravagant then Love between persons of unequal quality, was so excessively sad, that many daies could not dissipate the melancholly which these words (spoken without any design) had infused into his soul; his sorrowes were so excessive, that all the world took notice of the alteration in his humour: The Princess her self perceived it, and as he was one morning with her, and Doralisa there also, Panthea asked her, If in the opinion which he held, that Love only makes compleat men, she thought, that when they cease to Love, they cease to have any amiable quality left in them: For if so, said the Princess, it must be concluded that Perinthus of late hath ceased to Love, since his conversation is not as it was wont to be. No, no, Madam, said Doralisa, it is not so; for he who was once made compleat by virtue of Love, remains so all his life. True it is yet, that this passion which adds a hundred excellent qualities, may sometimes become too too violent, and cause him in whom it reigns to be less pleasant in his conversation, and even transform him from what he is. But Madam, I am so far from thinking Perinthus less sociable, because he hath ceased to love, that on the contrary I am perswaded he is more in Love then ever, or perhaps he is less loved then ever; for commonly where one is possessed with this passion, it is rather from the thoughts of another then from his own, that he becomes unhappy. But yet Doralisa, said the Princess, you have not yet made that discovery which you vaunted to do so easily: It is true Madam, replied she, that I am not yet satisfied whether or no some suspicions I have be well grounded. I pray, said the Princess, acquaint me with those suspicions. Ah Doralisa (cried Perinthus, who feared she would tell Panthea the passages which were before the siege of Ephesus) there are some things which are not to be jested with, and I hope you are so good as you will not so cruelly disoblige me, as to impart that for certainty which you take up on bare surmise, without any appearances. This extraordinary care which you take to prevent my speaking of it, said Doralisa, may be an argument I am not deceived: But however, said she, I will impose silence upon my self. The Princess then began to press Doralisa to tell her what she suspected, but notwithstanding all her importunity, she could not prevail: However, she raised a thousand apprehensions of fear in Perinthus, but yet without cause, for the principal reason which kept Doralisa from telling the Princess what she thought, was, lest the Princess should take it ill she should ever imagine that such a man as Perinthus should dare to look upon the Princess in that way of Love. Whilst this conversation passed on in this manner, Doralisa observed so much agitation in the eyes of Perinthus, that whilst one came into the Room upon some business to the Princess, she addressed her self unto him, and told him, that he had much confirmed her in her suspicions: Why Doralisa, said he, would you have me suffer you to tell such a thing as this unto the most severe Princess upon earth? Really you made my heart tremble as much as if you were ready to put me out of the favour of her whom you say I Love: Perinthus very subtilly spoke this with as much freedom of Spirit in appearance, that he much amazed Doralisa, and perswaded her she was mistaken. Thus Madam did things stand at this present; Abradates was fuller of fears then hopes, Mexaris on the contrary hoped Page 44 all, and feared nothing, Perinthus having neither hopes nor fears, concluded himself the most unfortunate man alive. As for the Princess, she had as strong an aversion to Mexaris, as she had an inclination to Abradates, and was as friendly to Perinthus, as she was either to Doralisa or my self. But whilst Mexaris was taking thought which way he might obtain the Kings leave to marry Panthea, and whilst Abradates thought to strengthen himself by the friendship of Cleander, the conspiracy of Antaleon was discovered, which made so great a noyse, that I believe you are not ignorant of it, for it was the whole discourse of all the Court for a long time: But Madam, to see the difference which was between the souls of Mexaris and Abradates. The first of these did secretly endeavour to make Croessus believe that this Prince had a hand in the conspiracy, but do what mischief he could, the King would never entertain the least suspicion of it: But as for Abradates, his soul was of a more Noble temper; for there chanced to be two men who had been servants to Mexaris, and had received no wages from him; these men seeing the liberality of Abradates, and knowing him to be a Rival unto their Master, addressed themselves unto him, and told him, that if he pleased they could accuse their Master of such a crime as would set him far enough from Court: These two men, whose souls were as vile, as Mexaris was covetous, made this Proposition unto him: Abradates heard them with horror, and did contemptuously reject them, and their offer: And afterwards, since I believe (said he unto them) that you were not induced to so vile an act, but because the avarice of your Master hath made you poor, I will put you into a condition wherein you may chance find out a better then he was, and not be forced to commit crimes for a subsistence; and then he caused greater rewards to be given unto them, then they ever could have hoped for, if though he had employed them in the business, which they proposed unto him: They were so surprized with this generosity, and so ashamed of their own perfidie, that they could hardly resolve to accept of this offer, yet at last they did, but how magnanimious soever this action was, it had never been known, had not these two fellows quarrelled about dividing this Largess, and the one killed the other in the going from the house of Abradates; so that the murderer being apprehended, and brought into the hands of Justice, where pressed by the remorse of his own conscience, he confessed the true cause of his crime; so that by this accident, the Heroique action of Abradates came to be divulged to all the world, and particularly to Mexaris, who gave him but a cold complement for it. As for the Princess, her joy at it was so great, that she could not chuse but tell Abradates of it, and commend his generosity: Madam, said he unto her, I know no reason you have to commend me so highly, for it is no such excessive virtue to prevent the doing of a bad action; yet if the act be considered in another respect, which is matter of Rivalship, in that I should not consent to have him set out of my way, it may be thought a little virtue in me, if I had not a more noble way to rid my self of my enemies when they urge me unto it. Ah Abradates, said she unto him, you will urge me to chide you in lieu of giving you any commendations: I beseech you then Madam, replied he, give me some assurance that the joyes which you express is not because I would not give way that the Prince Mexaris should be sent further from you: I will most certainly assure you, answered she, upon condition you will promise me to avoid all manner of quarrels with that Prince as much as possible you can: Before I make such a promise, replied he, the Princess of Clasomena must give me some assurance, that she will look with a favourable eye upon me, otherwise I must confess, my despair may provoke me to take revenge upon my Rival for all the rigours of my Mistress: That would a piece of high injustice, replied she, to punish him who is not in the fault; and therefore it were better (said she, and blusht) to cast off her that is so severe: Yes Madam (said Abradates) so I would, if I could, and not cast off my life with her: But Madam, I love you not so little, as that I can desire to love you less; but on the contrary, though I love you as much as for my soul I can, yet methinks I love you not enough: Yet truly I should think my self much obliged unto you, replied she, if you would look upon me with more indifference then you do: Believe me Madam, replied he, you would never thank me for giving you that satisfaction: But inhumane Lady, Is it possible that the purest and most adoring passion that ever was, can offend you? If it do not offend me, replied she, yet it must be confessed that at the least it disquiets me, and therefore I should be very glad you would only esteem me: You may as well add, answered he, that you wish that I had neither eyes nor reason, for otherwise you desire impossibilities; for as long as I have my sight, I shall find you Page 45 the fairest of your sex, and as long as I have my reason free, I shall admire you as the wonder of Nature and the world, and without either eyes or reason, certainly I should still adore you: Yes Madam, my heart is totally yours, and my Love of you, and none but you, is grown to such an ingrafted custome, that though my tears should blind me, and my sorrowes sink me out of my wits, yet my very pace would conduct me to you: Judg then Madam, I beseech you, whether it be possible I should only esteem you: No, no, Madam, there is no possibility in it, I never had strength enough to resist the All-commanding power of your Charms, since I first had the honour to see you in the Wood, and by the Fountain: Take it not ill therefore I most humbly conjure you, that I persevere in loving you as long as I have life: If your goodness and pity could resolve to afford any testimonies of a particular affection, I will promise to lay open my heart and soul unto you, and never to think upon any designs but such as you are pleased to infuse, nor ever to meddle with the Prince Mexaris but according unto your Dictates; but if on the contrary, you persevere in that severity which of late you have used towards me, it shall go hard (notwithstanding the respects I owe unto the Brother of Croessus, or the Queen of Susiana) if I do not find out wayes of revenge upon him whom I think to be the cause of my misfortune. It seems (said the Princess then) that my assurance of you, that the Prince Mexaris is not in any favour with me will take away from you all cause of quarrel with him: It seems Madam (replied he) that since in consideration of him, the Prince your Father does treat me worse then heretofore, there needs no other reason to induce me to ruine him: Yet if I have any power with you, said Panthea, you shall attempt nothing against him. Since it is your command Madam, that for the Love of you I must respect my Rival, I beseech you for the Love of me, give me some obliging comfort. Provided you will punctually obey me (answered Panthea, and smiled) I will pardon all which you have said this day: I shall obey you Madam (answered he) upon this condition, that you will please to permit me often to take new commands from your own mouth, for otherwise I am afraid I shall fail in my promise. As Panthea was ready to reply, Cleander entred, and caused the Princess to change the discourse, who since that day did by little and little accustome her self to hear Abradates complain unto her of those miseries which she her self had caused: It was her will also, that Doralisa and my self should sweeten those bitter thoughts which he had of the Prince Mexaris; for though the Princess had confessed unto him, that she esteemed him more then any in the world, yet she alwayes constantly told him, that she could not resolve to disobey her Father; and therefore all that she could do for him, was to promise, that she would deny him as far as decency would permit. Some hopes he had also that Mexaris would not prosper in his design, because Cleander assured him, that Croessus would certainly oppose that Alliance out of some reasons of State, and promised him that he would confirm him in that opinion so effectually, as Mexaris should never bring his hopes to pass. These promises and assurances did much lessen the fears of Abradates: Since he knew Perinthus to be a Favourite of the Prince of Clasomena, he Courted him very much with a hundred complements: The Princess also was very glad that Perinthus had the Love of Abradates, and often bad him speak as much as he could in his favour: But the more testimonies of esteem she expressed unto this Prince, the more violent designs did he forge in his heart to ruine him: But for all this, as he was a man of a generous Spirit, he was sometimes ashamed of his own weakness, and of the injustice of his thoughts; yet Love being too strong a Master, he could not chuse but grieve more at the passion of Abradates, then at that of Mexaris. In the mean time, since there was a good correspondence between Panthea and Abradates, it was her desire he should be more reserved in his visits, to the end she might better perswade the Prince her Father that she was obedient as concerning Abradates; and that she might have more reason to resist him, in case he would needs force her to marry Mexaris; yet did he see her every day, either at the Prince of Lydia's lodging, or at Doralisa's. Thus did things rest, until the Prince Abradates lost a great friend, and maintainer of the illustrious Cleander, who as you are not ignorant was arrested as a Prisoner. This accident raised a greater disorder in the Court then I know how to express, for there was not one (except Mexaris, who looking upon him as the Protector of Abradates, was glad of his disgrace) who had not eyes full of tears, and who did not accuse Croessus of much precipitation and injustice, for suspecting him upon such slight surmizes, a man who had made him a Debtor for so many Victories: But the tears for Cleander were no sooner dried, but all eyes were swelled Page 46 again with new ones for the Princess Palmis, who was also arrested, and carried to Elphesus amongst the professed Votaries. After all this, Mexaris began to huff, and look big, with more authority then usual; and Croessus knew very well that Cleander, whom he would not acknowledg for the Prince Artamas, was very serviceable unto him, to make all the Grantees of his Dominions respectively obedient unto him. But now Mexaris began to speak of his Marriage, as a match almost made up; and since it was not to be imagined he would speak so, unless he had some assurance of it from Croessus, those who told Abradates of it spoke so confidently, as if it were out of any question; So that he in an absolute despair went unto Doralisa, who being then not well, the Princess came to see her. It is impossible Madam I should tell you all that Abradates spoke that day unto the Princess, for he spoke so much, that she had much ado to answer. Sometimes he would find fault with her lue-warmness towards him, sometimes he would conjure her to assist him; presently after, he would beseech her to cast off Mexaris. Thus passing from one discourse to another, without varying from the same subject, they passed away all the Afternoon, and nothing was resolved upon till Doralisa began to speak. Madam (said she unto Panthea) Why do you not employ Perinthus unto the Prince your Father, you know he is very prevalent with him: 'Tis true, said Panthea, But I will not discover my heart unto so many men, until the utmost extremity; Yet I promise you, said she, If the business be arrived at such a height as Abradates speaks of, I shall strive with my self to speak unto Perinthus, that he would transact with the Prince my Father against Mexaris. Will you not be pleased to move him also in behalf of Abradates, said this Prince unto her? That's more then I can do, replied she, and I should but deceive you if I should promise it. In the mean time, Perinthus hearing as others did, that Mexaris gave out, as if he were to marry Panthea out of hand; and knowing moreover from the Prince of Clasomena, that Mexaris assured he was not now upon such teams as to fear Croessus would be an obstacle, as he did whil'st Prince Altis was alive, or before the imprisonment of Cleander, therefore Perinthus thought him|self in some danger from thence, as long as his business was to defeat the designs of a beloved Lover, he thought it advantageous, that Mexaris should be preferred before Abradates: But as soon as he heard Mexaris talk of marrying Panthea, his desires were to defeat the designs of him whose interest he advanced before. Afterwards considering with himself what a miserable misfortune it would be unto the Princess, to marry a Prince, against whom he knew she had a most unalterable aversion, he repented of all he had done; and when he understood that the match was made, and the Marriage ready to be performed, he fell into a most horrid despair, and offered above a hundred times to go and confess all his crimes unto the Princess, and then kill himself at her feet: For, would he say, What have I to do but die, since I can never be happy, and since I can|not live, unless I hinder the happiness of the only person whom I love? But (sometimes would he say) Why then cannot I give my consent she should marry Mexaris? For since I am most certain that I my self can never pretend unto her, there can no bet|ter way be found to take her quite from Abradates, then to bestow her for ever unto Mexaris: But then, (would he say presently after) Is not Mexaris my Rival as much as the other? And is it sufferable that any one should marry the person one Loves? Ha! no, no, my design was never that Panthea should be the wife of Mexaris: I would have Abradates defeated in his design of her, but I would never have her bestowed upon his Rival and mine: Then (would he say after) upon better thoughts, Is it just, that to lessen my own miseries a little, I should render that Princess whom I adore, the most unfortunate person upon earth? She, I say, who has given me a thousand testi|monies of her favour and esteem, unto whom I never did, nor durst discover my passion: She, I say, against whom I cannot complain, though she should for ever banish me, if I should presume to tell her that I loved her; and she who might without injustice hate me, if she knew what I did against her. In the mean time, I cannot allow her to be the wife of Abradates; and since I cannot enjoy her whom I do love, there is some Justice that she who infused that cruel passion into my heart, should tast of the same misery, in never marrying Abradates. After he had thus discoursed upon the matter, and considered the present state of things, he phancied a course, by which he thought he might prevent both Mexaris and Abradates from mar|rying Panthea; and this was his project. Since the commitment of Cleander, Andramites, who conducted the Princess Mandana, and the Princess Palmis from Ephesus to Page 47 Sardis, was in great favour with Croessus, and a particular friend unto Perinthus, who was with him every day, as well because they often met together at Court, as because Andramites being a Lover of Doralisa, he Courted her, and followed her in all places, and by consequence was very oft at the Prince of Clasomena's lodging, where Perinthus was a daily guest. This secret Lover then did proceit to prejudice Abradates in the opi|nion of Panthea's Father, and to prejudice Mexaris also by the intercession of Andramites, whom he designed to employ unto Croessus: And not to defer the execution of his resolves, he went to find out his friend: He told him, that the Princess Panthea having an invincible aversion to the Prince Mexaris, she had employed him to find out some course to defeat all the designs which he had upon her, and that he knew of no better way then addresses unto him, that he would be pleased to negotiate so with Croessus, that he should not approve or consent unto the match. Andramites, who loved Perinthus, and who hoped for some good offices from him towards Doralisa; and who moreover knew that Croessus had reason to dislike the Marriage between Mexaris and Panthea, did promise him to negotiate so effectually, that he would absolutely hinder Mexaris from ever Marrying the Princess by the consent of Croessus, for he knew the dislike of that Prince unto this Alliance. Perinthus returned thanks with abundance of joy, and stayed not long for accomplishment of his hopes, for within two daies after, Croessus did for|bid Mexaris from thinking of any Marriage with Panthea, proposing unto him another match. Since Mexaris was resolved to look more high then formerly he used, he took this language very fiercely: But Croessus being transported with anger at an answer of so little respect, did talk unto him with such Authority, that Mexaris was glad to submit to be silent, and to retire, and I believe he would have left Sardis, if his Love to Pan|thea had not stayed him. In the mean time, fearing the Prince of Clasomena should cool upon the matter, he went unto him, assuring him that he should ere long prevail with the King, and conjuring him not to alter his intentions: The truth is, the Prince of Clasomena saw Mexaris so neer unto the Crown, that he promised him what he could desire. You may imagine Madam, how great was the joy of Panthea, when she heard of all the passages between Croessus and Mexaris, and how Abradates was ravisht at the defeat of his Rival: Since they knew not from whence this good fortune should proceed, they did attribute it only unto Croessus, who out of reasons of State did dislike and op|pose the Marriage; So that the first private meeting which Abradates had with Doralisa about it, we consumed two whole hours in discourse of nothing else, and rejoicing at it. In the mean while, whil'st Andramites was thus negotiating with Croessus against Mexaris, Perinthus transacted secretly against Abradates with the Prince of Clasomena: So that hoping to hinder both Princes from enjoying that person whom both they and he loved, he became more jocand and sociable then he used to be. Mexaris for his part, consider|ing what courses were most expedient to take, seemed to comply unto the Kings com|mands, seeming to smother the passion which was in his soul, though his intentions allwayes were to marry Panthea, and so he assured the Prince her Father in secret. Whil'st these things were thus carried on, Andramites, who was deeply in Love with Doralisa, (and had been so before he married that fair one, who died about a year since) desired Perinthus to do him all the good offices he could unto Doralisa, which Perinthus promised to do; and further telling him, that if his own endeavours would not prevail, he would beseech the Princess to favour his desires. Thus was Perinthus ingaged to return the favours of Andramites; so that he set himself not only to speak in his advantage unto Doralisa, but he desired me also to speak, which accordingly I did upon the first fit opp|portunity, though I told her it was at the instance of Perinthus. I think Madam, that I told you already, Doralisa did much esteem Perinthus; and perhaps, if she had been able to infuse such thoughts into his heart as she desired, he should have been tender enough towards her; and sin|ce it was so, it may easily be imagined, that though he was importune in behalf of Andramites, yet he was so far from serving him, that he did rather did prejudice him, yet did she return no uncivil answers, but in such a man|ner as he might easily see he did not very great good office for his friend. Then Madam, to perplex Perinthus the more, it chanced, that the Princess, who breathed some hopes to marry the Prince Abrada|ts, and did foresee that she should then leave Sardis, she resolved by no means to lose Doralisa, and therefore did project to marry her unto Pe|rinthus, since she knew that Doralisa did much esteem him, she made no question, but if he could or would express any affection to her, she would receive him very favourably. Page 48 So that at his going out of Doralisa's house, where he had been to sollicite in behalf of Andramit|s, he received command to come unto the Princess: He was no sooner with her, but she told him that she would give him some testimonies of her friendship. I have received so many already Madam, said he unto her, that I need not wonder to find you so full of goodness: But do what I can Madam, I am afraid I shall dye in ingratitude. You may soon acquit your self in point of gratitude (said she) if you please. I most humbly beseech you Madam (said he in haste) tell me which way? By applying your self a little more unto Doralisa (said she unto him,) for Perinthus, you will much oblige me, if you look upon her as one whom I desire you to marry, to the end I may not lose her; and that engaging you both in my service, we may be for ever inseparable: I am sure (said she, and would not give him time to speak) that Doralisa for all her talk does not think you in love, no more then I do; therefore knowing how much you esteem her, and what the merit and fortune of this person is, I do not think this an unjust Proposition, nor that you ought to refuse it. Panthea having ended her speech, and Perinthus returned out of that maze which the motion of the Princess had put him into, he answered her with no less subtilty then civility, though with most sensible sorrow. I think my self most unhappy Madam (said he unto her) that you should desire of me such things as are both unjust and impossible; though you beleieve it to be so just and easie, yet it is neither the one nor the other. Why Perin|thus (said the Princess) is it any Injustice that one that is a most accomplished man, and one whose Soul is not already engaged, should marry the most amiable and spritely woman upon Earth, and one who wishing for a heart that never was in love, finds such a one in you? Yet Madam, replied he, though I were such a one as you speak, I should never please her; for Doralisa expects to be loved, and truly I cannot love her otherwise then I should do a Sister. Yet I pray you seem as if you did more (replied the Princess) and I shall think my self much obliged; and though at the first you can love her no otherwise then as a Sister, yet time may make you love her as your Wife. Truly Madam, replied he, I cannot do more; for not knowing you had any such design as this, I have spoke un|to her with extream zeal in behalf of Andramites, who is ready to dye for love of her; and who is not only every way a more accomplished man then my self, but is a man of much better fortunes then I: therefore Madam, though I should take upon me to dissem|ble a love, it would be to little purpose after all this: moreover, What might Andramites think of my false proceeding? and when you have well thought upon it, what would your self think of me? Ha Perinthus (said the Princess) though you will not obey me, yet how|ever let me entreat you not to solicit for Andramites; for if it be possible I would not have Doralisa married in Sardis. If the Prince Mexaris marry you (said Perinthus to her) you will not lose her though she marry Andramites. 'Tis true, said she, but thanks be to the Gods I shall never marry him; but I have some Reasons to think I shall ere long leave Sardis, and return into Clasomena. If the Prince Abradates (said he to discover her mind) should be so happy as to marry you, he would not carry you to Susa, for his affairs are not so well composed for it; and I do not know vv|hether or no Croessus would suffer him to dwell in Clasomena. However it be (said the Princess and blushed) I would not have Andramites marry Doralisa, but wish vv|ith all my heart Perinthus vv|ould marry her. I cannot betray my trust Madam, said he to her and sighed. I cannot conceive (replied the Princess) but since you esteem Doralisa so much as you do, and also loves her, as you say, as much as if she vv|ere your Sister, but you may very easily obey me: For, as for Andrami|tes, added she, I will undertake to give him satisfaction. As she vv|as saying so, Doralisa entered, vv|ho finding Perinthus alone vv|ith her, and imagining that he vv|as desiring her to speak in favour of Andramites: For Heavens sake Madam, said she unto Panthea, do me the favour to tell me vv|hether I vv|as not the subject of your discourse? Indeed you vv|ere, replied the Princess, and that so much, that vv|e spoke of nothing else. I do imagine, replied Doralisa, that Perinthus, to testifie unto you as vv|ell as unto me, that I have not very great share in his heart, hath desired you to solicit me in behalf of Andramites: but Madam, if he have, I beseech you deny him, for I do not know that man in the World which I vv|ould not marry before him: Yet he is a most compleat man, replied Perinthus. 'Tis true, said she; but since questionless he loved the Lady which he married, who indeed was very fair and amiable he is not fit for my purpose, since I am resolved to have none but such a one as never loved any but my self. As she pronounced this last word, Andramites entered, who easily perceived that the endea|vors of Perinthus had not been very propitious; for Doralisa, whose spirits were in|censed, Page 49 not knowing very well at what, did jeer that day extremely, and so much the more, because she observed it pleased the Princess. Within a while after, much company coming in, and Andramites talking to her in a low voyce, she brought him unto such a pass, as he did protest unto her, that he never loved any but her, no not his wife which he married. Fie Andramites (cried she out) how is it possible then you should ever love me, me I say, who am neither so fair nor lovely as she was: Then would he have told her that he could not love his Wife, because he loved her at that same time, and that he never would have married her, but in obedience to his father: yet all these were but cold arguments to help him; for she being tickled with the passage that he should tell her he never loved his Wife, and seeing all the company departed but Perinthus and Andramites, she began to laugh and jeer, and tell him as much as ever the most improsperous Lover could possibly deserve: and since it was a most odd kind of Complement, that one who would persuade another to marry him, should tell her he never loved his Wife, the Princess could not chuse but laugh also. But though Andramites would excuse all by saying, the Reason was because he could love none but her, yet all his arguments would not serve. Perinthus also, desiring to testify unto his friend that he was as zealous in his behalf as he could, did maintain that Doralisa was much beholding to him for loving her better than his Wife, or for loving her so much that he could not love his Wife at all. But all the arguments they both could devise, were not able to convince Doralisa. Perinthus was much perplexed, for he durst not speak so zealously in behalf of his friend, as he should if the Princess had not spoke unto him; for he was afraid to speak much to his advantage, lest he should incense her so, that he thought himself in a strait confinement. After this, the Princess was often perswading Perinthus to alter his design, but she found him still in an unalterable obstinacy: she did not yet acquaint Doralisa with her project: I only did know of it; for she being still in hopes to change his mind, she would not tell Doralisa what resistance she found in him. In the mean while Perinthus durst hardly look either upon the Princess or Doralisa, but fell into an extream melancholy: As for Abradates, since his liberality had won him all the servants belonging to the Prince of Clasomene, he was informed by them who heard Perinthus speak unto his Master, that he did solicit for Mexaris with all his zeal: so that going the very same hour unto Doralisa to ask her advice whether he should acquaint the Princess with it, or speak unto Perinthus, he there understood by Andramites that it was Perinthus also which moved him to induce Croessus unto the hinderance of the marriage between Mexaris and Panthea: for though Doralisa did treat him very coarsely, yet sometimes she would make him tell her any thing she desired to know: so that Abradates imparted unto her all that he knew, and she afterwards all that Andramites told her unto him; and since these two things were contraries, yet seemed most certain they did extremely perplex him. Then they determined not to beleieve any thing, nor to resolve upon any course, until they knew what the Princess conceived upon the matter. Doralisa went presently to her, and told all that both Abradates and her self did know: and particularly how Andramites (thinking doubtless to do a good office to Perinthus and himself also) told her that it was by his negotiation that Mexaris was out of favour with Croessus. Truly, replied the Princess, if what Andramites reports be true, I am much obliged unto Perinthus; and if that which is told unto Abradates be true, I have great cause of complaint against him, since he knows I cannot endure Mexaris. That which admires me most, said the Princess, is, that he who informed Abradates that Perinthus did solicit for Mexaris, is not a man likely to tell a lye; therefore I rather think it to be Andramites who tells the untruth. No Madam, said Doralisa, certainly Andramites did not invent it. Then must I be satisfied of my doubts (replied the Princess) from Perinthus himself; for I know him to be a man of honour and sincerity, who I am fully perswaded will confess the truth of any thing whatsoever: So that deferring no longer, she sent for Perinthus; and Doralisa coming into my Chamber, she left Panthea at liberty to examine Perinthus. As soon as he was come, she looked attentively upon him; I pray Perinthus (said she unto him) tell me whether I must chide you or thank you? I think Madam, replied he, you have not reason to do either; since I do not remember I ever did you any considerable service to deserve the one, and since I am sure I never intended to displease you so far as to deserve the other: Nevertheless, said she, I am informed by one that you have done me an extraordinary piece of service; and by another, that you have been extremely perfidious: Tell me therefore Perinthus, have you obliged or disobliged me? However I promise you to pardon the crime if you confess it: Page 50 Tell me then Perinthus, what I must think of you? Madam, said he unto her, when I shall know whereof I am accused, I will see if I can justify my self. To shew you (said she unto him) That I had rather commend then accuse you: Tell me first whether it is to you that I am obliged for causing Croessus to be so sharp with Mexaris? It is very true Madam (replied he) that since I could not think Mexaris worthy of you, and having observed a great aversion in you towards him, I induced Andramites to speak unto Croessus that he would break off that Marriage, which I knew would displease you. Thus far, replied Panthea, I am much obliged to you: But why then, in speaking unto the Prince my Father, did you not negotiate according to my mind? And why were you such a defender of Mexaris to him?

Perinthus hearing the Princess, did change colour, and she perceiving the alteration which appeared in his eyes, knew by it that there was some truth in the reports; yet notwithstanding, since Love is never without an excuse for any crime, Perinthus found one: I must confess Madam (said he unto her) that your intelligence is good, and that in certain occasions, wherein the Prince your Father was pleased to intimate unto me how fully he was resolved to marry you unto the Prince Mexaris, I did not directly oppose his intentions, and my reason was, because I knew that it was not in his power to execute them: Then did I persuade him as well as I could, not to suffer this Prince to marry you without the consent of Croessus, which I knew he could not obtain: I did sometimes agree with him that Mexaris was a great Prince, who in all likelyhood one day would be King of Lydia: So that Madam, without any prejudice unto your interests, I preserved my self in his favour, but did not deprive my self of any means to do you any serviceable office to him when occasion should serve. Your answer (replied the Princess) is full of wit, and seems also to be true, since there is no likely reasons why you should negotiate two contraries at one time: But yet since there is something in your proceeding which is not suitable to your usual manner of transacting, you shall repair the fault, by answering me ingenuously to what I shall ask you; therefore if you will persuade me that your intentions were clear, give me an exact and faithful account of all that the Prince my Father said unto you, concerning me; for since I shall never attempt any thing against his pleasure, and since I never look but to be miserable, I do not think my demand of you is unjust. I do promise you Madam (said he very craftily) to tell you every thing which he said concerning the Prince Mexaris. Do not alter my words, replied the Princess, but ingage your self to tell me all that he said concerning me. Perinthus, who knew well the Princess would not have spoke so, but because she would know what the Prince her Father said unto him concerning Abradates, he was so non-plused, that he knew not what to answer; but at the last, since she pressed him very much; I am so afraid (said he unto her) to tell you any thing which shall not please, that I am sorry to be ingaged unto what you desire me: The Princess wished she had the hardiness to let him know that she should be no less obliged unto him for speaking in behalf of Abradates, as for speaking against Mexaris, but he could not do it; and I believe if she had made that prayer unto him, he would either have sunk down with sorrowes, or else have expressed such marks of his passion as she would have perceived it. After this discourse, Panthea did really believe that Perinthus had no other intentions but to employ his fortunes in serving her, and possessed Abradates with the same opinion: But as for Doralisa, she was not so easily perswaded into that belief, but on the contrary, all her suspicions of the passion of Perinthus began to revive in her mind; yet since she did really esteem him, she said nothing to the Princess lest she should injure him, yet she could not chuse but impart her thoughts unto me, after she had made me promise her secrecie: At the first, I could not believe her serious, but afterwards my suspicions were stronger then hers; I absolutely concurred with the opinion of Doralisa, and resolved as well as she, not to prejudice so excellent a qualified man as Perinthus was upon bare suspicions, which perhaps were ill-grounded, since they were built only upon conjectures, which often are fallacious, and therefore I resolved peremptorily not to speak a word of any thing to the Princess; yet notwithstanding, since this might grow unto some bad consequences, we resolved to observe him very circumspectly, and to inform each other of our discoveries: I confess Madam, that I committed one piece of lightness in this business, in telling Doralisa of that Proposition which the Princess made unto him concerning her Marriage; but methought it so manifest a testimony of that passion which we suspected, as I could not keep it from her: I had no sooner Page 51 told it, but I wisht it in again, yet not long; not that I told it unto her in such a manner as might give her any cause of complaint; yet for all that, I perceived it touched her so to the quick, that it made her blush. I leave you to consider (said I then unto her to please her) whether Perinthus, esteeming you as he doth, and proffering so much friendship, would not have received that motion which the Princess made with much joy, though he had no love at all towards you, if she had not been in Love with some other, and therefore it must be concluded that he is in Love with another, and that other is certainly the Princess. If he be in Love with Panthea (replied Doralisa) I do pardon him with all my heart for the same passion which he is possessed with, will sufficiently punish him for the folly of it: But if it be with any other, I will be revenged upon him, both for his refusal, and the injury which the Princess hath done me, in making such an offer without acquainting me. Doralisa, maugre her anger, yet knew very well that the intentions of the Princess were very obliging; but however, she would not complain so much against Perinthus, as against her. Since this time, this close Lover could hardly hide himself from us, in all his actions and all his words, we thought we saw evident symptoms of his Love: Also we observed him so closely, that he perceived us, and asked the reason. Since he feared lest the Princess should acquaint Doralisa with those passages which were between them, and fearing also least she should take them ill, he doubled his civilities towards her, not daring to speak unto her of Andramites, whom Doralisa at the desire of the Princess did treat less severely, since it was by his means Mexaris was crossed in his designs. In the mean while, Mexaris building his hopes upon the word of the Prince of Clasomene, did wait for some favourable opportunity, either to alter the mind of Croessus, or to marry Panthea whether he would or no, if there were no other remedy; so that he lived a life full of anxiety, and hopes of a happy success in his design: Abradates was more happy then he, for being sure of Panthea's heart, that very thought sweeten all his bitter hours, maugre all oppositions and obstacles which crossed his compleat happiness: But as for the miserable Perinthus, his life was a constant series of sorrows, yet he had his poor intervals of ease, to think that Panthea neither marrying Mexaris nor Abradates, perhaps would never Marry. He has told me since, that when he thought that such a thing might perhaps be, he was almost as much joyed at the very thought of it, as any Lover could be in the enjoyment of his Mistress. Thus did things rest for a certain time, 'till'the Love of Andramites unto Doralisa made conversation very pleasant, since certainly never was any fuller of witty, odd, and gallant expressions then this Lady was unto him, for as he alwayes affirmed, that he had never loved any but her: So she told him alwayes, that if he had loved the wife he had lost, he had not been for her humour; and if he had not loved her, then he was most unjust, since she was very fair and lovely, and by consequence she would never marry one that had been an ill Husband. Upon a day then, when Mexaris and Abradates were both with the Princess, though the last of these came but seldom by the orders of Panthea: Doralisa asked them, since they spoke unto her concerning Andramites, whether she had not good reason to reject the desires of a man, who never dropt a tear for the death of his Wife? If he had seen her die, (said Abradates to her) and never grieved at it, only because he looked upon her as an obstacle unto his design to be loved by you, he is so far from being guilty of insensibility, that you ought to commend his constancy, and to recompence him for it. It is true, said Doralisa, in that respect I am obliged to him; But why would he marry her, if he loved me? And if he did not love me, why did he not grieve for her? But if he should grieve for her, said the Princess, he could not love you? I confess it, replied she, and he would be more happy in it, if he did not Love me: His happiness would be very mean, replied Mexaris, who should eternally lament the death of one he did love: And I assure you (answered Doralisa, and smiled) that a living Mistress, who is a little phantastical, is as troublesome as any dead wife, though she were the worst in the world: Your arguments, replied Mexaris, are against your self: There are a sort of slight phancies (said Abradates) which beauties were only as pretty vanities, which are very troublesome to those that love them: And there are some also (replied Mexaris very coldly) unto whom they are advantages, and without reason makes them to be preferred before other, who do not value them: It may chance so, replied Abradates; but I for my part, who owe much respect unto Ladies, and have no less opinion of their judgment then of their wit, I am perswaded the commonly happy Lovers deserve to be so: You have reason doubtless (said Doralisa) Page 52 and those fault-finding Lovers who never speak but are accusing them they love, either of fantasticalness, or want of Judgment, are certainly both fantastical and indiscreet themselves: such men as these are they who are offended at any trivial matter, and think much better of themselves then they deserve, conceiving high injustice to be done them, if they be not accepted of, and esteemed as much as they esteem themselves.

It's very true (said the Princess, not being able to forbear) and I know some who do as you say: And I do know some also (said Doralisa) and perhaps the same you mean: but however, since Love is blind as well as Justice, it must operate in the hearts of Ladies as it ought to do in the hearts of Judges, to wit, without Partiality, or Consideration of Greatness, or Quality, or Menaces, or Complaints of Pretenders: It ought to judge equally with equity upon the merit and services of those who offer them. Why then do you not judg in favour of Andramites, replied Abradates? Because I do not find it within the compass of my power, replied she; all the favour that I can do him, is not to judg him at all. Yet since you do beleieve, said Mexaris, that Love makes all the compleat men in the World, why do you not think Andramites very accomplished, since certainly he loves you infinitely? I never said, replied she, that all those who are in love are compleat men; but that none can be perfectly compleat unless he have been in love: so that it is not for that reason I refuse Andramites, whose merit is very high; but only because if he did love his Wife, I cannot admit of him, since I will have such a heart as never loved any; and if he did not love her, I shall much dislike him, because I conceive it was his duty to love her. The general Rule then, replied Abradates, which saith that Love is a cause of Love, and that he which loveth causeth himself to be loved, holds not true, since Andramites cannot move your heart. The Rule you mention, replied she, is not general, and I should be very sorry it were. But that which hath caused this saying, which is known amongst all Nations, and sometimes found false, is certainly because the true intention and meaning of those who first made it a general Rule, was never understood: for indeed they did never intend that to love one ought infallibly to be loved: but their meaning as well as mine certainly was, that to move another to love it is requisite to be loving: so that in saying unto a man, If thou desirest I should love thee, then love me, I instruct him in the means to obtain his end, and to make that which is good in his heart to appear; and sometimes that which is evil, added the Princess. Love though ought not to be blamed Madam (replied Doralisa) which certainly never infuseth any evil inclinations: And as one cannot complain against the Sun (which I always compare with Love) because it nourisheth a thousand venomous vermin at the very same time that it blancheth the Lillies, and Rubies the Roses: so Love ought not to be accused for the business of some leud Lovers that are in the World, since it inspires only heroique actions, and causeth men to practise all the virtues, who without this passion were perhaps men of rude Souls: If men be bad, the fault is not in Love, but them: if the dunghill stink when the Sun shines upon it, the fault is not in the Sun, but in the dunghill. The Princess laughed heartily at the expressions of Doralisa, and so did Abradates: But as for Mexaris, he was much nettled; and the more, because Doralisa bolted out a hundred things which touched him to the quick: and once he observed, that when Abradates and Doralisa looked upon one another, they smiled and winked in derision; and that Abradates by a nod of his head seemed to thank Doralisa for all her bitter jeers which she had vented. So that these things exasperating his spirit, he spoke not a word that day, unless some short and sharp words to Abradates, who answered him with as much resolution, as the Respect which he owed unto the Princess, and the Quality of his Rival, would permit him. Since she observed the perplexities of Mexaris, she endeavored to sweeten the Conversation; and indeed the colour of this Prince seeming to cool a little, she did not suspect any ill consequence of it. They went both from the Princess at the same time, for when Mexaris saw that Abradates was going, he took leave of the Princess also, and would needs be gone, though she desired to stay him: When they were at the bottom of the stairs, Mexaris talked with one of his men in a low voyce; and afterwards asked Abradates, if he would walk 〈◇〉 turn in the Gardens of the Palace which were close by; and Abradates answered, he would wait upon him; so they went out; Mexaris being waited upon by eight or ten of his men, and Abradates with the like number. As soon as they were in the Garden, Mexaris carried Abradates into a great Walk, where none were present; and after he had beckened unto his men that they should not follow, he stood still, and looked upon Abradates with an imperious aspect: I have had intentions a long time (said he unto him) Page 53 to speak unto you; but my hopes, that of your self, you would do that which a thousand Reasons require you should, hath moved me to defer it till now, to advertise you, that you do not carry your self, as the Son unto the Queen of Susiana, my Sister, ought to do: For though my age do not much differ from yours, yet I must exact from you some difference, both as you are my Nephew, and as you are an Exile, come unto this Court for Refuge, where I ought to be preferred before you. Sir (replied Abradates with a bold civility) I do not know that I have failed in any respects which I owe you, either as being son unto the Queen of Susiana, or as I am come for Refuge unto a place where indeed you are very considerable, and therefore I think I may safely say, that your complaints against me are unjust, and your manner of complaint is a little too high. Your dayly actions, replied Mexaris, are much more injurious to me, for you cannot be ignorant of my devoted affection unto the Princess of Clasomena, and yet you apply your self too obsequiously in your Courtship of her. Though the manner of your language, replied Abradates, might perhaps make me excusable, if I should not render you an account of my actions and designs, yet the respect which I owe you as Brother unto the Queen my Mother, and unto the King, who gives me protection in his Court, obligeth me to tell you, that I loved the Princess of Clasomena from the very first instant that ever I saw her, and I did not know any thing of your passion to her, until such time as I was not able to be Commander of my own: Also understanding that Croessus would never approve of your Marriage with her, I conceived it would be no great injury unto you, if I used my best endeavors to obtain a happiness which you could never enjoy. But can you think, said Mexaris, that the same Reason of State, which moves the King not to consent I should marry one who would render me too potent in his Kingdom, will ever permit you who are a stranger to marry her? No, no, Abradates, let not this imagination delude you, but be assured that it is not the will of Croessus you should think of this Alliance: And consider further, if you be wise, that the Prince of Clasomena will never bestow his Daughter upon an exile'd Prince. Hitherto, replied Abradates, I have spoke unto you as I am Son unto the Queen of Susiana, as a Prince protected in Lidia, and as Nephew unto the Prince Mexaris; but now I will speak to you as a Lover of Panthea, as one who knows not how to yield unto any, and as one who will love and serve her as long as he lives: The truth is, said he, if the case were so as that the Princess of Clasomena should make choyce of you, then I had nothing else to do but dye; and I have so high a respect of her, though not of you, as to dye without complaint: but since she makes no such choyce, be pleased to know, that I will not alter my course. Though you were in Susa, replied Mexaris, and I an Exile protected there as you are in Lidia, you could not speak more haughtily and boldly then you do. I should then speak more mildly, replied Abradates, because I know it unworthy to insult over those that are miserable: And is it not as unworthy (answered Mexaris) to refuse those Respects which are due unto Protectors? I shall never neglect them I owe unto the King of Lidia, replied Abradates; and I am sorry that Love should force me unto that which I do against a Prince so near unto him. I must have better satisfaction (replied Mexaris very fiercely,) for if you do not absolutely renounce Panthea, I must call you to an account with a Sword in your hand. I will do all I can, replied Abradates, to do neither the one nor the other. But you must (answered Mexaris) and that quickly, therefore resolve with your self which of them you will chuse. Since you force me to tell you, replied Abradates, I will preserve Panthea, I will defend my self, and not assault you, unless I must in my own defence: This is all Sir, that either Love or Respect can exact from me: I wish that I were able to yield the Princess of my Soul unto you, but indeed I cannot: and though my resolution is to do nothing against those Respects I owe you, yet will I not do any thing against my Love. When Abradates had said this, he saw Mexaris go towards a thick Bush which grew close by a Christal Fountain in the middle of a Walk; and that he pull'd out two Swords, giving him one, and saying, that since he could not yield Panthea, he should win her if he could, for he would dispute it with him until death. Abradates at the first would not take it, but only to defend himself from the blows of Mexaris, in whose face he saw so much fury as might well exasperate him: but when he saw that the better language he gave him, and the more he recoyled, the more did his choller augment, and more furiously did he assault him, Love and Jealousie being at last stronger then his respects unto Mexaris, he then kept his ground, and fought like one that would vanquish. In the mean time, since I believe you desire to know how Mexaris could find these two Swords in the Bush; be pleased to remember, that I told you Page 54 at their going from the Princess, that Prince whispered with one of his servants; and let me tell you, that he then commanded him to carry those two Swords unto the place appointed, which was very remarkable, because of the Fountain near it; and after this command executed, he charged him with another, purposely to send him away from that place, and appointed him to go and seek for a man that dwelt in the furthest part of all Sardis, expressly charging him not to speak a word of these two Swords.

But as he went out of the Garden to seek this man his Master sent him unto, he met one of the Princess servants at the door, who was his intimate friend, unto whom he imparted his business, and asked his advice, for the servant of Mexaris thought that his Master intended to fight with him he sent for: But the Princess servant having more wit then he, and knowing that Mexaris and Abradates went out together, he suspected some mischief; and after he had advised him rather to return into the Garden, then go upon his message, and to tell his Master how he understood the man he sent him unto was not at home, he himself went hastily unto the Princess, whom he found in discourse with Perinthus, and acquainted her with what he knew: He had no sooner spoke it, but the Princess cried out, and changed colour so much, that Perinthus could not chuse but see what a particular interest she took in the life of Abradates; for he knew her cares could not be for the other. I leave you to judg Madam, in what a pittifull perplexity he was, when looking upon the Princess, he saw her eyes all tears, and fears for the death of Abradates; and since she knew, that in such occasions as this, a very minute is precious, she came to Perinthus, entreating him with extream earnestness: My dear Perinthus (said she unto him) you will infinitely oblige me, if you will go and prevent all mischief that may ensue upon this quarrel; and to oblige you to make more hast, let me tell you, that it will be the most considerable service that I ever enjoyned you: You may easily judg how Perinthus was surprized and vexed at this employment which the Princess did put him upon; he offered to speak two or three times, but the Princess would not hear, but bad him make all hast; So that poor Perinthus much against his mind, went to part two men, whom he would rather have fought with if he durst: True it is, he was not the first that came in, for the clashing of Swords being heard by those who were in other walks, they ran in with all hast, yet came too late also, for the combat was first ended. I shall not relate unto you Madam all the passes of it, it will suffice to tell you, that Abradates was Conquerour, and Mexaris wounded and disarm'd, and confessing that Abradates was of an invincible valour. But I beseech you Madam, imagine a little, what might be the cogitations of Perinthus, when in the uncertainty of the event of this combat, he went unto these two Princes: He hath since confessed unto me, that he could never compose or reconcile himself unto his own wishes; Sometimes he wished them both killed, sometimes that at least Abradates were vanquished, and sometimes again, finding much injustice and baseness in his wishes, he wished his own death, especially when he reflected upon the sorrows and fears of Panthea, least any misfortune should befall Abradates: Moreover, to his further misery, he met this illustrious Conquerour of Mexaris, whom one of his friends with chance brought into the Garden, did follow him; and to compleat the miseries of Perinthus, Abradates no sooner saw him, but he addressed himself to him: If I can without any incivility (said he unto him) desire you to tell the Princess of Clasomena, that it is she only who hath preserved me from being vanquished by Mexaris, I will desire so much favour from you; and to assure her that I attribute the happy success of my combat, unto the passion which I have towards her. Perinthus was so confounded with this discourse, that he silently hearkened unto it, without any other answer then profound reverence. But Abradates taking his silence for a consent unto his desires left him, and went to expect what Croessus would think of his action. In the mean while, many of the Court did transact in his behalf, and amongst the rest Andramites, who to serve Perinthus, had dissuaded Croessus from consenting unto the Marriage between Mexaris and Panthea, did now all he could to appease this Prince, thinking it as serviceable to Perinthus as the other: So that Croessus was so qualified, that he reflected all the fault upon his Brother, and excused Abradates: It was also his pleasure they should embrace each other as soon as Mexaris was recovered: But the most cruel part for Abradates was, that Perinthus moved Andramites to perswade the King, that the only way to prevent all future quarrels between them, was to charge them both equally not to think of any Marriage Page 55 with Panthea: And Andramites to colour the matter, told Croessus, that the Princess her self was in such fears lest either of these two Princes should come to untimely death, by reason of her, that she her self desired it; so that Croessus charged them both to give over all thoughts of her: 'Tis true, he spoke unto these two Rivals in different manners; for he absolutely commanded Mexaris, and entreated Abradates, treating the one as a Subject, and the other as a Stranger, yet notwithstanding they could not resolve to promise him obedience, saying alwayes, that Love was such a Sovereign passion, as they could not so readily surmount it; yet they spoke this with so much reverence unto Croessus, out of fears to incense him, lest he should send them both out of Sardis, that their resistance did not offend, and Croessus believed they intended obedience, though they protested that they thought it impossible. Thus it happened, that the Conquerour was no happier then the Conquered, and Perinthus was only he who reaped the fruit of Abradates his Victory out of his joyes, to hope that the Princess should Marry neither him nor Mexaris: But Madam, the passage was rare, when Perinthus returned to render an account unto the Princess of the combat, for though she heard of others, yet since every one is glad to have repetitions of any thing which pleaseth, or which they have any interest in: Perinthus was no sooner come unto her, Doralisa and my self being present, but she spoke unto him: Well Perinthus (said she unto him with much joy in her eyes) Thanks be to the Gods, the Prince Abradates and the Prince Mexaris are both alive: They are Madam, replied he, but the last of these is wounded: 'Tis true, said she, but since I understand his wounds are not dangerous, I cannot chuse but rejoyce that their combat proved not more fatal: I conceive Madam, replied he, that whosoever understands the true sence of your words, will think Abradates more glorious in your language, then in his disarming Mexaris. However it be (said she, and blushed) give me an exact relation of the combat. Perinthus now was extremely put to it, and not being able himself to set forth the glory of his Rival, whom he saw was too deep in the heart of his Princess already, he told her, that he could not truly do it, for the friends of Mexaris reported one way, and the friends of Abradates another, but the principal of all was what she knew already, that Abradates received not a wound, and that Mex[ar]is was wounded. It is very strange Perinthus (said Doralisa, and laughed, and who knew as well as I did the true cause why he would not satisfie the Princess) you should be so ill informed of this combat: For my part (said she further to discover his thoughts) had I been at any Ball, and the Princess should precisely ask me what passed there, cert[ain]ly I should have related every thing with the least circumstance she should know, whe[th]er the Hall were ill or well furnished, who danced most, which Ladies were best dres[s]ed, and most fair, which of the men was the greatest Gallant, who talked long with such a one, and who with such a one; and she should know every trivial passage of the Assembly so perfectly, as if she were there present. In the mean time, you who are a brave and gallant man in lieu of relating every circumstance, as I could have done, does only tell the Princess that Mexaris is wounded, and that Abradates is Conquerour. 'Tis very true (said the Princess, and smiled) Perinthus is to blame: I should have thought it Madam, replied he, no great discretion to relate a combat unto Ladies, in the same manner as it should be related unto men: It had not been handsom indeed, said Doralis[s]a, to have related Wars and Battels, or your own peculiar Victories: But for a single Duel, and a combat wherein you have no interest, and which is fought between two Princes of such eminency, it ought to be exactly related. I shall better inform my self another time (replied he) and remember your instructions hereafter: Hereafter, said the Princess, Heavens forbid you e're be put unto it. Panthea spoke this with such an Emphasis, that Perinthus knowing thereby her thoughts, was dumb for a quarter of an hour together; during vvhich time, Doralisa talking on as she begun, did almost make him despair. But to return from whence I transgressed, give me leave to tell you Ma[da]m, that Abradates vv[as] so sad to see that in conquering Mexaris he vv[as] not the bett[er], as it vv[as] impossible he should be more, though it vv[as] some comfort to see himself in better state then his Rival, yet he thought himself most unfortunate: When the Prin[ces]s knew it, she vv[as] also much troubled, though her care vv[as] not to shew it: So as the first time that Abradates met her at Doralisa's house, there passed such discourse betw[ee]n them, as did confirm their amity: The Princess kept still in those limits vv[hi]ch she had prescribed unto her self, never to Marry Abradates vvithout the consent of the Prince her Father, but never to Marry Mexaris, vvhat violence soever she vv[as] put unto. Thus Page 56 that which in appearance should quench their Passions, did render them more strong; and Perinthus in striving to prejudice Abradates did against his will do him better service then if he had endeavored it. This close Lover yet did think himself more happy then he was before the Combat of these two Rivals: for though he knew very well, that the heart of Panthea was deeply engaged, yet he had some hopes that seeing she could not marry A[bra]d[ate]s, she would strive to exclude him out of her mind; in so much as we perceived him more pleasant and free then he used to be. As for Mexaris, he was so melancholy, that none living could be more; not but that he had still good words from the Prince of Cla[s]omena, but since words are but wind, and Perinthus kept him from bestowing his daughter without the Kings consent, he was no less unquiet: In the mean while Abradates and he lived with a cold kind of civility to each other, such as seemed to be an inclination to ano[th]er Quarrel. Since the King did not forbid them seeing of Panthea, but only from thoughts of marriage, they often met at her house; but more often in other places, lest they should too much incense Croessus. Thus did they live a kind of compulsive and unpleasant lives; yet Abradates was much less miserable then his Rival; since he did not only know himself not hated, but so much in favour with the World, that the Princess never went unto any place, but he had intelligence of it the very same hour: For since he was liberal unto all, his Intelligencers were most exactly true and faithful to him: And I am confident there was not a man of a condition whatsoever, neither about the Prince of Clasomena, nor about the Princess his daughter, which was not most really for him, except Perinthus. On the contrary, the avarice of Mexaris was such, that he had not any intelligence so much as from his own servants, so that he knew no more but what every one knew. After then he had lived thus some certain days, he fell upon a most unjust and violent Resolution, which was, to carry away Panthea, if he could not by any means win the Prince of Clasomena to let him marry the Princess his Daughter secretly. As he entertained these thoughts, News was brought, that the Princess Basilina Aunt unto Panthea was sick of a mortal disease: Upon this the Princess, who did most tenderly love her, beseeched her Fa[th]er that she might go and pay her last duties unto her who had been so dear unto her. Since her desire was just, she easily obtained it; and the Prince of Clasomena himself had gone this Voyage, if he had not been advertised that Croessus would not be pleased with it: his Resolutions then were, that Panthea should go alone, and that Perinthus should be a Conductor; which employment you may imagine he most joyfully undertook; yet was he vexed to leave Mexaris with the Prince her Father and his Master, unless he had been with him also: yet notwithstanding, the satisfaction he should have to be with the Princess out of sight of all his Rivals, did carry him above all other considerations. In the mean while, Panthea considering that she should stand in need of some comfort in this sorrowful Voyage, desired the Aunt of Doralisa, with whom she lived, to let her Niece go with her, which she granted as willingly as Doralisa wished it: so that the next morning we departed, and went to Clasomena. Abradates resented this separation ex[trem]e sadly; and the greatest aggravation of his sorrows was, that since this Journey was so hastily undertaken, he could not bid adieu unto the Princess in private: so that but for me he had not known that she wished him to remember her during this absence. I shall not tell you Madam, how melancholy the Princess was all the Voyage, nor how great her sorrows were, when arriving in Clasomena we found the Princess Basilina so very ill, that there was no hopes of her Recovery: This Madam would be too tedious unto you: But give me leave to tell you, that four days after our first arrival this excellent Princess dyed; whose death Panthea took so heavily, that she fell sick her self; so that she could not return so soon to Sardis: for though her disease was not very violent, yet it was so great as to hinder her from travel; so that Perinthus enjoyed a longer happiness then ere he looked for, in being free from the sight of his Rivals, and continually seeing his Princess; and indeed he became so blith and pleasant whilst we stayed at Clasomena, that the Princess would not admit of any company but his, Doralisa, and mine: so that it may not unfitly be said, that as Roses grow amongst thorny prickles, so the delights of Perinthus did grow amongst his sorrows: 'Tis true, his sweets did last no longer then the sweets of a fading Rose: For besides, that Love is an enemy to rest and serenity, he and his delights were blasted by a stinging Letter from Andramites; for it brought him news, that Mexaris was perpetually as close to the Prince of Clasomena, as if he were his shadow: yet for all this, since the Princess was not amongst them, they could not put their Resolutions into Page 57 execution; he hoped therefore that as soon as he saw the Prince of Clasomena, he would make him alter his design if he had any which were contrary to his intentions: So that his trouble at it was not so great as his satisfaction to be so near his Princess, and so far off his Rivals, but there vv[as] another passage vv[hi]ch vv[as] a much more better Pill unto him; for be pleased to know Madam, that the Prince Abradates, not being able to live so long without some news of Panthea, did write twice every Week constantly as long as we stayed in Clasomena unto either Doralisa or my self; or to say better unto the Princess, since the Contents of them all related only unto her: at the first he intimated his ardent desires of obtaining license to write unto her self; but she would not by any means permit it lest by any accident his Letters should miscarry: but as for those which were written unto Do[r]alisa and me, they were written in such an ambiguous manner, as they would admit of several interpretations: So that the Princess heard from Abradates almost without any danger, and Abradates understood from us as much as he desired to know. But the better to make our matters mysterious, we intimated unto Abradates, that when we vvould mention any thing unto him vv[hi]ch concerned the Princess, it should be under the name of Perinthus: so that you may imagine that the Name of Perinthus vv[as] in all our Letters. It chanced once as ill luck vv[as], vvhen Perinthus came to Doralisa's Chamber as she vv[as] vvriting unto Abradates; and though it vv[as] alvvays her custom vvhen she vvrit, to appoint her Woman that vvaited upon her, to let none enter before she vv[as] first acquainted, yet she did not exactly obey her all that time, but on the contrary, she vvanting something vv[hi]ch vv[as] in another Room, she vv[en]t out, unperceived by her Mistress, and left the door open, hoping to return ere any came: but vv[hi]le she stayed talking vvith some of the Princess Women, Perinthus came in, vvho hearing no noise in the Chamber, thought that either none vv[as] there, or else that Doralisa vv[as] sick: but to satisfie himself he vv[en]t in, and savv that she vv[as] behind a Screen, vvriting upon a table opposite unto a great Glass, and her back tov[ar]ds him: Since Doralisa's mind vv[as] very intent upon her Writ[ing], she never minded any noise, and therefore it is no vvonder if she did not hear Perinthus enter, vvho being full of curiosity to see vvhat she vvrit, that he might have some subject to vvrit her vvith, as she had often him, did go tov[ar]ds her, and did tread as softly as if she had been asleep, and he afraid to vwake her: at last he came close to her, and leaning his head almost over her shoulder, he read vvhat she vvrit unto Abradates; yet, could he not knovv unto vvhom this Letter vv[as] addressed: but he vv[as] much amazed vvhen the first vvord he read vv[as] his ovvn Name; his curiosity augmented, and he read all she had vvrit, vv[hi]ch, as I remember, vv[as] in these vvords: Perinthus yesterday spoke unto me concerning you in such an obliging way, that I wish you knew what we said in your Commendations: your last Letter seemed unto him the most pleasant in the world, and so admirably politick, that I read it no less then thrice unto him: You may well know, that since he did so commend you for it, I dare not after him: I have many other things to say, which unto you are more—

As Doralisa had writ this last word, and Perinthus read it with extream impatience to see the sequel, that thereby he might understand the beginning, which was like unto a Riddle to him, knowing that Doralisa never shewed him any Letter; she lifted up her eyes, and looking in the Glass which was opposite to her, she saw Perinthus reading her Letter over her shoulder. She no sooner spied him but she cried out: Fie, fie, Perinthus (said she and hid her Letter) have you forgot that respect which is due unto our Sex? Why, why, fair Doralisa (said he unto her and smiled) are you making me speak things I never thought upon? I pray let me see this Letter which you say I thought so pleasant, and which was so polite, that I read it no less then three times. Doralisa then perceiving that he had read all she writ, thought it better to turn it into rally, then make a serious matter of it, thinking that the more angry she was, the more would he apprehend it my[st]erious: also since those that use to play upon others, cannot well take so much liberty unto themselves, unless they allow it unto others: so she thought that she had no reason to be angry with Perinthus, because she had played him a hundred such tricks in her life; so that changing her countenance, and beginning to laugh and read the Letter, to gain more time for the explanation of it, Perinthus desired to read it also, and she not denying, he read it word for word. I pray Doralisa, said he unto her, why did your Pen drop such a lye as this, and to whom do you tell it? for I am certain, that all the day yesterday you Page 58 did not speak one word unto me; yet you tell the person unto whom you write, that I spoke a hundred times of her yesterday in a most obliging manner: And you add furl[th]er, that her last Letter was very pleasant; and you told all these with such a confid[en]ce, that you amazed me: However, said Doralisa, I am confident, I did you no ill office, for in saying all this, I said nothing in your disadvantage; but on the contr[ar]y, said that you acknowledg'd it for a Polite and pleasant Letter, and that I durst not give her any commendations after you.

I beseech you Doralisa (said he unto her) tell me, and shew me this that I commend[ed] so, otherwise I shall be much incensed: Truly, answered she, if I were a bad friend I should shew it; but to let you see that I am a good one, know that a Lady in Sardis, who for her honour I will not name, did write a Letter unto me, which to shew her wit, she hath stuffed full of Fustian and big words, which signifie nothing: So that knowing by her stile she loves to be commended, doubtless I did her that office in the highest manner, since I told her she had your commendations: I should believe you Do[r]alisa, replied he, if you would shew me this her Letter: Since perhaps you are acquainted with her hand (replied Doralisa) I will not shew it unto you. In the mean time, Perinthus, added she, I pray leave me the liberty to finish out my Letter: Re[pl]ay, said he, I do believe this is a business of some earnest, for at the place where you left, it seems you had more matters to express then complements: 'Tis true (replied Doralisa, and laughed) therefore I desire you to leave me: I cannot, said he; for to be plain vvith you, I do not believe a word of all this you have told me: What do you believe then (said she unto him?) I know not what to believe or think, yet I am the most mistaken man alive, if this Letter do not contain some close secrets: If you think so, said Doralisa, then you are unreasonable to press unto a discovery of it, since you know secrets are such things as our friends must tell us themselves, and we ought not to ask them: If I had not seen my name in your Letter, replied he, doubtless I should be more discreet: But since you are so bold as to tell three or four lies of me, I thought I might be as bold in asking you the truth of those things which I desire to know: What would you know? (replied Doralisa.) I would know, said he, unto vvhom you direct your Letter: I have already told you, replied she, that I will not; all that I can do for your satisfaction is to protest most solemnly, that all I have or shall write unto her, does not at all relate unto your interest: For Heavens sake (said Pe[rinthus]) do not use me thus, for if you refuse me this, I shall relate the story of it, not only to every one here, but unto all the Court also when I return to Sardis: Perinthus is so discreet (replied Doralisa) that I do not fear he will so far incense me: Doralisa has been often so waggish vvith me, replied he, that Perinthus would not be much to blame, if he were once in his life revenged: When you have told all you can, replied she, What then will the issue be? The issue doubtless will be (answered Perinthus) that they will know you keep a secret correspondence with some or other: They know well enough already (replied she, and smiled) that I have not yet found this compleat man I look for; therefore my reputation will not be wounded by any thing you can say against me. Perhaps (said Perinthus then, and looked stedfastly upon her) you negotiate in behalf of some other, and perhaps also you have less interest then I have in the secret meaning of this Letter: I should have thought, replied Doralisa, that a man who will not open his own secrets unto any, would not be so pressing to know the secrets of others: However it be, said he, I have such an extream desire to be satisfied in what I ask of you, or that you will confess it unto me if I can guess at it, that there is nothing which I will not willingly do to oblige you unto it: Let me then know what you guess it to be, said she, and afterwards I shall know how far I can answer. As they were upon these terms I chanced to enter., not knowing of any contest betwixt them: And since the Princess feared that Doralisa had not writ unto Abradates obligingly enough, I came to tell her she should not seal up her Letter before she shewed it unto the Princess. To acquit my self of this employment, I whispered my message into her ear, but as low as I whispered it, Perinthus heard it as well as Doralisa: So that comparing what I told Doralisa, unto what he had read in her Letter, he believed that this Letter which the Princess desired to see, was the same which included his name, and he made no further scruple of it, but that this mysterious Letter related unto the Princess and Albradates. Doralisa then offered to tell me the passage vvch vvwas between them, but Perinthus cared no more for this Rallary, and rising up to go avvay: I need not ask you any more, (said he unto her) for I knovv it already, vvithout putting you to the trouble Page 59 of telling it. Doralisa seeing a great alteration in his countenance, feared least he should speak something in prejudice of the Princess, and therefore she stayed him: Then telling me in three vvords the subject of their quarrel, to let me understand vvhat I ought to say, and to persvvade him also that there vvwas no mystery in the Letter, I did vvhat I could to make him believe all this vvwas but a piece of Doralisa's sporting Wit, vvch vvwas in a frolique humour; but I perceived he did not believe me, and so certainly he left us. He vvwas no sooner gone out of the Chamber, but Doralisa and I called him back aVVain. Upon a little consultation together, vvve concluded it better that Perinthus alone should suspect something, then that he should tell this passage unto some such men as vvould tell it unto a thousand, vvch might produce ill consequences. Perinthus then being returned into Doralisa's Chamber, we seriously entreated him not to reveal this passage between him and her; telling him, (to the end he should not deny us, and alVVso to deceive him) that e're long we would acquaint him with the truth of the matter. No, no, (replied Perinthus with a hollow kind of expression) I will not reveal this seVVret which is so dear unto you, never fear it; I respect the person to whom it relates, more then to have any such thought. Doralisa and I would have said more unto him, but he went away without giving us, or we giving him any other answer. In the mean time, we resolved to hinder him from acquainting the Princess with this accident, lest it should too much trouble her, and thought it better to comply with him, and tell exactly what he could guess it to be, yet we could not meet with a ready opportunity for it, for none that belonged to the Princess could see him that day, not that he had shut up himself to conVVceal his melancholy, but that he was gone to see if he could discover whether any of Abradates his men were in Clasomena; and indeed his quest was not in vain, for he found out by a strange chance, that there was a man lodged in the Captain of the Castles house, who would not be seen; so that by inquiring who he was, he understood by a servant of the Captains, who was my Cozen, that this stranger was to depart in the morning after, that he came but the day before, that he came from Sardis, and that I had spoke with him in the Garden. I leave you to judg Madam after this, whether a man so much in Love, and so full of wit and spirit as Perinthus was, would not conclude that there was a secret correspondency between Panthea and Abradates, he apprehended then the very truth, and saw plainly that his name in Doralisa's Letter was only an umbrage unto Panthea's name: It is a thing impossible to express the despair of Perinthus: Is it not miVVserly enough, said he, that I dare not so much as tell the person whom I adore, that I love her, but that I must be also persecuted with a thousand sad circumstances, which add bitter aggravations unto all my sorrows? Must no name but mine colour the favours which the Princess whom I adore confers upon my Rival? Fie, fie, I cannot endure it: And the truth is Madam, this trivial inconsiderable passage did so perplex him, that he was beyond all patience: Love does infuse so much folly & weakness into the spirits of the most compleat men, that he had not been half so much stung, if the Princess had expressed her favors unto Abradates by any other name then his. This bitter thought did so corrode upon his heart, that he intended to desire the Princess not to use his name any more in her Letters; and to that end, the next morning he came unto her lodging, but so melancholy and altered, that Panthea thinking he had been ill, did most obligingly ask him how he did, telling him she should be extreamly sorry he should fall sick: WhilVVst she was recovering her health, and that she intended as he brought her from Sardis to Clasomena, so he should carry her back again from Clasomena to Sardis. Perinthus received these marks of friendVVship from the Princess very respectfully, but with so much sadness in his face, that it was evident there was as much in his soul. In the mean while, Doralisa and I did search for him all that day, and it chanced when he came, that the Princess was gone into her CloVVset with Doralisa, and some Clasomenian Ladies, and Perinthus and my self were alone together, in a Tarrass close by the Chamber: There we silently stood both of us, in expectation what either would say unto the other: At last, seeing Perinthus so busie with his own thoughts, that he minded nothing; I spoke first unto him, and I asked him whether he was desirous I should keep my word, and tell him what he had so much desire to know? No Pherenice, said he, and sighed I know too much already; but I have one favour to ask, which I beseech you do not deny me: If it be both just and posVVsible, (said I unto him) you shall certainly obtain it: Then I conjure you, (replied he) to let Doralisa use my name no more in writing unto that person she writ last; and it is much better for he- to make use of any other to hide that which she would have kept Page 60 a secret, for this may prejudice me more then she is aware of: I would have desired the same of Doralisa her self, but her humour is such, that she never hears me but in way of jest; and therefore I address my self unto you, who being of a less frolique disposition, has doubtless a more tender soul to be moved at the desires of your friends. Perinthus spoke after such a mournful manner, as I perceived by his tone the sadness of his heart, which moved mine to pity him: So that answering him as sweetly as I could, to the end I might thereby oblige him to a confidence in me: Perinthus (said I unto him) I shall easily obtain what you desire of Doralisa; and since you do forbid her to speak all the good of you she pleaseth, when occasion shall happen, I do assure you, she shall use your name no more when she writes unto her friend, for I know she infinitely esteems you, and would not upon any terms give you any offence: But pray tell me, Why are you so incensed against her for using your name, at a time that she could not take any oVVther that she knew better? Pherenice, said he unto me, if you will make me a firm proVVmise of fidelity, I will impart part of my thoughts unto you: I will seriously make that promise, (said I unto him) provided you conceal nothing from me: Since you never imparted any thing at all to me (replied he) I dare not discover all I know unto you, unless you first vow secreVVsie. I think after this Perinthus intended to tell me he loved the Princess; and since I longed to hear him speak of his passion, that I might endeavour to cure him of it, I promised and vowed all he desired—After which, looking stedfastly upVVon me: Is it not true Pherenice (said he unto me with a sadness in his eyes, as would have moved the most incensible so ul to pity him) that the Letter which Doralisa writ, was unto Abradates? and that the name of miserable Perinthus was used only to umVVbrage the name of the adorable Panthea: Perinthus (said I unto him, and interrupted him) you do not keep within the limits of our conditions, for I promised not to reveal any secret you shall impart unto me; for I perceive by the very beginning of your discourse, that you are so far from imparting and trusting me, that you desire I should impart and trust you. Consider well Perinthus what you say, and do not begin your disVVcourse with any questions, if you desire I should answer you: Neither, to tell you trully, do I very well understand, though what you suppose were true, what prejudice it would be to you, though your name were placed in lieu of Panthea's. If the Prince of Clasomena, (replied he very faintly) should by any accident meet with one of those Letters, might he not suspect me of holding some intelligence, and that I did betray him? I, I say, unto whom he has said a hundred times, he would not have the Princess marry Abradates: Ha Perinthus (said I unto him) Have you not professed your self so obliged unto the service of the Princess, as that you ought to wish well unto Abradates, if you did believe she looked favourably upon him? Yes, and so you would, if you had not some other secret reason, which I perceive well enough, and for your tranquillities sake wish were not true: Yes, yes, Perinthus, you do love Panthea, and some sparks of jealousie persvvades you that she loves Abradates: This is it that makes you take it so ill, your name should be used in a Letter which you think is unto that Prince: I have long since perceived the passion in you to her, yet I knew no reason you had to trust none with it, but to smother that fire which consumes you, a little spark if covered, will grow to a great flame, but a great fire will not hurt, if not covered; therefore let me persvvade you ingenuously to confess it unto me, otherwise you will induce me to tell the Princess all I know: If you will trust me, added I, I shall promise you an inviolable fidelity; and if you will not, I do protest, that as soon as I am parted from you, I will tell the Princess that I think you are in Love with her, and shall give her such evidences of the truth in it, that perhaps she will forbid you ever seeing her again. Perinthus hearing me say so, looked attentively upon me, and spoke not a word: He considered which was the more advantageous for him, to confess, or not confess, that he loved her: If I conVVfess it, said he, perhaps she will tell, and if she tell I am undone: But if I do not conVVfess she will the sooner tell, and my ruine is the more inevitable, both ways ruin'd, what shall I do? Then afterwards, imagining I would never be so importunate to know a thing which I would condemn in him, he began to flatter himself with a bottomless hope of he knew not what, and answer me enigmatically. When I saw his soul begin to stagger, I pressed him further, and that so home, that I said the Princess should preVVsently know he was in Love with her, if he would not acknowledg it to me. At last, afVVter he had made me solemnly swear that I would never discover what he would tell me, Page 61 neither unto Doralisa nor the Princess, nor any else whatsoever, he promised to lay open the whole truth unto me; yet first I declared unto him that I would engage my self no further then to be faithful unto him, and to comfort him; but not to further him in his passion.

Perhaps Madam you will ask me why I would urge Perinthus to confess his Love; to which I answer, Because I thought it would be a considerable service unto the Princess, if I could scrue my self into the credit of a man who had such a prevalency with the Prince her Father; and I could be an instrument to prevent any hurt to Abradates, whom I knew he did not love: Also I hoped that my advice might perhaps happily cure him of that disVVease which did so much torment him, and would be his Ruine: So that my ends were raVVther at the Princess service, and the tranquility of Perinthus, then out of any curiosity that I desired to know the secrets of his heart: however Perinthus confessed his passion unto me; related all his raptures, and told me all his thoughts: So that after he had expressed the grandure of his passion, his purity and constancy, Judg Pherenice, said he unto me, whether I had not good reason to desire that my Name should not be employed to make Abradates happy. Perinthus (said I unto him with much sweetness, to the end I might insinuate my self into his opinion) I am very much obliged to you for letting me know that from your own mouth which I so much desired, and I assure you that I will conceal this secret wherewith you have entrusted me, as closely as you can your self. Ah Pherenice (said he unto me) perhaps you will keep it too closely; and I do not know whether at the same time I desire you to conceal it, I should not also entreat you to tell it unto the—At this word Perinthus stopt, not being able to pronounce the word Princess; then preVVsently reprehending himself, No, no Pherenice, said he to me, do not mind my raving, but my reason, which bids me rather dye for my adored Panthea, and never to let her know I dye for her; therefore be as faithful as your promise, and let me only have the comfort to speak unto her whom she loves of the torments which my passion puts upon me: in the mean time, as I will not entreat you to render me any good office unto the Princess, so do not you entreat me to be serviceable unto Abradates. The case is not the same, replied I, for if I undertake to do you any good office to the Princess Panthea, I should absolutely ruine you, so you should ask me a thing impossible: but if I entreat you to do a good office for Abradates unto the Prince of Clasomena, I do entreat you to do a thing which may easily be done. Easily (replied Perinthus hastily,) ah Pherenice, you do not know how difficult it is to do a good office for a Rival, and especially a favored Rival. But PeVVrinthus, replied I, would you have the Princess marry a man she hates? I would she were contented, replied he, but for a comfort unto my miseries I would she would marry none. As we were thus in discourse, the Princess came out of her Closet, and went into the Garden to take the ay, whither I followed her, but not Perinthus, but he retired as full of shame, as if the Princess did divine what he had told me. Doralisa, who had observed the discourse which we had together, did ask me what it was: but though she and I had promised each other to render an account of what we should discover concerning Perinthus; yet I did not think my self obliged to tell her what I had vowed unto him to conVVceal; and indeed I told her nothing but what I knew before he had discovered himself unVVto me. After this, Perinthus spoke offer unto me then he used, though he was ever one of my good friends: but what arguments and addresses soever he used to know of me upVVon what terms Abradates stood in Panthea's minds, I did not tell him one word; and as he was one day importuning me, Peace Perinthus (said I unto him) and never ask me that which I would never tell you though I did know it: and be assured of this, that as I will never betray your trust, so I will never betray the Princess, unto whom I owe a greater
